Miss Sharpe wore pink satin striped with white.

Miss Isabelle M. Rhodes wore a bright yellow silk, brocaded in rose colors.

Miss Irene Butler wore a very dainty gown of blue satin.

Miss Abby Aldrich and Miss Bessie Chapin were also in blue.

Miss Hazard and Miss Mollie Foster shared the honors of the younger set in gowns of black silk.

Miss Maud Dorrance wore a pink silk, striped with white, and carried pink roses.

Miss Bessie Sackett wore a silver gray satin, striped with white, and a corsage bouquet of violets.

Miss Pegram looked extremely well in a gown of plain gray satin.

There were only five of the large number of debutantes present—Miss Helen Pearce, Miss Elizabeth Ladd, Miss Chapin and the Misses Tucker.

Miss Pearce wore a very handsome gown of blue satin; Miss Ladd was in yellow satin, with violets, and the Misses Tucker and Miss Chapin wore white.

Formerly the debutantes were all anxious for these balls, because they did not end until early morning, and then, again, it was their first ball with champagne. But these things have changed, and the ball last night was particularly noticeable for its lack of young men, who throng the Trocadero dance. But then the balls are given principally for the older set.

There was no programme of music arranged, Mr. Reeves playing just what the guests felt like dancing.

Supper was served at midnight in the supper rooms. In place of the small tables large ones were used, seating parties of eight or ten. The menu included escalloped halibut, chicken salad, croquettes, ices, champagne and apollinaris.

The ball was over quite early, as the majority of the guests left after supper. The innovations of the new management, for whom it was a first ball to plan, will be even more surprising at their Valentine ball, Feb. 14.

Next week will be as lively, if not livelier, than the past.

It has always been customary every winter for the Arion Club or some musical talent to furnish some entertainment for the inmates of the Butler Hospital. Mr. Moses Goddard has arranged some theatricals for Monday evening, which will be presented by some of the society amateurs who have won dramatic fame before in charitable performances. Two short plays will be presented. The first is entitled "Decision of the Court," to be presented by Mrs. Howard Hoppin and Mr. J. R. V. Gilliat of Boston. The second—"Who Is Who"—will have five persons in the cast: Miss Lucy Aldrich and Messrs. James B. Richardson, J. R. V. Gilliat, Frank Cranston and Harry Dunnell. Quite a contingent will go out to the hospital to see the performances, and will be entertained afterward at supper by Mr. Goddard.

Tuesday evening, the second dance of the older set will be given at the Art Club. It will be a leap year dance.

Wednesday, the third of the Trocadero dances, for which Mr. Guild has planned some special dances, which he will not disclose until that night, will be given.

Miss Nethersole will have very large audiences here next week. The line for the sale, which opened Thursday morning, formed Wednesday evening, so that by noon the best seats for each performance were sold. It will be interesting to know how Providence will like her impersonation of "Carmen," which recent attendants at her performances state resemble her "Camille" very closely, the most exciting scene occurring at the end of the third act. Miss Nethersole will arrive here from New York Monday afternoon.

The new two-step, composed by Mr. E. W. Corliss, which has been arranged and played by Mr. D. W. Reeves at the Trocadero dances, will be given at the Opera House during Miss Nethersole's engagement.

The next Arion concert will be given in the evening of Feb. 14.

Those who attended the reception given by Mrs. Clarence H. Hayes, Tuesday evening, at her suite in the Empire, were much pleased with its unique floral decorations and the entire reception arrangements for the guests. The usual draperies of the windows were replaced with some made of smilax, opening in the centre and caught like the regular curtains, with loops of yellow. The window sills were beds of yellow chrysanthemums and tall white lilies, the entire effect being of white, gold and green.

Mr. and Mrs. Hayes received under a bower composed of aricas, inserted in white and gold vases, their branches intertwining at the ceiling. The mantels were dressed with ferns and asparagus plumora. The sides of the parlor were edged with baskets of flowers.

Supper was served at small tables in the dining room. In the centre of each table, at which four guests were seated, was a tall cut glass vase, filled with two hand bouquets of American Beauty roses and lilies of the valley. At a given signal, when the supper was ended, the butlers took out the bouquets, dried them, and presented them to the lady guests. This surprise and novelty, which was arranged by Doogue, was a delight to the guests, as was also the serving of the supper.

A pink and green tea was given to the members and congregation of the Central Baptist Church, Tuesday evening, from 8 until 10 o'clock, in the vestry. Mrs. Edwin Calder poured coffee, and Mrs. Howard and Mrs. Spaulding presided at the chocolate table.

President and Mrs. E. Benjamin Andrews gave their annual reception to the members of the senior class of Brown University Tuesday evening at their residence on College street. The young lady candidates for graduation honors were very prominent, meeting for the first time their fellow-classmates in a formal manner. The residence was prettily decorated, and during the two hours of the reception Mr. and Mrs. Andrews were able to extend their hospitality to the entire class of '96.

The Providence Art Club held its annual meeting, ending with a musicale and spread, Wednesday evening. The meeting disclosed the fact that the waiting list was so large that the constitution would have to be amended to extend the limit of membership. The cosey quarters of the clubhouse were also shown to be inadequate, and it was decided to build an addition to the building, the two rooms added to furnish an additional dressing room and accommodation for the sketch class.

The members unanimously showed their appreciation of the devotion and untiring zeal which Mr. Earl P. Mason has exhibited by re-electing him president. Mr. Edward C. Frost was re-elected secretary.

The business meeting occupied more time than they expected, so that it was past 9 o'clock before the musical programme began. The numbers were given by Miss Alice L. Pitman and her quartet, which she so well directs, and which includes Misses Grace A. Newell, Ella L. Clarke, Grace E. Baker and Grace C. Irwin. There will be a "ladies' afternoon" Thursday, when Miss Harriete L. Rice will present a paper on "Angelica Kauffman," at 4 o'clock, to be followed by a 5 o'clock tea.

Two Rhode Island women have been honored by the colonial committee of the Atlanta exposition, Mrs. Richard J. Barker of Warren and Miss Mary A. Greene, both receiving silver medals. Miss Greene was chairman of the Rhode Island colonial committee, which consisted of Miss Greene, Miss Charlotte F. Dailey, Mrs. William R. Talbot, Miss Amelia S. Knight, Mrs. Richard J. Barker, Miss Elizabeth B. Dexter and Miss Susie Miner. Mrs. Barker received her medal as chairman of the book plate committee.

Mr. and Mrs. R. J. Barker are spending the winter in Fall River, while their new residence is being built in Tiverton, R. I.

There was a wedding in East Greenwich, Wednesday evening, in which Providence was considerably interested; not largely, however, as the reception was very small, the majority of the invitations being extended to the church only. The assemblage at the edifice was a large one, therefore, as there have not been many weddings since November. The bride was Miss Louise Stanton Knowles, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Samuel M. Knowles. She wedded Mr. Jacob S. Martin of Providence. Mr. D. L. D. Granger of this city was the best man, and the ushers were Messrs. John L. Mauran, A. K. Tillinghast and Morris House of Providence, and Howard Williams of Bristol. The ceremony was performed at 6:30 o'clock, and was followed by a reception from 7 until 9 o'clock, at which a very elaborate supper was served. Mr. and Mrs. Martin will reside in East Greenwich.

The weather was not considered for a moment, even Monday morning, when the hour for the inaugural ceremonies of the new city government approached, as ladies not only occupied all the seats in the balcony reserved for them, but also required special chairs in corners on the floor of the council chamber. Any debutante who is being introduced this season would have jumped with glee and delight to have such an abundance of baskets and floral designs sent them at their "coming out" as the new mayor and government did on their "coming in." The mayor had horseshoes of different sizes for good luck, a chair too small for use on the occasion and lots of baskets. There was a double semi-circle of pink and pink and white carnations on the desks, and cut flowers in abundance. Several men who participate in the prominent social functions were introduced into political life, and their fair friends went to see the initiation.

It would have seemed much more natural if Mr. Louis C. Elson's lecture, Monday, had immediately preceded and analyzed the programme of the Boston Symphony concert for Wednesday evening. It is the first winter in several seasons that the concerts have been given without his or Mr. Apthorp's explanations. Monday he gave the first of a series of lectures upon the "History Song," illustrating then "Seven Centuries of English Song." His audience, however, was not as large as usually greets him, but zero weather explains why it was preferable to remain within doors rather than go out, even if Mr. Elson is always interesting in presenting his musical themes. His second lecture, Thursday afternoon, had a much larger audience. His series will be completed next week with two lectures upon "Shakespeare in Music."

There may be some doubt as to whether Providence is quite up-to-date with the "new woman," but she certainly is not as far as the "new man" is concerned. The change in the apparel of the latter is quite recent, too. One man who guided the direction of his carriage quickly and safely through the whirlwinds of dust last Saturday wore one of those dark veils with which women guard their complexions. It was dust that troubled him, however; not complexion.

The death of Mr. Henry Holden Ormsbee, though not sudden, is mourned by a large circle of friends, who attended the burial service, Monday, in St. Stephen's Church, of which he was a prominent member. The bearers were Messrs. Jeffrey Hazard, Charles H. Hidden, Henry Pearce and W. G. Nightingale. Mr. Ormsbee was well known among the Warwick Neck colony, as his cottage adjoined the old Hazard Hotel, where he had invariably spent his summers since Mrs. Ormsbee's death. They had only two children—John, who wedded Miss Leonard and with whom Mr. Ormsbeen resided on Waterman street, and Lewis, who wedded Miss McKinney.

Mr. and Mrs. William Goddard returned from New York Monday, as Mr. and Mrs. C. Oliver Iselin did not sail from New York Wednesday. They may sail next Wednesday, although they do not now expect to sail until the 22d, the time of departure depending altogether upon the report of the cup race investigating committee.

Mrs. Thomas Jenckes went to New York Thursday.

Mrs. Robert H. I. Goddard returned from Washington yesterday. Miss Goddard will not return for some days.

Mr. and Mrs. Edward Pearce have been spending the holiday season at Mrs. Pearce's former home in St. Paul.

Mr. John R. V. Gilliat of Boston has been the guest of Mrs. Howard Hoppin during the week.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 19, 1896.

Mr. Rafael Joseffy had a real stranger's generous welcome last evening, when he appeared on the Music Hall platform as the soloist for the twelfth Symphony concert, and cordial warmth and insistent applause accompanied through his performance in the second pianforte concerto of Brahms. He has been long absent, but he returns with an art matured, strengthened and enriched beyond that virtuosity which made him such a favorite in the days when he used to startle by the speed of his execution and fascinate the ear by a dainty touch for which almost no action was light enough. His aim now appears to be to satisfy and not to astonish, to edify and not to tickle, although he retains and uses the same distinguished clearness and readiness of technique and contrasts vigor with delicacy brilliantly but wisely. The concerto is none too interesting, although the second pair of movements are melodious, fanciful, poetic and developed with reasonable consideration for the listener who wants mere music and the concord of sweet sounds. The opening allegro and the scherzo-like allegro which succeeds it are often hard, harsh, labored and clamorous, and they tire. There is an immense amount of complicated writing which shows ingenuity of notion and command of treatment; but somehow these movements do not seem to reach any real relief of conclusion; they cry aloud and insist in many voices, but they do not seem to say any one thing distinctly and purposefully and to settle upon any resolution. It is a perpetual seeking and proclaiming, but even when a properly formed period is reached nothing has been determined that the discussion can end and the incident be pronounced upon as closed. The andante has gentle and connected thought and the final allegretto has plain themes, openly stated and obviously developed. Mr. Josoffy played like what he is—a man of strong intelligence, positive views and ample art, and the orchestra supported him splendidly, besides thrusting themselves too much into prominence with their applause. If a great genius or a rare artist visits the town, the orchestra might be forgiven for forgetting decorum and applauding; but when a home performer of long acquaintance acquits himself honorably and well, there is no propriety in persistent slapping of fiddle-backs and clapping of hands. Any necessary congratulations can be tendered by Mr. Paur.

A beautiful and appreciative performance of Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony began the concert, after the tranquil loveliness of whose andante the beginning of the Brahm's seemed especially rough and domineering. The "Egmont" overture of Beethoven, also well rendered was the only other number.

The thirteenth concert is set for a fortnight hence and for it are promised a Goldmark symphony, a new suite by Godard, and Rubinstein's "Dimitri Donskor" overture. Madame Melba will sing twice.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 19.

The Symphony Concert.

Last evening the twelfth concert of the Symphony Orchestra was given in Music Hall. The programme was:

Unfinished Symphony, B minor.....Schubert
Concerto No. 2, B flat minor.....Brahm
Overture, "Egmont".....Beethoven
Soloist, Mr. Rafael Joseffy.

It is a pity that lovers of classic music cannot tolerate a programme that lasts longer than one hour and a half, when one item in the list must necessarily be a symphony, it is a most difficult business to give a varied programme of ninety minutes' duration. Good music will not gracefully submit itself to the measuring tape and shears, and this fact should not be forgotten by those who so eagerly clamor for change. It is true that the preparing of an attractive musical programme is a gift not possessed by many conductors; but, on the other hand, the best programmes are not the shortest, nor are they listened to by an an audience intent on catching an early train or in being present at a social function. If music is listened to by watch measure, it must be arranged by watch measure and want of time must be necessarily accompanied by want of novelty It is a sad and not stimulating truth that a great many people attend the symphony concerts from a sense of duty, and not from a love of musical art. They are more ambitious to be seen than to hear, and even ninety minutes is too long for this purpose. Curiously enough, the same people who are impatient to be gone from a symphony concert forget the passage of time when listening to the vulgarities, indecencies and cheap art of a Yvette Guilbert; they make a brief, indifferent tourist trip to the heights of Parnassus, and then make themselves comfortably at home in the slums of Paris. A Beethoven symphony should be cut down to make it suit fastidious modern taste, but we cannot get enough of coarse stuff like "Les Vierges" or "La Soularde." Both species of art are heard in Music Hall, and when the fatuous very small art of Yvette Guilbert arouses the greater enthusiasm, it is premature to insist on an increase of time for our symphony concerts. Curiosity is the most exacting and the most shameless of fashions, and a large amount of our so-called fondness for art has no deeper foundation.

And yet the Schubert symphony was well worth the rehearing, and as for as the Brahm concert was there not Joseffy? This artist has not been heard and his beautiful touch and graceful finger work were most pleasant to hear. But although this admirable artist has gained in seriousness and dignity, he hardly seemed to reach up to the full height of Brahms. There were grace, delicacy and faultless taste; but despite the improvement in this direction, there was a certain sweet effeminace that was foreign to the work in hand. Mr. Joseffy received a royal reception and was called out there several times to bow his thanks.

There will be no symphony concert next week.

[78]

REDUCTION

RATIO

12x

2.5 mm
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

4.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.5 mm

Established 1813.

The Official Paper of the State.

The Official Paper of the City.

MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 20, 1896.

The Symphony Concert in Music Hall--Return of Joseffy.

It was not difficult to discern the cause of the especially large audience assembled in Music Hall on Saturday evening; it was a species of Prodigal Son coming back, or possibly the rightful heir returning to his heritage. For years the great pianist Joseffy has voluntarily left the concert-stage and eaten the husks of teaching and of Tarrytown; embassies besought him to return to public triumphs, in vain; only from the class-room came the gratifying word that he was a greater artist than ever, only a few favorite pupils were allowed to hear the pianist who had charmed thousands. After years of such oblivion the artist returns surprisingly developed, infinitely greater than before his self-imposed exile.

Once before, in the history of piano playing, a similar event took place; Henselt withdrew himself from public playing at a certain epoch of his career and devoted himself to teaching in St. Petersburg, finally emerging from his retirement a greater artist than ever. Joseffy has done the same; he left us a great virtuoso, he comes back a great musician. We are glad that he made his re-entree in Brahms' second concerto, a work which not only demands the greatest technical ability, but the broadest grasp of musicianship as well; had he played a Liszt or a Chopin concerto we should have recognized the old Joseffy, but in this work we were at once compelled to acknowledge something more. The true piano concerto is that in which the solo instrument is so interwoven with the orchestra that one cannot think of the forces as separated; a symphony with a thread of piano-work running through the warp and woof. Beethoven began such concertos with his works in G and E flat in this form, while in Chopin's two concertos one finds only beautiful piano thoughts with an obliging orchestra playing accompaniments in the background. Brahms has, in this concerto, merged his forces so that the pianist is obliged to share his triumph with the orchestra, so that a symphonic and not a solo impression is left upon the mind of the auditor; abnegation of self is the prime requisite of the soloist here.

We found this characteristic of the work beautifully evident when it was first given in Boston by Prof. Carl Baermann under Mr. Gericke some years ago, and this presentation of a lofty ensemble was not absent from the performance of Saturday. Therefore it seems just to award some of the laurels to our orchestra and to Mr. Paur. No one seems to bring out the meaning of Brahms quite so clearly as our present symphonic conductor does, every little sub-theme is heard, every abstruse bit of thematic development becomes intelligible under his leadership.

Joseffy has gained in breadth and sustained power during his period of hibernation, yet we found something yet lacking of the highest ideal in the first movement; it was not as broadly outlined, not as loftily classic as Brahms himself (a pianist not to be compared to Joseffy in execution) would have given it. But after this criticism is mute; the work went on in greater and greater vein until the dashing end was reached. The audience was thoroughly enraport with the pianist from the beginning, and each movement received bountiful applause. By the second movement the pianist was wholly absorbed in his work, and what there was of self-consciousness or of nervousness had wholly vanished. The entire romance of Brahms seems condensed into the slow movement of this concerto. In this movement the violoncello obligato was gloriously played and seemed to inspire the pianist, for he played with a romantic fervor that must have moved even the coldest auditor.

The finale was the crowning point of the performance; in this movement Joseffy seemed fairly to scintillate, and Brahms' brilliance with rhythms, his playful folk-song touches, were brought out in a way that excited everybody. The tremendous technical difficulties of the work had been more than overcome, they had revealed themselves as definite points of beauty. Those who find fault with Brahms as an abstruse builder of difficult movements may be referred to the following criticism of Beethoven's Sonatas Op. 10, as given in the "Allgemeine Musik-Zeitung" at the time of publication:—

"Learning, learning, learning! and not a bit of melody, not a bit of song. And when one examines it narrowly, it is merely crude and undigested learning, difficulty upon difficulty, merely for the sake of difficulty!"

All this sounds very like the essays of the anti-Brahmsites of the present. But on this occasion there seemed to be no anti-Brahmsites present, for the interest in the work was sustained and sincere, and at its end Joseffy received an ovation of which any pianist might be proud. Recall followed recall until the artist had marched on and off the stage more than half a dozen times. No musician has ever received a greater recognition. We are glad to note, however, that the rule regarding the profusion of encores was not relaxed; this would prove to be a dangerous gate to open even in such a case as this, and after all it was best to leave the great impression the work undisturbed by any small-

[illegible] the concert there was Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, [illegible] on the programme, and Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, which ended it. We have heard the Schubert symphony played with more elasticity and daintiness, but seldom with more clearness and surety. This melodic work never loses its charm; it can be placed beside the development of a Brahms or the grandeur of a Beethoven, as it was on this occasion, and its glory of melody, its beauty of contrast will still prove its sufficient raison d'etre.

Yet one cannot help speculating of what might have been had Schubert studied counterpoint. It may be remembered that almost the last act of Schubert's working days was to engage Sechter for contrapuntal lessons. It is one of the "Ifs" of musical history as to what the result would have been had he lived, and had these lessons been taken. Would he have rivalled Beethoven in the field of development? Development is the weakest point in Schubert's symphonies. We obtain the maximum of inspiration, the minimum of learned process, in Schubert's symphonies; it is just possible that an acquired skill in counterpoint might have made him distrust his bold and spontaneous flights of melody. There was once a peasant in Bavaria who could perform deftly the most delicate operations upon the eye; a scientific oculist became interested in him and caused him to be trained in the anatomy of the organ, but after he had attained his knowledge he no longer dared to perform any operations! After all Schubert was best as the most natural of the great masters, and we come nearer to the Fount of Inspiration in his works than in any other masterpieces whatsoever.

The horns of our orchestra seem to be improving apace; they have done some excellent work lately, and in this symphony they deserve especial mention.

Beethoven's "Egmont" overture closed the concert. It was performed with sufficient military ardor, and Freedom shrieked on the piccolo in the finale with a vigor that did credit to her lungs.

"Egmont" is one of those works which Beethoven wrote from his heart. He had in his nature as a vague ideal, universal brotherhood and universal liberty, and the "Heroic" symphony, the ninth symphony, and "Egmont" were all born of this ideal. It is perhaps fortunate that Beethoven knew nothing of the real Egmont as Motley has pictured him, but found his personification of heroism in Goethe's fictitious portrait. The picture of a national uprising and triumph as given in the Coda of this work is an inspiring affair, and it was brilliantly played at this concert. The violins did excellent work in this overture also; the incisive passage in which they ascend to four-lined C was a radical thing in the day that it was written, no orchestral composer of note had ever sent these instruments to such a height; it shows the orchestral advance of ninety years, that the passage is not considered very unusual, or abnormally difficult, today. Altogether the concert was an enjoyable one, although the chief honors went to the soloist.

Louis C. Elson.

MONDAY, JAN. 20, 1896.

BOSTON STANDARD.

The 12th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra—the completion of the first half of the season's work—was given Saturday evening. The program was as follows:

Unfinished symphony.....Schubert
Concerto No. 2, for pianoforte.....Brahms
Overture, "Egmont".....Beethoven

The feature of the evening was the marvellous work of the soloist, Mr. Rafael Joseffy, who made his first Boston appearance in six years, and received an ovation that is seldom accorded an artist in this city. His selection for the evening, the second concerto of Brahms, gave evidence of his nobility of purpose, and was proof of the artist's desire to appeal to the cultivated taste of his hearers. The concerto is not what may be termed a popular number—in the sense that it strikes a mixed company favorably—but to those whose knowledge of music of the best type and the highest art is ample, it is welcomed as one of the notable productions of the great master. Joseffy is a master of technique, and his reading is masterfully intelligent. When he left us six yars ago he was considered an artist of no mean ability. He returns to the concert hall a great artist, worthy of a place among the world's noblest pianists.

At the close of his effort, he was recalled again and again, there was one round of applause that continued more than two minutes. It was not mere hand clapping of a boisterous sort, it was a spontaneous manifestation of delight by one of the largest audiences of the season. Joseffy did not respond, with a solo, but contented himself with bowing his acknowledgments. It was an evening of distinct triumph for him.

The orchestral numbers were given in the superb manner that characterizes the work of Mr. Paur's associates, and the concert was thoroughly enjoyable.

There will be no concert or rehearsal this week. Saturday evening, Feb. 1, the second half of the season will be inaugurated, and the program will be a Goldmark symphony, a suite by Godard (first time) and Rubinstein's overture, "Dimitri Donskoi." Mme. Melba is to be the soloist.

Boston Courier.

MONDAY, JANUARY 20, 1896.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the twelfth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall, last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Schubert: Unfinished symphony in B minor.
Brahms: Pianoforte Concerto No. 2, in B-flat major, opus 83.
Beethoven: Overture to "Egmont," opus 84.
Mr. Rafael Joseffy was the pianist.

Schubert's unfinished symphony was carefully played, if, as it seemed to us, a thought heavily. Upon the whole, one's thorough enjoyment of this truncated symphony nowadays, especially of the second movement, is a good deal a matter of mood. Schubert often follows out the principles of musical form, notably of the sonata form, with an ingenuous simplicity, an unquestioning obedience to the letter of the law, that tend to give some of his symphonic movements an air of academic formality, singularly at variance with the essentially romantic character of his thematic material. The subdivision of the first movement of this symphony, for instance, into the regular, traditional periods—of first theme, second theme, conclusion theme, and subsidiaries—seems predetermined and cut-and-dried with almost schoolboy artlessness. Of cunning or subtile transition from one period to the next-following one, such as is found in Beethoven and Schumann, and at times even so far back as Mozart and Haydn, there is exceedingly little. It takes all the inherent poetry and lyric beauty of the themes themselves, all the ineffable charm of Schubert's modulations, to prevent the movement's making the impression of over-methodical primness. And, as for the second movement, one must be very much in the mood for it indeed not to find it pretty tedious.

Beethoven's "Egmont" overture was played as if with the intent of showing how much it could be made to sound like a cross between a Chopin nocturne and something funereal. Once more one felt like cursing Wagner's "Ueber das Dirigiren."

It was a great treat to hear Brahms's B-flat concerto again. True, the work is in one sense a monstrosity; in the same sense that Beethoven's great B-flat sonata, opus 106, is one; it is thoroughly an overgrown concerto, longer than many a modern symphony. Such enormously extended development essentially contradicts the "solistic" idea—to borrow a word of German coinage. But, overgrown though it be, the work is one of immense strength and beauty. In view of the extended development of each one of its four movements, it is astonishing how the composer has almost invariably preserved the true balance between the solo instrument and the orchestra and treated the pianoforte sympathetically according to its essential nature; only in the second movement, Allegro appassionato, does he seem to forget at moments for what instrument he is writing, and treat the pianoforte as he would an instrument of sustained tone. Taken as a whole, we should rank this concerto only with Brahms's greatest works.

Mr. Joseffy played it marvellously. Some time ago we predicted that pianists would some day solve the riddle of Brahms's pianoforte style, and find out the secret of making his pianoforte writing sound well. Paderewski soon came to fulfil this prediction of ours, and now he is joined by Mr. Joseffy. What Mr. Joseffy's magnificent technique did in the way of completely conquering the enormous difficulties of the pianoforte part, to the point of making light of them and causing all trace of them to vanish, can only be called marvellous. His invariably beautiful tone, his apparent perfect ease, the often dazzling beauty of the effects of color he produced, all showed plainly that these bristling technical difficulties with which Brahms has so plentifully bestrown his work are by no means so gratuitous and far-fetched as they were once thought to be. Play these hand-racking passages as Joseffy plays them and they are found to pay. It would take long to count up the tale of all the beauties of Mr. Joseffy's performance of the colossal composition. His playing of the opening measures reminded us of nothing more forcibly than of Rubinstein's playing of the first few measures of Beethoven's G major concerto: it was full of gracious poetry, but at the same time, how restrained and free from all groundless emotion! It was like a simple giving out the text. Something of this self-restraint in emotional expression went through almost the whole of his performance; only in the thrice-wonderful Andante did he allow himself to give full vent to the keenest poignancy of expression. His playing of this movement was something to be remembered for a lifetime. Mr. Schroeder's playing of the solo 'cello part was equally perfect in expressiveness and grace. In the last movement we felt at moments a certain longing for more of his whilom dash, brilliancy and animal vigor. But here, too, his playing was admirable. Upon the whole he played the great work—both technically and in the higher musical sense—like a consummate master. The audience felt it fully; seldom has such applause been bestowed upon a pianist at our symphony concerts.

The next programme is: Goldmark, symphony, "Ländliche Hochzeit;" Aria; MacDowell, suite No. 2, "Indian," opus 48; Aria; Rubinstein, overture to "Dimitri Donskoi." Mme. Melba will be the singer. Rehearsal and concert come respectively on Friday and Saturday, Jan. 31 and Feb. 1. There will be no rehearsal and concert this week.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 29, 1896.

The program of the twelfth Symphony concert last evening in Music Hall was as follows: Unfinished symphony in B minor, Schubert; concerto for piano, No. 2, B flat major, Brahms; overture to Egmont, Beethoven.

It was a great pleasure to welcome Mr. Joseffy again in Music Hall. His last appearance there with the Symphony Orchestra was February 22, 1890, when he played Liszt's second concerto. Mr. Joseffy then had a most enviable reputation as a pianist in this country and in Europe. But suddenly he disappeared from the concert stage. The causes given for his retreat are many, most of them, no doubt, legendary. Occasionally reports of marvelous improvement have been circulated. When he did return to the stage it was in Chicago last season.

Now, in the course of six years many pianists who at first dazzled at the zenith, are at the end faintly perceptible just above the horizon, or their light is quenched forever. If they retire early of their own accord and for rigid self-examination it sometimes happens that with constant study they grow distrustful of their ability; nervousness masters them; they dread the preparation for public performance and the ordeal itself; and so they are known in reality only by their intimate friends. Their names are no longer spells to conjure with. The amateur who never heard them shrugs his shoulders and says: "Yes, according to report X was a great pianist, Y was a master of technic, Z was a passionate creature. But, you know, there have been great changes in piano playing since they were famous. If they were to play now we probably should not think much of them."

It is a good thing, then, for his own fame and for the pleasure of the lovers of music that Mr. Joseffy has at last broken his silence.

* * *

His choice of a concerto shows the high purpose and the pure aim; for the second concerto of Brahms is not one to tickle the ear, stun the judgment and provoke cheap and boisterous applause. It was in 1859, in Leipsic, that Brahms first played his D minor concerto. It was at Vienna, December 26, 1880, that he first played the second concerto at a Philharmonic concert. And as the second symphony of Brahms is to the first, so is the second concerto of Brahms to the first. In each case, while the passion is less stormy, the thoughts are less crabbed and gnarled. Only in the first movement of the B flat major concerto does Brahms "keep up a terrible thinking." The second fascinates by its sturdiness and rhythmic capriciousness; the third movement is Brahms at his noblest, when his thought is as lofty and serenely beautiful as a summer sky at noon. And who can describe in words the enchanting, haunting delight of the finale—music like unto the perfect verse of a supreme poet whose imagination is kindled by wild or melancholy tales told him in youth by gypsy lips.

* * *

The performance of this concerto by Mr. Joseffy was the most admirable piano playing that has been heard in Music Hall for several years. This statement, made in tolerably cool blood, means much. And why this enthusiasm?

Mr. Joseffy realized first of all that the concerto is properly a symphony with the piano obligato. His instrument was only one of many.

At the start he seemed disposed to nervousness, but he quickly recovered himself, and then until the end a crescendo of admiration was the result, and the accompaniment of the crescendo of his ability.

While he still retains rare crispness of touch and clearness of technic (precision that is never metallic), his technic has broadened without a loss of delicacy and exquisiteness of tone. The hearer never thought of technic; he was absorbed in the music of the much abused instrument. Never was there a forced tone; never was there a reminder of strings, keys, hammers, sounding board and pedals. The piano itself under such hands confessed that after all it is a musical instrument.

In the phrasing there was no such attention paid to the coloring of a petty detail that the significance of the phrase in connection with the orchestra was lost. When the piano dominated, it was as a righteous master, not as a tyrant.

Add to a complete mastery of technic a temperament that found itself in full sympathy with the changing moods of Brahms; a sense of rhythm that was not rigidly expressed, but was as sure and fluent and unconscious as are the rhythms in nature; a feeling for nuances rather than for gaudy colors; and an entire absence of anything that was theatrical or spectacular.

He nothing common did, or mean,
Upon that memorable scene.

* * *

No wonder that the applause was spontaneous and long continued. No wonder that there were recalls without end. There was a glorious tribute to a display of uncommon art. There was the heartfelt gratitude at hearing again one of the very few great pianists of the world.

* * *

The orchestra played superbly throughout the concert. Solo work and ensemble were alike worthy of the highest praise.

PHILIP HALE.

[79]

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 20, 1896.

The Symphony Concert in Music Hall--Return of Joseffy.

It was not difficult to discern the cause of the especially large audience assembled in Music Hall on Saturday evening; it was a species of Prodigal Son coming back, or possibly the rightful heir returning to his heritage. For years the great pianist Joseffy has voluntarily left the concert-stage and eaten the husks of teaching and of Tarrytown; embassies besought him to return to public triumphs, in vain; only from the class-room came the gratifying word that he was a greater artist than ever, only a few favorite pupils were allowed to hear the pianist who had charmed thousands. After years of such oblivion the artist returns surprisingly developed, infinitely greater than before his self-imposed exile.

Once before, in the history of piano playing, a similar event took place; Henselt withdrew himself from public playing at a certain epoch of his career and devoted himself to teaching in St. Petersburg, finally emerging from his retirement a greater artist than ever. Joseffy has done the same; he left us a great virtuoso, he comes back a great musician. We are glad that he made his re-entree in Brahms' second concerto, a work which not only demands the greatest technical ability, but the broadest grasp of musicianship as well; had he played a Liszt or a Chopin concerto we should have recognized the old Joseffy, but in this work we were at once compelled to acknowledge something more. The true piano concerto is that in which the solo instrument is so interwoven with the orchestra that one cannot think of the forces as separated; a symphony with a thread of piano-work running through the warp and woof. Beethoven began such concertos with his works in G and E flat in this form, while in Chopin's two concertos one finds only beautiful piano thoughts with an obliging orchestra playing accompaniments in the background. Brahms has, in this concerto, merged his forces so that the pianist is obliged to share his triumph with the orchestra, so that a symphonic and not a solo impression is left upon the mind of the auditor; abnegation of self is the prime requisite of the soloist here.

We found this characteristic of the work beautifully evident when it was first given in Boston by Prof. Carl Baermann under Mr. Gericke some years ago, and this presentation of a lofty ensemble was not absent from the performance of Saturday. Therefore it seems just to award some of the laurels to our orchestra and to Mr. Paur. No one seems to bring out the meaning of Brahms quite so clearly as our present symphonic conductor does, every little sub-theme is heard, every abstruse bit of thematic development becomes intelligible under his leadership.

Joseffy has gained in breadth and sustained power during his period of hibernation, yet we found something yet lacking of the highest ideal in the first movement; it was not as broadly outlined, not as loftily classic as Brahms himself (a pianist not to be compared to Joseffy in execution) would have given it. But after this criticism is mute; the work went on in greater and greater vein until the dashing end was reached. The audience was thoroughly enraport with the pianist from the beginning, and each movement received bountiful applause. By the second movement the pianist was wholly absorbed in his work, and what there was of self-consciousness or of nervousness had wholly vanished. The entire romance of Brahms seems condensed into the slow movement of this concerto. In this movement the violoncello obligato was gloriously played and seemed to inspire the pianist, for he played with a romantic fervor that must have moved even the coldest auditor.

The finale was the crowning point of the performance; in this movement Joseffy seemed fairly to scintillate, and Brahms' dalliance with rhythms, his playful folk-song touches, were brought out in a way that excited everybody. The tremendous technical difficulties of the work had been more than overcome, they had revealed themselves as definite points of beauty. Those who find fault with Brahms as an abstruse builder of difficult movements may be referred to the following criticism of Beethoven's Sonatas Op. 10, as given in the "Allgemeine Musik-Zeitung" at the time of publication:—

"Learning, learning, learning! and not a bit of melody, not a bit of song. And when one examines it narrowly, it is merely crude and undigested learning, difficulty upon difficulty, merely for the sake of difficulty!"

All this sounds very like the essays of the anti-Brahmsites of the present. But on this occasion there seemed to be no anti-Brahmsites present, for the interest in the work was sustained and sincere, and at its end Joseffy received an ovation of which any pianist might be proud. Recall followed recall until the artist had marched on and off the stage more than half a dozen times. No musician has ever received a warmer recognition. We are glad to note, however, that the rule regarding the prohibition of encores was not relaxed; this might prove to be a dangerous gate to open even in such a case as this, and after all, it was best to leave the great impression of the work undisturbed by any small-

For the rest of the concert there was given Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, which began the programme, and Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, which ended it. We have heard the Schubert symphony played with more elasticity and daintiness, but seldom with more clearness and surety. This melodic work never loses its charm; it can be placed beside the development of a Brahms or the grandeur of a Beethoven, as it was on this occasion, and its glory of melody, its beauty of contrast will still prove its sufficient raison d'etre.

Yet one cannot help speculating of what might have been had Schubert studied counterpoint. It may be remembered that almost the last act of Schubert's working days was to engage Sechter for contrapuntal lessons. It is one of the "Ifs" of musical history as to what the result would have been had he lived, and had these lessons been taken. Would he have rivalled Beethoven in the field of development? Development is the weakest point in Schubert's symphonies. We obtain the maximum of inspiration, the minimum of learned process, in Schubert's symphonies; it is just possible that an acquired skill in counterpoint might have made him distrust his bold and spontaneous flights of melody. There was once a peasant in Bavaria who could perform deftly the most delicate operations upon the eye; a scientific oculist became interested in him and caused him to be trained in the anatomy of the organ, but after he had attained his knowledge he no longer dared to perform any operations! After all Schubert was best as the most natural of the great masters, and we come nearer to the Fount of Inspiration in his works than in any other masterpieces whatsoever.

The horns of our orchestra seem to be improving apace; they have done some excellent work lately, and in this symphony they deserve especial mention.

Beethoven's "Egmont" overture closed the concert. It was performed with sufficient military ardor, and Freedom shrieked on the piccolo in the finale with a vigor that did credit to her lungs.

"Egmont" is one of those works which Beethoven wrote from his heart. He had in his nature as a vague ideal, universal brotherhood and universal liberty, and the "Heroic" symphony, the ninth symphony, and "Egmont" were all born of this ideal. It is perhaps fortunate that Beethoven knew nothing of the real Egmont as Motley has pictured him, but found his personification of heroism in Goethe's fictitious portrait. The picture of a national uprising and triumph as given in the Coda of this work is an inspiring affair, and it was brilliantly played at this concert. The violins did excellent work in this overture also; the incisive passage in which they ascend to four-lined C was a radical thing in the day that it was written, no orchestral composer of note had ever sent these instruments to such a height; it shows the orchestral advance of ninety years, that the passage is not considered very unusual, or abnormally difficult, today. Altogether the concert was an enjoyable one, although the chief honors went to the soloist.

Louis C. Elson.

MONDAY, JAN. 20, 1896.

BOSTON STANDARD.

The 12th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra—the completion of the first half of the season's work—was given Saturday evening. The program was as follows:

Unfinished symphony.....Schubert
Concerto No. 2, for pianoforte.....Brahms
Overture, "Egmont".....Beethoven

The feature of the evening was the marvellous work of the soloist, Mr. Rafael Joseffy, who made his first Boston appearance in six years, and received an ovation that is seldom accorded an artist in this city. His selection for the evening, the second concerto of Brahms, gave evidence of his nobility of purpose, and was proof of the artist's desire to appeal to the cultivated taste of his hearers. The concerto is not what may be termed a popular number—in the sense that it strikes a mixed company favorably—but to those whose knowledge of music of the best type and the highest art is ample, it is welcomed as one of the notable productions of the great master. Joseffy is a master of technique, and his reading is masterfully intelligent. When he left us six yars ago he was considered an artist of no mean ability. He returns to the concert hall a great artist, worthy of a place among the world's noblest pianists.

At the close of his effort, he was recalled again and again, there was one round of applause that continued more than two minutes. It was not mere hand clapping of a boisterous sort, it was a spontaneous manifestation of delight by one of the largest audiences of the season. Joseffy did not respond, with a solo, but contented himself with bowing his acknowledgments. It was an evening of distinct triumph for him.

The orchestral numbers were given in the superb manner that characterizes the work of Mr. Paur's associates, and the concert was thoroughly enjoyable.

There will be no concert or rehearsal this week. Saturday evening, Feb. 1, the second half of the season will be inaugurated, and the program will be a Goldmark symphony, a suite by Godard (first time) and Rubinstein's overture, "Dimitri Donskoi." Mme. Melba is to be the soloist.

Boston Transcript
MONDAY, JANUARY 20, 1896.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the twelfth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall, last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Schubert: Unfinished symphony in B minor.
Brahms: Pianoforte Concerto No. 2, in B-flat major, opus 83.
Beethoven: Overture to "Egmont," opus 84.
Mr. Rafael Joseffy was the pianist.

Schubert's unfinished symphony was carefully played, if, as it seemed to us, a thought heavily. Upon the whole, one's thorough enjoyment of this truncated symphony nowadays, especially of the second movement, is a good deal a matter of mood. Schubert often follows out the principles of musical form, notably of the sonata form, with an ingenuous simplicity, an unquestioning obedience to the letter of the law, that tend to give some of his symphonic movements an air of academic formality, singularly at variance with the essentially romantic character of his thematic material. The subdivision of the first movement of this symphony, for instance, into the regular, traditional periods—of first theme, second theme, conclusion theme, and subsidiaries—seems predetermined and cut-and-dried with almost schoolboy artlessness. Of cunning or subtile transition from one period to the next-following one, such as is found in Beethoven and Schumann, and at times even so far back as Mozart and Haydn, there is exceedingly little. It takes all the inherent poetry and lyric beauty of the themes themselves, all the ineffable charm of Schubert's modulations, to prevent the movement's making the impression of over-methodical primness. And, as for the second movement, one must be very much in the mood for it indeed not to find it pretty tedious.

Beethoven's "Egmont" overture was played as if with the intent of showing how much it could be made to sound like a cross between a Chopin nocturne and something funereal. Once more one felt like cursing Wagner's "Ueber das Dirigiren."

It was a great treat to hear Brahms's B-flat concerto again. True, the work is in one sense a monstrosity; in the same sense that Beethoven's great B-flat sonata, opus 106, is one; it is thoroughly an overgrown concerto, longer than many a modern symphony. Such enormously extended development essentially contradicts the "solistic" idea—to borrow a word of German coinage. But, overgrown though it be, the work is one of immense strength and beauty. In view of the extended development of each one of its four movements, it is astonishing how the composer has almost invariably preserved the true balance between the solo instrument and the orchestra and treated the pianoforte sympathetically according to its essential nature; only in the second movement, Allegro appassionato, does he seem to forget at moments for what instrument he is writing, and treat the pianoforte as he would an instrument of sustained tone. Taken as a whole, we should rank this concerto only with Brahms's greatest works.

Mr. Joseffy played it marvellously. Some time ago we predicted that pianists would some day solve the riddle of Brahms's pianoforte style, and find out the secret of making his pianoforte writing sound well. Paderewski soon came to fulfil this prediction of ours, and now he is joined by Mr. Joseffy. What Mr. Joseffy's magnificent technique did in the way of completely conquering the enormous difficulties of the pianoforte part, to the point of making light of them and causing all trace of them to vanish, can only be called marvellous. His invariably beautiful tone, his apparent perfect ease, the often dazzling beauty of the effects of color he produced, all showed plainly that these bristling technical difficulties with which Brahms has so plentifully bestrown his work are by no means so gratuitous and far-fetched as they were once thought to be. Play these hand-racking passages as Joseffy plays them and they are found to pay. It would take long to count up the tale of all the beauties of Mr. Joseffy's performance of the colossal composition. His playing of the opening measures reminded us of nothing more forcibly than of Rubinstein's playing of the first few measures of Beethoven's G major concerto: it was full of gracious poetry, but at the same time, how restrained and free from all groundless emotion! It was like a simple giving out the text. Something of this self-restraint in emotional expression went through almost the whole of his performance; only in the thrice-wonderful Andante did he allow himself to give full vent to the keenest poignancy of expression. His playing of this movement was something to be remembered for a lifetime. Mr. Schroeder's playing of the solo 'cello part was equally perfect in expressiveness and grace. In the last movement we felt at moments a certain longing for more of his whilom dash, brilliancy and animal vigor. But here, too, his playing was admirable. Upon the whole he played the great work—both technically and in the higher musical sense—like a consummate master. The audience felt it fully; seldom has such applause been bestowed upon a pianist at our symphony concerts.

The next programme is: Goldmark, symphony, "Ländliche Hochzeit;" Aria; MacDowell, suite No. 2, "Indian," opus 48; Aria; Rubinstein, overture to "Dimitri Donskoi." Mme. Melba will be the singer. Rehearsal and concert come respectively on Friday and Saturday, Jan. 31 and Feb. 1. There will be no rehearsal and concert this week.

The Musical Courier.
NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 22, 1896.

The program of the twelfth Symphony concert last evening in Music Hall was as follows: Unfinished symphony in B minor, Schubert; concerto for piano, No. 2, B flat major, Brahms; overture to Egmont, Beethoven.

It was a great pleasure to welcome Mr. Joseffy again in Music Hall. His last appearance there with the Symphony Orchestra was February 22, 1890, when he played Liszt's second concerto. Mr. Joseffy then had a most enviable reputation as a pianist in this country and in Europe. But suddenly he disappeared from the concert stage. The causes given for his retreat are many, most of them, no doubt, legendary. Occasionally reports of marvelous improvement have been circulated. When he did return to the stage it was in Chicago last season.

Now, in the course of six years many pianists who at first dazzled at the zenith, are at the end faintly perceptible just above the horizon, or their light is quenched forever. If they retire early of their own accord and for rigid self-examination it sometimes happens that with constant study they grow distrustful of their ability; nervousness masters them; they dread the preparation for public performance and the ordeal itself; and so they are known in reality only by their intimate friends. Their names are no longer spells to conjure with. The amateur who never heard them shrugs his shoulders and says: "Yes, according to report X was a great pianist, Y was a master of technic, Z was a passionate creature. But, you know, there have been great changes in piano playing since they were famous. If they were to play now we probably should not think much of them."

It is a good thing, then, for his own fame and for the pleasure of the lovers of music that Mr. Joseffy has at last broken his silence.

* * *

His choice of a concerto shows the high purpose and the pure aim; for the second concerto of Brahms is not one to tickle the ear, stun the judgment and provoke cheap and boisterous applause. It was in 1859, in Leipsic, that Brahms first played his D minor concerto. It was at Vienna, December 26, 1880, that he first played the second concerto at a Philharmonic concert. And as the second symphony of Brahms is to the first, so is the second concerto of Brahms to the first. In each case, while the passion is less stormy, the thoughts are less crabbed and gnarled. Only in the first movement of the B flat major concerto does Brahms "keep up a terrible thinking." The second fascinates by its sturdiness and rhythmic capriciousness; the third movement is Brahms at his noblest, when his thought is as lofty and serenely beautiful as a summer sky at noon. And who can describe in words the enchanting, haunting delight of the finale—music like unto the perfect verse of a supreme poet whose imagination is kindled by wild or melancholy tales told him in youth by gypsy lips.

* * *

The performance of this concerto by Mr. Joseffy was the most admirable piano playing that has been heard in Music Hall for several years. This statement, made in tolerably cool blood, means much. And why this enthusiasm?

Mr. Joseffy realized first of all that the concerto is properly a symphony with the piano obligato. His instrument was only one of many.

At the start he seemed disposed to nervousness, but he quickly recovered himself, and then until the end a crescendo of admiration was the result, and the accompaniment of the crescendo of his ability.

While he still retains rare crispness of touch and clearness of technic (precision that is never metallic), his technic has broadened without a loss of delicacy and exquisiteness of tone. The hearer never thought of technic; he was absorbed in the music of the much abused instrument. Never was there a forced tone; never was there a reminder of strings, keys, hammers, sounding board and pedals. The piano itself under such hands confessed that after all it is a musical instrument.

In the phrasing there was no such attention paid to the coloring of a petty detail that the significance of the phrase in connection with the orchestra was lost. When the piano dominated, it was as a righteous master, not as a tyrant.

Add to a complete mastery of technic a temperament that found itself in full sympathy with the changing moods of Brahms; a sense of rhythm that was not rigidly expressed, but was as sure and fluent and unconscious as are the rhythms in nature; a feeling for nuances rather than for gaudy colors; and an entire absence of anything that was theatrical or spectacular.

He nothing common did, or mean,
Upon that memorable scene.

* * *

No wonder that the applause was spontaneous and long continued. No wonder that there were recalls without end. There was a glorious tribute to a display of uncommon art. There was the heartfelt gratitude at hearing again one of the very few great pianists of the world.

* * *

The orchestra played superbly throughout the concert. Solo work and ensemble were alike worthy of the highest praise.

PHILIP HALE.

THE MUSICAL AGE
CONDUCTED BY HARRY E. FREUND.
NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 15, 1896.

EMIL PAUR.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THE concerts given in this city by the Boston Symphony Orchestra are so highly appreciated by New York's cultured public that a few words about the career of that admirable organization may not prove out of place.

Thanks to the generosity of a music-loving citizen of Boston, actuated only by a desire to present good music in the best way, the idea was conceived in 1881 of a large permanent orchestra which should give each year an extended series of concerts in Music Hall, Boston, and make an occasional visit to the adjacent New England cities. The idea was acted upon and the Boston Symphony Orchestra thus began its existence. It had already given concerts during five seasons before it paid its first visit to New York. Since then a total of forty-two concerts have been given here—fifteen in Steinway Hall, fifteen in Chickering Hall, five in the Carnegie Music Hall, five in the Metropolitan Opera House, in regular series, with two extra concerts, one on the evening of Sunday, March 27, 1892, at the Metropolitan Opera House, given jointly with Paderewski in aid of the Washington Arch Fund, and the second at the Madison Square Garden Concert Hall on the evening of Monday, May 2d, of the same year, when d'Albert was the soloist.

Of the forty-two concerts mentioned, eleven were given under the leadership of Wilhelm Gericke, twenty-one under Nikisch, and ten under the leadership of the present conductor, Mr. Emil Paur.

Mr. Georg Henschel was the first conductor of the orchestra, and retained this position for three years, and on his retirement, in 1885, went to London, where he met with his usual success as a composer and teacher, and in a few years assumed the leadership of a large orchestra there, giving twelve concerts each year in St. James's Hall.

Mr. Henschel's successor was Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, who came from Vienna, and to this second leader can be attributed much of the wonderful precision and finish of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. After five years of untiring zeal and persistent striving for absolute perfection of ensemble, during which time he spared neither the orchestra nor himself, Mr. Gericke returned to Vienna.

The third and youngest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was Arthur Nikisch, a Hungarian, leader of the orchestra at the Stadt Theater, at Leipsic, the first opera house in that city. His reign was for four years, a year longer than that of Mr. Henschel, and a year less than Mr. Gericke. One thing the Boston Symphony Orchestra has always done for its conductors—it has given to them a greater renown than was theirs when they assumed control. Henschel, Gericke, and Nikisch must all own that a greater fame attended their return to Europe because of their association with America's first orchestra. Nikisch, on leaving Boston, was appointed director of the Royal Opera, and also conductor of the orchestra at Buda-Pesth, but has just accepted a more congenial position as the conductor of the Gewandhaus Concerts, in Leipsic, and the Berlin Philharmonic.

When Arthur Nikisch left the Stadt Theater, in Leipsic, to come to Boston he was succeeded by the same man who followed him as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the present leader, Mr. Emil Paur. It is also worthy of comment that Mr. Nikisch and Mr. Paur played at the same desk as first violinists under Mr. Gericke at the very same Stadt Theater several years before. Mr. Paur enters upon his third year with the orchestra this season.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give three more concerts at the Metropolitan Opera House. They will be on the evenings of January 23, February 27, and March 26. The soloists include Mme. Melba, Ben. Davis, and E. A. MacDowell.

Rafael Joseffy Reappears.

(Special to The Musical Age.)

PROVIDENCE, R. I., January 9, 1896.

AT the Symphony concert held last evening under the direction of Mr. Emil Paur, at Infantry Hall, there was great enthusiasm over the reappearance on the concert stage of Rafael Joseffy.

The programme was as follows:

Symphony No. 4, in E minor, Op. 98.....Johannes Brahms
I. Allegro non troppo (E minor).
II. Andante moderato (E major).
III. Allegro giocoso (C major).
IV. Chaconne. Allegro energico e passionato (E minor).

Concerto for Pianoforte and Orchestra, No. 2, in A major.....Franz Liszt
I. Adagio sostenuto assai (A major).
II. L'istesso tempo (D minor).
III. Allegro agitato assai (B-flat minor).
IV. Allegro moderato (E major and D-flat major, C).
V. Allegro deciso (D-flat major, i. e., C-sharp major).
VI. Marziale (A major).
VII. Stretto (A major, C).

Suite, "Namouna".....Edouard Lalo
I. Prelude: Andante (G major).
II. Serenade: Allegro (D minor).
III. Theme with Variations: Andante (E major).
IV. a. Market-day Shows: Allegro vivace (G minor).
b. Market-day Festival: Presto (E-flat major).

Mr. Joseffy gave a magnificent rendering of the Liszt concerto. S.

(Mr. Rafael Joseffy will be heard in Boston on Thursday and Friday of this week. THE MUSICAL AGE will publish a full account of both concerts by its special correspondent in Boston.—EDITOR.)

RAFAEL JOSEFFY'S engagements for the present are as follows:

With Boston Symphony Orchestra:
January 8th—Providence, R. I.
January 16th—Cambridge, Mass.
January 17th—Boston, Mass.
January 18th—Boston, Mass.
January 20th—Philadelphia, Pa.
January 21st—Washington, D. C.
January 22d—Baltimore, Md.
January 24th—Brooklyn, N. Y.

(From Our Special Correspondent.)

BOSTON, January 11th, 1896.

BOSTON has become devoutly symphonic this season, possibly remembering the proverb, "Si l'ou n'a pas ce qu'on aime il faut aimer ce qu'on a." We are apt to forget how provincial we are in the matter of opera, depending upon the crumbs which fall from the New York table for what little we get of this form of music, and think only upon the fact that we possess a magnificent orchestra. It matters not what programme is presented, Music Hall is always filled and the side aisles are crowded with standing auditors at each performance. At one time this crowding of the hall depended upon the soloist, and the orchestra might give the finest of instrumental works, so long as there was no soloist there would be a number of empty seats. How this has changed may be judged from the fact that a recent programme gave Bach, Mozart, Haydn, Handel and Beethoven as represented by his first (and very Haydnish) symphony, with no soloist save a few obligatos by Mr. Kneisel, and yet the usual crowd was present.

I state this fact emphatically because the impression has got abroad that interest is languishing in the symphony concerts, whereas exactly the opposite is the case.

As you probably know in New York, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is in superb condition at present as regards its technique and its material. Give it a little strengthening in the horns and the violas, add one or two contrabasses, and it will compare with any organization in the world. Yet we occasionally wince at the programmes; we have passed our pinafore period, and to feed us upon the gruel of Haydn when we crave the caviare of the modern Russian composers is rather tantalizing.

We do not care so greatly for the classical austerities, but are longing for the World, the Flesh, and the D—vorak novelties. Even the Bostonian is human and hankers after the beanpots—I mean the fleshpots of Egypt.

In the concert of Saturday, and the charity concert of Sunday, our orchestra played as seldom before. Mr. Paur has certainly brought the organization to a higher state of efficiency, a finer ensemble than it had even in the great days of Gericke. The volunteering of the whole orchestra and its leader, to play for the benefit of an afflicted comrade, deserves to be recognized, as well as the generosity of Paderewski noticed above, and the beneficence displayed stands out the more brilliantly when the attempts of certain artists to charge for their services (and charge roundly, too) is considered. Mr. Goldstein, or rather his family will be about $3,000 richer because of the concert, which was chiefly brought about by the efforts of Mr. Paur.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, JANUARY 26, 1896.

This leads us to the thought of Mr. MacDowell's new Suite, which was produced in New York by the Boston Symphony Orchestra the 23d. As Mr. MacDowell honors Boston by living and working here, it is a pity that his new work was not produced in this city.

Let us hear what the New York Tribune of the 24th had to say about the work:

"Mr. Paur devoted more than one-half of the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which was given in the Metropolitan Opera House last night, to Mr. E. A. MacDowell. It was an extraordinary proceeding and a more than extraordinary compliment to the young composer, but Mr. MacDowell is a luminous figure in American music, and the honor was well bestowed. The concert began with the 'Pathetic' symphony of Tschaikowsky and closed with Müller-Berghaus's transcription of Liszt's second Hungarian Rhapsody. Between these pieces Mr. MacDowell played his first pianoforte concerto, and the orchestra brought forward his second orchestral suite, which he calls 'Indian,' and is his forty-eighth numbered work. Last night's performance was the first that the suite has had in public; it is still in manuscript, but will soon be published by Brietkopf & Härtel, who recently published two other new orchestral works composed by Mr. MacDowell—two 'fragments,' as he calls them, entitled 'The Saracens' and 'Lovely Alda,' based on the 'Song of Roland.'

"Mr. MacDowell's Indian suite is so-called because it is based on themes borrowed from the songs of the American aborigines. It is, we believe, the first time that an effort has been made to utilize material of this character in a composition in the larger forms, and it is a pity that the score was not obtainable for a careful study of the themes and the manner of their use. As it is we are thrown upon the impressions left by a single hearing and a few hints which the composer and the annotator of the program have vouchsafed. Prefixed to the score is the following note:

"The thematic material of this work has been suggested for the most part by Indian melodies. Their occasional similarity to Northern European themes seems to the author a direct testimony in corroboration of the Thorfinnkarkefnis Saga. The opening theme of No. 3, for instance, is very similar to the presumably Russian one made use of by Rimsky-Korsakow in the third movement of his 'Antar' symphony.

"To this Mr. Apthorp adds the information that only three or four of the themes, which serve the purpose of counter-themes to the Indian melodies, are original with Mr. MacDowell; also that the first movement was suggested to the composer by T. B. Aldrich's Indian legend. 'Miantowona,' but that in it no attempt was made to follow the incidents of the poem. The third source of hints, which no matter how external they be, are still useful as starting points for the fancy of the listener, is in the time and expression designations prefixed to each movement. Here one might have expected from a musician so frankly devoted to program music as Mr. MacDowell, albeit program music of the sublimated kind, that he would have chosen some suggestive sub-titles as he did in the case of his first suite. But he has done nothing of the kind. The first movement is headed simply: 'With much dignity and character; legendlike,' then 'Twice as fast with decision;' the second, 'Softly, tenderly;' the third, 'With rough vigor, almost savagely;' the fourth, 'Dirgelike, mournfully;' the fifth, 'Swift and light.' Hidden in these directions there lies a suggestion of contrasted emotions which might enable one easily to construct a fanciful series of incidents with the help of the music, and we can but commend Mr. MacDowell for thus ingeniously avoiding a phase of descriptive music which tends to degrade the art and bring it into ridicule.

"The hearing enables us to add a few facts to the list derived from the composer and commentator. In the first movement two songs from the harvest festival of the Iroquois Indians are used; in the second a love song of the Iowas, a most soulful theme as harmonized and orchestrated by Mr. MacDowell, and containing—alas! that the Wise Men of the Boston press must now turn and rend the composer!—the Scotch snap in a most aggressive form. In the third movement the principal subject is a melody which figures in the legends of the Indians of the Atlantic coast. According to this legend, the song was heard by the Indians, as if it came from Heaven, a few years before the advent of the white man. It was reserved for high festivals because it was of celestial origin. It is the melody which also figures in the 'Antar' symphony of Rimsky Korsakow, and it would not require much of a flight of fancy to construct a theory like that hinted at by Mr. MacDowell in his note, namely, that the melody may have been acquired by the Indians from the companions of Thorfinn. This, however, scarcely explains its presence in the 'Antar' symphony of the Russian composer, who himself added to the confusion which must prevail on the subject by employing it in music designed to illustrate an Oriental story. Its first part might also be claimed by the Chinese—a fact which is reluctantly and prayerfully submitted to the mercies of the Wise Men. In the last movement the principal material is drawn from a women's dance and a war dance of the Iroquois.

"So much for the facts, historical and material. There is no time to discuss the suite as freely as it deserves. It is fascinating music, exhibiting a mastery in harmonization and instrumentation beyond anything that we can recall as American in origin, not excepting Mr. MacDowell's own symphonic poems, and imbued with a poetic mood of most singular and individual character. It held its own in a concert which was delightful from beginning to end, and which won fragrant guerdons for Mr. Paur, especially for the impetuous and truthfully dramatic reading of the Tschaikowsky symphony. Mr. MacDowell's merits as a pianist have received appreciative mention in these columns heretofore, and his first concerto is no novelty here. He was recalled to receive the thanks of the public after the suite."

It had been written by him—goes out of his way to sneer at the music critics of Boston. Thus does he relieve himself without injury to anybody. And yet is not this a shabby return for the many kindnesses shown Mr. Krehbiel by the men whom he now mocks?

When he lectured here on Wagner, coral, and all things knowable beside other things, these same critics paid him the courtesy of going to hear him. They paid him the far greater compliment of remaining until he was through and showing no outward symptoms of weariness of flesh or spirit.

[illegible] of Dvorak's [illegible] North American Negro, Scotch, [illegible] Bohemian, Irish, Hungarian Symphony, the critics could not honestly echo Mr. Krehbiel's frenetic admiration for the work. As Mr. Krehbiel had not prepared them by any lecture for the display of the proper emotion, they blindly and ignorantly wrote as they themselves thought. If they went wrong, it was all Mr. Krehbiel's fault. He should pity them, not revile them.

* * *

Mr. Huneker, in the Advertiser of the 24th, wrote as follows of the concert:

"It was MacDowell night at the Metropolitan Opera House last night. The occasion was the third concert of America's finest orchestra—the Boston Symphony Band. Mr. MacDowell, a native of this city, was represented by a new suite built on Indian themes and his first piano concerto. The concerto I first heard from Teresa Carreno in Chicago, in 1888. It is dedicated to the beautiful South American. It is a work written by its composer in his teens. It is vigorous, flowing, romantic and charming. Written under the influences of Grieg and Raff, the concerto has not the deep poetic content of the second concerto in D minor. The presto is an amazing bit of brilliancy. And it was delightfully played by the composer, who is a pianist of the first rank.

"The Indian suite I prefer discussing some other time. It made a profound impression, especially the slow movement and the last. The third—a scalp dance, or something like it—is a breezy piece of writing. At last we are treated to genuine American music, with roots plunged into aboriginal sources. Mr. MacDowell has frankly gone to the North American Indian, believing that there is the native stuff—and not in the negroid tunes of Dvorak.

"It all smells of the Gaelic and the Norse, and I can swear that Liszt heard the Indian theme—the principal one in the first movement of this suite. Rythmetically it is the first cousin to the principal motif of the E flat piano concerto.

"Mr. MacDowell enjoyed a triumph. The orchestra, under Mr. Paur's direction, played Tschaikowsky's Sixth Symphony, the B minor, and Liszt's Second Rhapsody. The playing was superlatively fine, although Mr. Paur lagged in the accompaniment to the concerto."

* * *

The Times of the same date said:

"We are all agreed that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is a perfect instrument. The only questions about its concerts are what the conductor chooses to play and how he plays it. Last night both questions were answered very satisfactorily. New York had the honor of being chosen for the first performance, from manuscript, of Mr. MacDowell's Indian Suite, and the composer also appeared as the soloist in his own first concert. The suite is even a more remarkable and brilliant work than its author's previous successes have justified us in expecting. The themes are, for the most part, actual, aboriginal melodies, and the work is thus full of local color. But the themes are also developed and joined with an impressive mastery of musical form, as well as of orchestral color, and the work is plainly predestined to become a great favorite in our concert rooms. At its close the composer was twice called out and forced to bow his acknowledgments. Doubtless the change in the program, Mr. Brahms's Fourth Symphony to Tschaikowsky's 'Pathetic,' was welcome to the great majority of concert-goers. It was admirably played by Mr. Paur, especially the third movement (allegro molto vivace) and the final adagio. But as a piece of orchestral virtuosity the last number, Liszt's Second Rhapsody, was the most surprising of all. Hackneyed as it is, it had all the air of a novelty in Mr. Paur's interpretation, which seemed, indeed, like an improvisation upon the orchestra, so individual was the conductor's version of it and so perfectly was it conveyed through the orchestra."

* * *

But the Sun said: "Mr. MacDowell's new suite, 'Indian' he calls it, followed the concerto, and was played from manuscript in a manner to fully and faithfully illustrate the composer's meaning, but—and it is a pity there should be any but—this music is exactly a case in point, and goes to show, when contrasted with Tschaikowsky's symphony, the difference between great talent and genius. Mr. MacDowell's suite evinces an exhaustive knowledge of composition, excellent judgment in the welding together of parts, an appreciation of effects, and all the excellent qualities that come from sincerity and a perfect fidelity to lofty purposes; but with all this it does not convince. It knocks vainly at the gates of immortality."

* * *

We shall doubtless have the pleasure of hearing Mr. MacDowell's new work. I confess that personally I do not care one whit whether his themes are Indian, Siberian, or from the Gold Coast. "What does he do with them?" that's the question. The music that from beginning to end is written with the purpose of exploiting a theory concerning folk-song will inevitably and easily find its way to oblivion.

Our composers are not Indians; our audiences are not Indians; our nationality is not Indian. Why this wild hurrah because Mr. MacDowell has used alleged Indian themes?

What hearer when he is moved by Beethoven's string quartet in E minor (op. 59, No. 2) remembers, or cares about if he does remember, the Russian theme introduced in the allegretto? The quartet is great because it is, for the most part, the music of Beethoven in his noblest vein.

So let us hope—and it is not likely that we shall be disappointed—that this suite of Mr. MacDowell is glorious music in spite of the alleged Indian themes which appeal so mightily to Mr. Krehbiel, an eminent folk-lorist who dallies with music.

PHILIP HALE.

[80]

THE MUSICAL AGE
CONDUCTED BY HARRY E. FREUND.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 15, 1896.

EMIL PAUR.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THE concerts given in this city by the Boston Symphony Orchestra are so highly appreciated by New York's cultured public that a few words about the career of that admirable organization may not prove out of place.

Thanks to the generosity of a music-loving citizen of Boston, actuated only by a desire to present good music in the best way, the idea was conceived in 1881 of a large permanent orchestra which should give each year an extended series of concerts in Music Hall, Boston, and make an occasional visit to the adjacent New England cities. The idea was acted upon and the Boston Symphony Orchestra thus began its existence. It had already given concerts during five seasons before it paid its first visit to New York. Since then a total of forty-two concerts have been given here—fifteen in Steinway Hall, fifteen in Chickering Hall, five in the Carnegie Music Hall, five in the Metropolitan Opera House, in regular series, with two extra concerts, one on the evening of Sunday, March 27, 1892, at the Metropolitan Opera House, given jointly with Paderewski in aid of the Washington Arch Fund, and the second at the Madison Square Garden Concert Hall on the evening of Monday, May 2d, of the same year, when d'Albert was the soloist.

Of the forty-two concerts mentioned, eleven were given under the leadership of Wilhelm Gericke, twenty-one under Nikisch, and ten under the leadership of the present conductor, Mr. Emil Paur.

Mr. Georg Henschel was the first conductor of the orchestra, and retained this position for three years, and on his retirement, in 1885, went to London, where he met with his usual success as a composer and teacher, and in a few years assumed the leadership of a large orchestra there, giving twelve concerts each year in St. James's Hall.

Mr. Henschel's successor was Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, who came from Vienna, and to this second leader can be attributed much of the wonderful precision and finish of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. After five years of untiring zeal and persistent striving for absolute perfection of ensemble, during which time he spared neither the orchestra nor himself, Mr. Gericke returned to Vienna.

The third and youngest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was Arthur Nikisch, a Hungarian, leader of the orchestra at the Stadt Theater, at Leipsic, the first opera house in that city. His reign was for four years, a year longer than that of Mr. Henschel, and a year less than Mr. Gericke. One thing the Boston Symphony Orchestra has always done for its conductors—it has given to them a greater renown than was theirs when they assumed control. Henschel, Gericke, and Nikisch must all own that a greater fame attended their return to Europe because of their association with America's first orchestra. Nikisch, on leaving Boston, was appointed director of the Royal Opera, and also conductor of the orchestra at Buda-Pesth, but has just accepted a more congenial position as the conductor of the Gewandhaus Concerts, in Leipsic, and the Berlin Philharmonic.

When Arthur Nikisch left the Stadt Theater, in Leipsic, to come to Boston he was succeeded by the same man who followed him as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the present leader, Mr. Emil Paur. It is also worthy of comment that Mr. Nikisch and Mr. Paur played at the same desk as first violinists under Mr. Gericke at the very same Stadt Theater several years before. Mr. Paur enters upon his third year with the orchestra this season.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give three more concerts at the Metropolitan Opera House. They will be on the evenings of January 23, February 27, and March 26. The soloists include Mme. Melba, Ben. Davis, and E. A. MacDowell.

Rafael Joseffy Reappears.

(Special to The Musical Age.)

PROVIDENCE, R. I., January 9, 1896.

AT the Symphony concert held last evening under the direction of Mr. Emil Paur, at Infantry Hall, there was great enthusiasm over the reappearance on the concert stage of Rafael Joseffy.

The programme was as follows:

Symphony No. 4, in E minor, Op. 98.....Johannes Brahms
I. Allegro non troppo (E minor).
II. Andante moderato (E major).
III. Allegro giocoso (C major).
IV. Chaconne. Allegro energico e passionato (E minor).
Concerto for Pianoforte and Orchestra, No. 2, in A major.....Franz Liszt
I. Adagio sostenuto assai (A major).
II. L'istesso tempo (D minor).
III. Allegro agitato assai (B-flat minor).
IV. Allegro moderato (E major and D-flat major, C).
V. Allegro deciso (D-flat major, i. e., C-sharp major).
VI. Marziale (A major).
VII. Stretto (A major, C).
Suite, "Namouna"..... Edouard Lalo
I. Prelude: Andante (G major).
II. Serenade: Allegro (D minor).
III. Theme with Variations: Andante (E major).
IV. a. Market-day Shows: Allegro vivace (G minor).
b. Market-day Festival: Presto (E-flat major).

Mr. Joseffy gave a magnificent rendering of the Liszt concerto. S.

(Mr. Rafael Joseffy will be heard in Boston on Thursday and Friday of this week. THE MUSICAL AGE will publish a full account of both concerts by its special correspondent in Boston.—EDITOR.)

RAFAEL JOSEFFY'S engagements for th present are as follows:

With Boston Symphony Orchestra:
January 8th—Providence, R. I.
January 16th—Cambridge, Mass.
January 17th—Boston, Mass.
January 18th—Boston, Mass.
January 20th—Philadelphia, Pa.
January 21st—Washington, D. C.
January 22d—Baltimore, Md.
January 24th—Brooklyn, N. Y.

(From Our Special Correspondent.)

BOSTON, January 11th, 1896.

BOSTON has become devoutly symphonic this season, possibly remembering the proverb, "Si l'ou n'a pas ce qu'on aime il faut aimer ce qu'on a." We are apt to forget how provincial we are in the matter of opera, depending upon the crumbs which fall from the New York table for what little we get of this form of music, and think only upon the fact that we possess a magnificent orchestra. It matters not what programme is presented, Music Hall is always filled and the side aisles are crowded with standing auditors at each performance. At one time this crowding of the hall depended upon the soloist, and the orchestra might give the finest of instrumental works, so long as there was no soloist there would be a number of empty seats. How this has changed may be judged from the fact that a recent programme gave Bach, Mozart, Haydn, Handel and Beethoven as represented by his first (and very Haydnish) symphony, with no soloist save a few obligatos by Mr. Kneisel, and yet the usual crowd was present.

I state this fact emphatically because the impression has got abroad that interest is languishing in the symphony concerts, whereas exactly the opposite is the case.

As you probably know in New York, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is in superb condition at present as regards its technique and its material. Give it a little strengthening in the horns and the violas, add one or two contrabasses, and it will compare with any organization in the world. Yet we occasionally wince at the programmes; we have passed our pinafore period, and to feed us upon the gruel of Haydn when we crave the caviare of the modern Russian composers is rather tantalizing.

We do not care so greatly for the classical austerities, but are longing for the World, the Flesh, and the D—vorak novelties. Even the Bostonian is human and hankers after the beanpots—I mean the fleshpots of Egypt.

In the concert of Saturday, and the charity concert of Sunday, our orchestra played as seldom before. Mr. Paur has certainly brought the organization to a higher state of efficiency, a finer ensemble than it had even in the great days of Gericke. The volunteering of the whole orchestra and its leader, to play for the benefit of an afflicted comrade, deserves to be recognized, as well as the generosity of Paderewski noticed above, and the beneficence displayed stands out the more brilliantly when the attempts of certain artists to charge for their services (and charge roundly, too) is considered. Mr. Goldstein, or rather his family will be about $3,000 richer because of the concert, which was chiefly brought about by the efforts of Mr. Paur.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, JANUARY 26, 1896.

This leads us to the thought of Mr. MacDowell's new Suite, which was produced in New York by the Boston Symphony Orchestra the 23d. As Mr. MacDowell honors Boston by living and working here, it is a pity that his new work was not produced in this city.

Let us hear what the New York Tribune of the 24th had to say about the work:

"Mr. Paur devoted more than one-half of the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which was given in the Metropolitan Opera House last night, to Mr. E. A. MacDowell. It was an extraordinary proceeding and a more than extraordinary compliment to the young composer, but Mr. MacDowell is a luminous figure in American music, and the honor was well bestowed. The concert began with the 'Pathetic' symphony of Tschaïkowsky and closed with Müller-Berghaus's transcription of Liszt's second Hungarian Rhapsody. Between these pieces Mr. MacDowell played his first pianoforte concerto, and the orchestra brought forward his second orchestral suite, which he calls 'Indian,' and is his forty-eighth numbered work. Last night's performance was the first that the suite has had in public; it is still in manuscript, but will soon be published by Brietkopf & Härtel, who recently published two other new orchestral works composed by Mr. MacDowell—two 'fragments,' as he calls them, entitled 'The Saracens' and 'Lovely Aldâ,'' based on the 'Song of Roland.'

"Mr. MacDowell's Indian suite is so-called because it is based on themes borrowed from the songs of the American aborigines. It is, we believe, the first time that an effort has been made to utilize material of this character in a composition in the larger forms, and it is a pity that the score was not obtainable for a careful study of the themes and the manner of their use. As it is we are thrown upon the impressions left by a single hearing and a few hints which the composer and the annotator of the program have vouchsafed. Prefixed to the score is the following note:

"The thematic material of this work has been suggested for the most part by Indian melodies. Their occasional similarity to Northern European themes seems to the author a direct testimony in corroboration of the Thorfinnkarkefnis Saga. The opening theme of No. 3, for instance, is very similar to the presumably Russian one made use of by Rimsky-Korsakow in the third movement of his 'Antar' symphony.

"To this Mr. Apthorp adds the information that only three or four of the themes, which serve the purpose of counter-themes to the Indian melodies, are original with Mr. MacDowell; also that the first movement was suggested to the composer by T. B. Aldrich's Indian legend. 'Miantowona,' but that in it no attempt was made to follow the incidents of the poem. The third source of hints, which no matter how external they be, are still useful as starting points for the fancy of the listener, is in the time and expression designations prefixed to each movement. Here one might have expected from a musician so frankly devoted to program music as Mr. MacDowell, albeit program music of the sublimated kind, that he would have chosen some suggestive sub-titles as he did in the case of his first suite. But he has done nothing of the kind. The first movement is headed simply: 'With much dignity and character; legendlike,' then 'Twice as fast with decision;' the second, 'Softly, tenderly;' the third, 'With rough vigor, almost savagely;' the fourth, 'Dirgelike, mournfully;' the fifth, 'Swift and light.' Hidden in these directions there lies a suggestion of contrasted emotions which might enable one easily to construct a fanciful series of incidents with the help of the music, and we can but commend Mr. MacDowell for thus ingeniously avoiding a phase of descriptive music which tends to degrade the art and bring it into ridicule.

"The hearing enables us to add a few facts to the list derived from the composer and commentator. In the first movement two songs from the harvest festival of the Iroquois Indians are used; in the second a love song of the Iowas, a most soulful theme as harmonized and orchestrated by Mr. MacDowell, and containing—alas! that the Wise Men of the Boston press must now turn and rend the composer!—the Scotch snap in a most aggressive form. In the third movement the principal subject is a melody which figures in the legends of the Indians of the Atlantic coast. According to this legend, the song was heard by the Indians, as if it came from Heaven, a few years before the advent of the white man. It was reserved for high festivals because it was of celestial origin. It is the melody which also figures in the 'Antar' symphony of Rimsky Korsakow, and it would not require much of a flight of fancy to construct a theory like that hinted at by Mr. MacDowell in his note, namely, that the melody may have been acquired by the Indians from the companions of Thorfinn. This, however, scarcely explains its presence in the 'Antar' symphony of the Russian composer, who himself added to the confusion which must prevail on the subject by employing it in music designed to illustrate an Oriental story. Its first part might also be claimed by the Chinese—a fact which is reluctantly and prayerfully submitted to the mercies of the Wise Men. In the last movement the principal material is drawn from a women's dance and a war dance of the Iroquois.

"So much for the facts, historical and material. There is no time to discuss the suite as freely as it deserves. It is fascinating music, exhibiting a mastery in harmonization and instrumentation beyond anything that we can recall as American in origin, not excepting Mr. MacDowell's own symphonic poems, and imbued with a poetic mood of most singular and individual character. It held its own in a concert which was delightful from beginning to end, and which won fragrant guerdons for Mr. Paur, especially for the impetuous and truthfully dramatic reading of the Tschaikowsky symphony. Mr. MacDowell's merits as a pianist have received appreciative mention in these columns heretofore, and his first concerto is no novelty here. He was recalled to receive the thanks of the public after the suite."

* * *

Mr. Huneker, in the Advertiser of the 24th, wrote as follows of the concert:

"It was MacDowell night at the Metropolitan Opera House last night. The occasion was the third concert of America's finest orchestra—the Boston Symphony Band. Mr. MacDowell, a native of this city, was represented by a new suite built on Indian themes and his first piano concerto. The concerto I first heard from Teresa Carreno in Chicago, in 1888. It is dedicated to the beautiful South American. It is a work written by its composer in his teens. It is vigorous, flowing, romantic and charming. Written under the influences of Grieg and Raff, the concerto has not the deep poetic content of the second concerto in D minor. The presto is an amazing bit of brilliancy. And it was delightfully played by the composer, who is a pianist of the first rank.

"The Indian suite I prefer discussing some other time. It made a profound impression, especially the slow movement and the last. The third—a scalp dance, or something like it—is a breezy piece of writing. At last we are treated to genuine American music, with roots plunged into aboriginal sources. Mr. MacDowell has frankly gone to the North American Indian, believing that there is the native stuff—and not in the negroid tunes of Dvorak.

"It all smells of the Gaelic and the Norse, and I can swear that Liszt heard the Indian theme—the principal one in the first movement of this suite. Rythmetically it is the first cousin to the principal motif of the E flat piano concerto.

"Mr. MacDowell enjoyed a triumph. The orchestra, under Mr. Paur's direction, played Tschaikowsky's Sixth Symphony, the B minor, and Liszt's Second Rhapsody. The playing was superlatively fine, although Mr. Paur lagged in the accompaniment to the concerto."

* * *

The Times of the same date said:

"We are all agreed that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is a perfect instrument. The only questions about its concerts are what the conductor chooses to play and how he plays it. Last night both questions were answered very satisfactorily. New York had the honor of being chosen for the first performance, from manuscript, of Mr. MacDowell's Indian Suite, and the composer also appeared as the soloist in his own first concert. The suite is even a more remarkable and brilliant work than its author's previous successes have justified us in expecting. The themes are, for the most part, actual, aboriginal melodies, and the work is thus full of local color. But the themes are also developed and joined with an impressive mastery of musical form, as well as of orchestral color, and the work is plainly predestined to become a great favorite in our concert rooms. At its close the composer was twice called out and forced to bow his acknowledgments. Doubtless the change in the program, Mr. Brahms's Fourth Symphony to Tschaikowsky's 'Pathetic,' was welcome to the great majority of concert-goers. It was admirably played by Mr. Paur, especially the third movement (allegro molto vivace) and the final adagio. But as a piece of orchestral virtuosity the last number, Liszt's Second Rhapsody, was the most surprising of all. Hackneyed as it is, it had all the air of a novelty in Mr. Paur's interpretation, which seemed, indeed, like an improvisation upon the orchestra, so individual was the conductor's version of it and so perfectly was it conveyed through the orchestra."

* * *

But the Sun said: "Mr. MacDowell's new suite, 'Indian' he calls it, followed the concerto, and was played from manuscript in a manner to fully and faithfully illustrate the composer's meaning, but—and it is a pity there should be any but—this music is exactly a case in point, and goes to show, when contrasted with Tschaikowsky's symphony, the difference between great talent and genius. Mr. MacDowell's suite evinces an exhaustive knowledge of composition, excellent judgment in the welding together of parts, an appreciation of effects, and all the excellent qualities that come from sincerity and a perfect fidelity to lofty purposes; but with all this it does not convince. It knocks vainly at the gates of immortality."

* * *

We shall doubtless have the pleasure of hearing Mr. MacDowell's new work. I confess that personally I do not care one whit whether his themes are Indian, Siberian, or from the Gold Coast. "What does he do with them?" that's the question. The music that from beginning to end is written with the purpose of exploiting a theory concerning folk-song will inevitably and easily find its way to oblivion.

Our composers are not Indians; our audiences are not Indians; our nationality is not Indian. Why this wild hurrah because Mr. MacDowell has used alleged Indian themes?

What hearer when he is moved by Beethoven's string quartet in E minor (op. 59, No. 2) remembers, or cares about if he does remember, the Russian theme introduced in the allegretto? The quartet is great because it is, for the most part, the music of Beethoven in his noblest vein.

So let us hope—and it is not likely that we shall be disappointed—that this suite of Mr. MacDowell is glorious music in spite of the alleged Indian themes which appeal so mightily to Mr. Krehbiel, an eminent folk-lorist who dallies with music.

PHILIP HALE.

it had been written by him—goes out of his way to sneer at the music critics of Boston. Thus does he relieve himself without injury to anybody. And yet is not this a shabby return for the many kindnesses shown Mr. Krehbiel by the men whom he now mocks?

When he lectured here on Wagner, coral, and all things knowable beside other things, these same critics paid him the courtesy of going to hear him. They paid him the far greater compliment of remaining until he was through and showing no outward symptoms of weariness of flesh or spirit.

[80]

The Brooklyn Citizen.
Nos. 397 to 403 FULTON ST.
Opposite the City Hall.
Receiving the Entire United Press Telegraphic Service.
Entered at the Brooklyn, N. Y., Post Office as second-class
SATURDAY, JANUARY 25.

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Last night the third concert of the season was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music, with Mr. Emil Paur as conductor, and Rafael Joseffy as soloist. One fact is manifest. Paur is a leader of almost limitless resources. There is no class nor form of musical structure, called composition, which presents any difficulties to him from the profoundest abstrusities of a Beethoven Sonata to the invigorating lilt of an Irish country fair. All is alike easy to him.

No attestatory evidence is needed to show the estimation in which his orchestral coterie hold him. They look at, smile upon him as though they both loved and trusted him. Such an orchestra, under such a leader, could not fail to produce the best results. The programme commenced with Beethoven's Symphony No. 3, in E-flat-major, "Eroica," op. 55; Allegro con brio (E-flat-major), Marcia funebre; Adagio assai (C-minor), scherzo; Allegro vivace (E-flat-major); Trio (E-flat-major); finale, Allegro molto (E-flat-major). This unrivalled production of an unapproachable master was handled with a power, toned down by delicacy of feeling and refinement, so that all who listened, were converted into enthusiasts, so admirable were the strings that not a scrape of an unruly hair could be detected. The power evoked in strident passages was for the number employed prodigious, so accurately were the men held together, and so firmly were they tied down to the various tempi, that one might almost be excused for imagining that it was one and not scores of instruments that were toyed with. The "Funeral March," in particular, was intensely sorrowful, almost heart-rending. The theme is given out in the violins with an accompaniment of plain chords on the other strings, a scoring amazingly effective.

The Liszt concerto for pianoforte and orchestra No. 2 (in A major), movements, 1, adagio sostenuto assai(A major); 2, l'istesso tempo (D minor); 3, allegro agitato assai (B flat minor); 4, allegro moderato (E major and D flat major); 5, allegro deciso (D flat major, i. e., C sharp major); 6, marziale (A major) stretto (A major c), with Joseffy as soloist, was perhaps the most vital production of the evening, for in this composition the wizard of all that is graceful in form shone out with conspicuous advantage with Joseffy as leading spirit. Such a reception as he received has rarely been witnessed before in this critical and perhaps phlegmatic city. Seven times was the romantic looking artist called before the audience. The people loved the orchestra and loved its music, but they wanted Joseffy alone. It was all of no avail, the perhaps too obdurate artist seemed disinclined to make an individual show of himself. It was in vain the people clapped and stamped or cheered or muttered; he was content to share his honors with his confreres.

In the third movement, where the cellos play such a conspicuous part to Joseffy's accompaniment, the applause became uproarious, and he arose from the piano like the true gentleman and artist that he is and bowed most respectfully, almost reverentially, to his cellists as an acknowledgment that the compliment was as much theirs as his. Joseffy has been hiding himself for some years; perhaps his brain had been a little overworked; his fingers never could be, for such a touch, such herculean power within a doll-like space, has never bee nheard, except, perhaps, by Paderewski, although he never indulges in any habits that are found in him or his imitators.

It would probably have resulted in making the receipts of last night's concert greatly diminished if a few disappointments which the audience were compelled to suffer had been intimated in the programmes which were published. One can be attributed to Joseffy's nonchalance to the thundrous applause he received at the conclusion of his work, which spoke louder and with greater emphasis than words could give that he was desired to be heard a second time not in conjunction with the orchestra, and it was strongly evidenced by the persistency of the applause that the auditors did not expect that so large-hearted and so enthused a player as Joseffy could so coldly refuse, but he did, and with more dignity than has been displayed by even greater celebrities. It is well that Paderewski proved himself more congenial or else the Brooklyn public would, after Joseffy's indifference to their wants, feel sorely vexed.

Was it that Joseffy did not reach that height of inspiration which he must needs feel to be able to comply to such powerful requests, or was it that the preceding effort had been too fatiguing? This is improbable, for a performer of such giant strength, which has ever proved itself inexhaustible. Perhaps he considered a Brooklyn audience unworthy of an extra exertion to delight them. No matter what the reason, it was an irreparable injury to a really deserving audience and one that was least expected. Their disappointment was enhanced by the announcement that the variations on the Austrian national hymn, by Haydn, would necessarily have to be omitted as the other numbers had consumed so much time. Perhaps if the omittance had been made in any other selection but Haydn's melodic and familiar theme, the audience would have been more easily persuaded to bear the disappointment, but as often as this number is programmed in orchestral concerts it never is heard more than it is wanted.

The quartet, which constitutes the second movement, is always a melodic treat, and arranged for the strings is beautifully sym-

Tschaikowsky's "1812" overture in E flat major, Opus 49, was played directly after this announcement was made and the warlike and inspiring harmonies with its startling climaxes and tempestuous scoring for the strings arrested the attention of the entire audience.

The fanfare which follows close on the majestic Russian theme which first presents itself in the opening largo movement, serves as a glowing coda to the entire work and suggests all the themes and part of their treatment which has preceded this triumphant close. The "Marsaillaise" hymn is ever prominent amid the whirlwind of the strings and wood-wind, which ever as it is about to return is swallowed up in an orchestral maelstrom, which the cornets and trumpets succeed in devouring. This is, perhaps, the greatest specimen of scoring for the purposee of bringing into prominencea full orchestra that Tschaikowsky has ever succeeded in doing and as played by an orchestra of Mr. Paur's management becomes a masterpiece of ensemble. Apart from Joseffy's rarity in performances and the inevitable omission of Haydn's "Austrian" hymn the concert was a success, the such of which even the most eminent organizations does not often expect.

There was not an available seat to be had in the large auditorium at 8 o'clock and never in the history of the Academy's existence and the great occasions that have been witnessed there, were the boxes so fully occupied and radiant with men and women.

The streets all around the building were thick with carriages, which were in readiness at 10:45 to convey the owner to their homes.

THE MAIL EXPRESS

NEW YORK JANUARY 24.

The Boston Symphony Orchestral Concert—Szumowska-Ondricek Recital.

The Boston Symphony concert last night at the Metropolitan Opera House attracted a good audience, many of whom, doubtless, were drawn by the announcement of the appearance of Mr. E. A. MacDowell as soloist, as well as by the fact that his Indian Suite for orchestra was to be performed for the first time. The programme opened with Tschaikowsky's gigantic "Symphonie Pathetique" in B minor. Herr Paur gave an enthusiastic reading of it, bringing out the joyless, hopeless characteristics of the first movement with skill and penetration, though not always with the authoritative and commanding strokes that would have been appropriate. The themes are worked over in so many variations, differing only in the slightest degree, that the symphony seems rather "spun out" and overlong for the number of ideas conveyed. But it is nevertheless a great work, and makes a deeper impression the oftener it is heard. The third movement, as played last night, sounded noisy, but the very tumult was picturesque and impressive. The finale, "Adagio lamentoso," was given with strong appreciation and dignity, and brought the symphony to the proper climax. The orchestra playing last night called for the warmest admiration. The extraordinary precision and the clean-cut perfection of the execution were delightful. In the first movement the sudden crash of every instrument after a single long-drawn tone was so absolutely simultaneous as to fairly startle the unwary.

It was a mistaken arrangement to place the MacDowell concerto No. 1 directly after the highly ornamented Tschaikowsky symphony. The cool northern atmosphere of his instrumentation and the clearly defined and graceful outlines of his music came with rather weak and inadequate effect after the heavily laden and highly decorated Slavonic measures of the symphony, and the piano part sounded almost thin. But Mr. MacDowell played with so much feeling and delicacy that the concerto was warmly received. It is hardly so stirring as his concerto No. 2, which he gave at a Philharmonic concert a year ago.

The Indian Suite for orchestra was interesting from beginning to end, the ingenious and unfailingly original touch of Mr. MacDowell's hand being always apparent. The suite was practically finished about four years ago, Mr. MacDowell having become interested in aboriginal melodies before the arrival here of Dr. Dvorak, and having pursued his own methods and inclinations, on what was then almost untrodden ground. The melodies in the suite are weird and haunting, and are proclaimed and afterward interwoven in a way that preserves their individuality and yet makes them the very warp and woof of the musical fabric. The second movement is perhaps less characteristic than the others, the climax of interest being reached in the fourth, which is a sort of dirge. The last movement, "swift and light," as the composer indicates, is almost too obviously savage and elementary. It fairly whoops, and one can almost see the paint and feathers obtruding themselves.

The Liszt Hungarian Rhapsody No. 2, scored by Karl Muller-Berghaus, ended an interesting and enjoyable concert.

[81]

THE BROOKLYN DAILY EAGLE—JANUARY 25,

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

There was another big audience in the Academy of Music last night, proving the wisdom of putting the concert course of the Boston Symphony orchestra under patronage of the Brooklyn institute. A usual newspaper expression, "It will be remembered," that the concerts did not pay last season, would not be right, because there were so few people at those concerts to remember it. And it is a great consolation that Brooklyn, rich, educated and populous Brooklyn, is not to be under the ban of Boston opinion because it can not or will not support five or six concerts of the same kind that Boston enjoys twice a week through half the year, never failing in crowded houses at each appearance of its magnificent orchestra. Much of the interest last evening centered in the reappearance of Rafael Joseffy, the pianist, who has been so long and unnecessarily absent from the concert stage. He was greeted with an almost wild enthusiasm, and was kept bowing his acknowledgments for a long time before the audience would allow him to play. Some misguided person or coterie of persons had prevailed on him to abstain from the number he had promised—a Liszt concerto—and to substitute the second concerto of Brahms. This is one of the scientific and prosy affairs that Brahms is so fond of writing. Perhaps it is the music of the future, just as Wagner's music, which was that of the future forty years ago, is now the music of the present. But if Brahms is to take the place of Wagner, let us be awfully sorry for the future. Brahms is a monument of misdirected energy. With a considerable spring of feeling and ability in grace, he deliberately suppresses these customary factors in music, and applies himself to the deliberate manufacture of harmonies—they are not always that—in which themes are subordinated to setting. If the setting were pleasant we should not object. Wagner's harmonies are magnificent, and they give power and beauty to melodies that in themselves are often slight, but Brahms is willing to be beautiful in nothing. He treats his art as some of the German philosophers treat wisdom and as one of the New York papers is said to treat virtue, making it cold and repellant. A man of fair constructive power can have a good deal of satisfaction at the key board by manufacturing harmonies and discovering key relations. It is a sort of twilight employment for some and of mathematical study for others. These changes are necessary in any important work. A song, like one of Stephen C. Foster's, that is based simply on the tonic, dominant and sub-dominant is bare and trite if it is transferred to the piano or orchestra. Harmonic variety is necessary to sustain interest. Such a change, for example, as one makes when he holds the G sharp in the key of E and, using it as A flat, sounds the chord of that note, is enlivening and as the masters use it the effect can be made as full of glory and surprise as a sunburst. The modulation by which Beethoven in the scherzo of the Seventh symphony changes from the key of D into the unrelated one of F major, is one of the most delicious in the whole of musical literature. But are these things all? Is music an affair of grammar and rhetoric, altogether? Is there to be only technic? Brahms appears to think so. Yet, the man's wulfulness in perversity! There is an andante in this long and mechanical concerto that is heavenly—in spots. Joseffy ought to have played that alone. The other three parts of the work are distinctly not his metier. And some in the audience could not but feel a sense of disappointment at the whole performance on the piano. The artist is at least as much of an artist as ever. His choice of this number showed that he was even more ambitious than he used to be. But he is no more fitted by temperament for this sort of music than William H. Crane is fitted to play Hamlet. Joseffy is a player of sentiment. He is a delightful interpreter of Chopin. There is nobody who can give a finer grace to Mendelssohn, or a daintier touch to Schubert, or reveal the heart of Schumann more clearly. He mistakes when he departs from his congenialities and gives us the cudgeling Brahms. He played easily and brilliantly, and in the one refreshing moment of the piece he exhibited the delicacy and tenderness that are the inherent and personal qualities of his art. He made himself admired for his technic, but how many of the multitude that applauded him so industriously, and had him out so often after he tried to get away, could place their hands on their hearts and solemnly swear that they liked the piece? In consequence of the length of this unwelcome number the variations on the Austrian hymn by Haydn were omitted. A man came out and announced as much. That left only two other names on the bill—Beethoven and Tschaikowsky. The "Heroic" symphony of the first was played with power rather than subtlety, but with undeniable dignity and beauty by Mr. Paur, whose reading discovered many little individualities that gave character to the performance, and that in no wise crossed the purpose of the composer. If we live to be hundreds of years old, all of us, we ought never to come to a time when a seasoning of such noble music will be amiss. Like all of the master works, it holds something of itself in reserve, and we are therefore always able to discover new meanings and new beauties in it. The fine temper of the string orchestra is especially well exhibited by this orchestra in its Beethoven playing. Then, as a windup, we had the "1812" overture of Tschaikowsky. This work has been heard hereabouts before, but only in a modified form. Last night it was played nearly as the composer wrote it, except that the cannon were mercifully omitted and their parts were played on the drum. There was perhaps a little bit of shrewdness in this selection. We are becoming very pert in these days in our talk and attitude to other nations, and this overture of battle was as a voice of the jingo spirit. Though it describes the retreat of Napoleon from Moscow, it equally describes any trouble in process of settlement with fire and steel and arms. It is not put forward as programme music, but it comes near it. You hear a prodigious thump on the drum: that is a mortar. A second later there is a crack on the cymbals: it is the shell bursting. You hear distant rumors of marches and charges and battle yells; you hear fragments of the "Marseillaise," always, however, drowned and suppressed by Russian airs; you hear the clangor of bells warning the people of Napoleon's advance, so that they may destroy their villages before him and leave him starving in the steppes in the dead of winter; you hear serener moments of song and dance, indicating the glee of the peasantry at the defeat of the invader, and in the last there is a wild pean of triumph as savage as the Tartar blood and mind could make it. The people who had been secretly depressed by the Brahms music roused at this and got their circulation going again. The next concert occurs on February 28.

THE [illegible] ADVERTISER, NEW YORK, FRIDAY JANUARY 24, 1896.

A DOUBLE TRIUMPH,

M'Dowell's Success as Soloist and Composer.

A BRILLIANT CONCERTO.

His Indian Suite Proves a New Musical Sensation.

ITS HARMONIC DRESS FRESH.

The Honors of the Evening Went to Him at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Concert.

The honors went to Edward Alexander McDowell—to the soloist and composer.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its third concert this season in the Metropolitan Opera House last evening. The fourth Brahm's symphony—the E minor—had been announced. For some reason or other Mr. Emil Pauer substituted Tschaikowsky's sixth symphony (B minor), which is known as the "Pathetic," by reason of its sombre and Ibsenic finale. The symphony itself is dull and mediocre, and the adagio lamentoso—which is beautiful, I admit—has the effect of a brass knocker on a pig stye. It is unconventional, but meaningless. Walter Damrosch gave it last year with quite as little success as attended it last night—and he read it better.

And so all the honors went to Mr. McDowell.

He played his own No. 1 concerto brilliantly, effectively, with sagacious emphasis. The work is not unfamiliar, and Mr. McDowell's good qualities as a pianist are also well known, so it fell out that one's interest centered in the suite for orchestra, which was read from the manuscript and heard for the first time. Entitled the "Indian" suite, it was suggested, one learns, by an Indian legend, which has been versified by Mr. T. B. Aldrich, a minor poet well known in Boston. Though it tells no particular story—Gott sei Dank!—the different movements describe with some definiteness episodes of Indian life. The first movement was a trifle disappointing. Even one who had never eaten dog in the tepee of the sachem felt that it was not especially indian. In the second movement, headed with delightful disdain for Italian, "softly, tenderly," one passed into the shadow of the forest primeval. I do not know whether that first gracious, wild and tender theme is Indian or not. Nor do I care. Life is too short and precious to spend eating dog in the tents of the Mohawks. I only know that it was wonderfully beautiful and developed with rare ingenuity. The rest does not matter—belongs, indeed, to what Matthew Arnold called the mint and annis and cummin school of criticism. The third movement of the suite, "with rough vigor, almost savagely," was conspicuously fantastic. I believe the composer associates it with a scalp dance. In any case, it reeks with wild and savage humor. It is whimsically instrumentated—the effect is Japanese. The dirge which follows is monotonous, weird, immensely strong. The final movement, "swift and light," equals the third in the strangeness of its fantasy and the freshness of its thematic beauty.

As I have said, I do not think the source of Mr. McDowell's inspiration is a matter of much moment. Here, certainly, is not the spirit which moved in Dr. Dvorak's "New World" symphony, and which his German admirers hailed as "American." The important fact is that this young New York composer has given us a new musical sensation. Here is a new beauty. Here is new cause for aesthetic satisfaction. These half-barbarous, nostalgic melodies haunt one. The harmonic dress is brilliant, savage and effective. Whether the suite be Indian or not, it is essentially original, essentially individual.

Music in New York has been so long the plaything of second-rate, expatriated Teutons, that Mr. McDowell's success is significant. So far as I know, he is the first American musician who has escaped the contagion of German platitude. There is no reason why music, here or anywhere else, should be national; there is every reason why it should exalt the natural impulse. Mr. McDowell is a protest against the second-rate Teutonism which has done so much to hinder musical progress in this country. In addition, he is a composer of fine accomplishment and finer promise, imaginative, individual, daring, inventive.

And last night he triumphed.

VANCE THOMPSON.

The Brooklyn Citizen.
Nos. 397 to 403 FULTON ST.
Opposite the City Hall.
Receiving the Entire United Press Telegraphic Service.
Entered at the Brooklyn, N. Y., Post Office as second-class
SATURDAY, JANUARY 25.

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Last night the third concert of the season was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music, with Mr. Emil Paur as conductor, and Rafael Joseffy as soloist. One fact is manifest. Paur is a leader of almost limitless resources. There is no class nor form of musical structure, called composition, which presents any difficulties to him from the profoundest abstrusities of a Beethoven Sonata to the invigorating lilt of an Irish country fair. All is alike easy to him.

No attestatory evidence is needed to show the estimation in which his orchestral coterie hold him. They look at, smile upon him as though they both loved and trusted him. Such an orchestra, under such a leader, could not fail to produce the best results. The programme commenced with Beethoven's Symphony No. 3, in E-flat-major, "Eroica," op. 55; Allegro con brio (E-flat-major), Marcia funebre; Adagio assai (C-minor), scherzo; Allegro vivace (E-flat-major); Trio (E-flat-major); finale, Allegro molto (E-flat-major). This unrivalled production of an unapproachable master was handled with a power, toned down by delicacy of feeling and refinement, so that all who listened, were converted into enthusiasts, so admirable were the strings that not a scrape of an unruly hair could be detected. The power evoked in strident passages was for the number employed prodigious, so accurately were the men held together, and so firmly were they tied down to the various tempi, that one might almost be excused for imagining that it was one and not scores of instruments that were toyed with. The "Funeral March," in particular, was intensely sorrowful, almost heart-rending. The theme is given out in the violins with an accompaniment of plain chords on the other strings, a scoring amazingly effective.

The Liszt concerto for pianoforte and orchestra No. 2 (in A major), movements, 1, adagio sostenuto assai(A major); 2, l'istesso tempo (D minor); 3, allegro agitato assai (B flat minor); 4, allegro moderato (E major and D flat major); 5, allegro deciso (D flat major, i. e., C sharp major); 6, marziale (A major) stretto (A major c), with Joseffy as soloist, was perhaps the most vital production of the evening, for in this composition the wizard of all that is graceful in form shone out with conspicuous advantage with Joseffy as leading spirit. Such a reception as he received has rarely been witnessed before in this critical and perhaps phlegmatic city. Seven times was the romantic looking artist called before the audience. The people loved the orchestra and loved its music, but they wanted Joseffy alone. It was all of no avail, the perhaps too obdurate artist seemed disinclined to make an individual show of himself. It was in vain the people clapped and stamped or cheered or muttered; he was content to share his honors with his confreres.

In the third movement, where the cellos play such a conspicuous part to Joseffy's accompaniment, the applause became uproarious, and he arose from the piano like the true gentleman and artist that he is and bowed most respectfully, almost reverentially, to his cellists as an acknowledgment that the compliment was as much theirs as his. Joseffy has been hiding himself for some years; perhaps his brain had been a little overworked; his fingers never could be, for such a touch, such herculean power within a doll-like space, has never bee nheard, except, perhaps, by Paderewski, although he never indulges in any habits that are found in him or his imitators.

It would probably have resulted in making the receipts of last night's concert greatly diminished if a few disappointments which the audience were compelled to suffer had been intimated in the programmes which were published. One can be attributed to Joseffy's nonchalance to the thundrous applause he received at the conclusion of his work, which spoke louder and with greater emphasis than words could give that he was desired to be heard a second time not in conjunction with the orchestra, and it was strongly evidenced by the persistency of the applause that the auditors did not expect that so large-hearted and so enthused a player as Joseffy could so coldly refuse, but he did, and with more dignity than has been displayed by even greater celebrities. It is well that Paderewski proved himself more congenial or else the Brooklyn public would, after Joseffy's indifference to their wants, feel sorely vexed.

Was it that Joseffy did not reach that height of inspiration which he must needs feel to be able to comply to such powerful requests, or was it that the preceding effort had been too fatiguing? This is improbable, for a performer of such giant strength, which has ever proved itself inexhaustible. Perhaps he considered a Brooklyn audience unworthy of an extra exertion to delight them. No matter what the reason, it was an irreparable injury to a really deserving audience and one that was least expected. Their disappointment was enhanced by the announcement that the variations on the Austrian national hymn, by Haydn, would necessarily have to be omitted as the other numbers had consumed so much time. Perhaps if the omittance had been made in any other selection but Haydn's melodic and familiar theme, the audience would have been more easily persuaded to bear the disappointment, but as often as this number is programmed in orchestral concerts it never is heard more than it is wanted.

The quartet, which constitutes the second movement, is always a melodic treat, and the scored for the strings is beautifully sym-

Tschaikowsky's "1812" overture in E flat major, Opus 49, was played directly after this announcement was made and the warlike and inspiring harmonies with its startling climaxes and tempestuous scoring for the strings arrested the attention of the entire audience.

The fanfare which follows close on the majestic Russian theme which first presents itself in the opening largo movement, serves as a glowing coda to the entire work and suggests all the themes and part of their treatment which has preceded this triumphant close. The "Marsaillaise" hymn is ever prominent amid the whirlwind of the strings and wood-wind, which ever as it is about to return is swallowed up in an orchestral maelstrom, which the cornets and trumpets succeed in devouring. This is, perhaps, the greatest specimen of scoring for the purposee of bringing into prominencea full orchestra that Tschaikowsky has ever succeeded in doing and as played by an orchestra of Mr. Paur's management becomes a masterpiece of ensemble. Apart from Joseffy's rarity in performances and the inevitable omission of Haydn's "Austrian" hymn the concert was a success, the such of which even the most eminent organizations does not often expect.

There was not an available seat to be had in the large auditorium at 8 o'clock and never in the history of the Academy's existence and the great occasions that have been witnessed there, were the boxes so fully occupied and radiant with men and women.

The streets all around the building were thick with carriages, which were in readiness at 10:45 to convey the owner to their homes.

THE MAIL EXPRESS
NEW YORK JANUARY 24.

The Boston Symphony Orchestral Concert—Szumowska-Ondricek Recital.

The Boston Symphony concert last night at the Metropolitan Opera House attracted a good audience, many of whom, doubtless, were drawn by the announcement of the appearance of Mr. E. A. MacDowell as soloist, as well as by the fact that his Indian Suite for orchestra was to be performed for the first time. The programme opened with Tschaikowsky's gigantic "Symphonie Pathetique" in B minor. Herr Paur gave an enthusiastic reading of it, bringing out the joyless, hopeless characteristics of the first movement with skill and penetration, though not always with the authoritative and commanding strokes that would have been appropriate. The themes are worked over in so many variations, differing only in the slightest degree, that the symphony seems rather "spun out" and overlong for the number of ideas conveyed. But it is nevertheless a great work, and makes a deeper impression the oftener it is heard. The third movement, as played last night, sounded noisy, but the very tumult was picturesque and impressive. The finale, "Adagio lamentoso," was given with strong appreciation and dignity, and brought the symphony to the proper climax. The orchestra playing last night called for the warmest admiration. The extraordinary precision and the clean-cut perfection of the execution were delightful. In the first movement the sudden crash of every instrument after a single long-drawn tone was so absolutely simultaneous as to fairly startle the unwary.

It was a mistaken arrangement to place the MacDowell concerto No. 1 directly after the highly ornamented Tschaikowsky symphony. The cool northern atmosphere of his instrumentation and the clearly defined and graceful outlines of his music came with rather weak and inadequate effect after the heavily laden and highly decorated Slavonic measures of the symphony, and the piano part sounded almost thin. But Mr. MacDowell played with so much feeling and delicacy that the concerto was warmly received. It is hardly so stirring as his concerto No. 2, which he gave at a Philharmonic concert a year ago.

The Indian Suite for orchestra was interesting from beginning to end, the ingenious and unfailingly original touch of Mr. MacDowell's hand being always apparent. The suite was practically finished about four years ago, Mr. MacDowell having become interested in aboriginal melodies before the arrival here of Dr. Dvorak, and having pursued his own methods and inclinations, on what was then almost untrodden ground. The melodies in the suite are weird and haunting, and are proclaimed and afterward interwoven in a way that preserves their individuality and yet makes them the very warp and woof of the musical fabric. The second movement is perhaps less characteristic than the others, the climax of interest being reached in the fourth, which is a sort of dirge. The last movement, "swift and light," as the composer indicates, is almost too obviously savage and elementary. It fairly whoops, and one can almost see the paint and feathers obtruding themselves.

The Liszt Hungarian Rhapsody No. 2, scored by Karl Muller-Berghaus, ended an interesting and enjoyable concert.

[81]

THE BROOKLYN DAILY EAGLE—JANUARY 25,

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

There was another big audience in the Academy of Music last night, proving the wisdom of putting the concert course of the Boston Symphony orchestra under patronage of the Brooklyn institute. A usual newspaper expression, "It will be remembered," that the concerts did not pay last season, would not be right, because there were so few people at those concerts to remember it. And it is a great consolation that Brooklyn, rich, educated and populous Brooklyn, is not to be under the ban of Boston opinion because it can not or will not support five or six concerts of the same kind that Boston enjoys twice a week through half the year, never failing in crowded houses at each appearance of its magnificent orchestra. Much of the interest last evening centered in the reappearance of Rafael Joseffy, the pianist, who has been so long and unnecessarily absent from the concert stage. He was greeted with an almost wild enthusiasm, and was kept bowing his acknowledgments for a long time before the audience would allow him to play. Some misguided person or coterie of persons had prevailed on him to abstain from the number he had promised—a Liszt concerto—and to substitute the second concerto of Brahms. This is one of the scientific and prosy affairs that Brahms is so fond of writing. Perhaps it is the music of the future, just as Wagner's music, which was that of the future forty years ago, is now the music of the present. But if Brahms is to take the place of Wagner, let us be awfully sorry for the future. Brahms is a monument of misdirected energy. With a considerable spring of feeling and ability in grace, he deliberately suppresses these customary factors in music, and applies himself to the deliberate manufacture of harmonies—they are not always that—in which themes are subordinated to setting. If the setting were pleasant we should not object. Wagner's harmonies are magnificent, and they give power and beauty to melodies that in themselves are often slight, but Brahms is willing to be beautiful in nothing. He treats his art as some of the German philosophers treat wisdom and as one of the New York papers is said to treat virtue, making it cold and repellant. A man of fair constructive power can have a good deal of satisfaction at the key board by manufacturing harmonies and discovering key relations. It is a sort of twilight employment for some and of mathematical study for others. These changes are necessary in any important work. A song, like one of Stephen C. Foster's, that is based simply on the tonic, dominant and sub-dominant is bare and trite if it is transferred to the piano or orchestra. Harmonic variety is necessary to sustain interest. Such a change, for example, as one makes when he holds the G sharp in the key of E and, using it as A flat, sounds the chord of that note, is enlivening and as the masters use it the effect can be made as full of glory and surprise as a sunburst. The modulation by which Beethoven in the scherzo of the Seventh symphony changes from the key of D into the unrelated one of F major, is one of the most delicious in the whole of musical literature. But are these things all? Is music an affair of grammar and rhetoric, altogether? Is there to be only technic? Brahms appears to think so. Yet, the man's wulfulness in perversity! There is an andante in this long and mechanical concerto that is heavenly—in spots. Joseffy ought to have played that alone. The other three parts of the work are distinctly not his metier. And some in the audience could not but feel a sense of disappointment at the whole performance on the piano. The artist is at least as much of an artist as ever. His choice of this number showed that he was even more ambitious than he used to be. But he is no more fitted by temperament for this sort of music than William H. Crane is fitted to play Hamlet. Joseffy is a player of sentiment. He is a delightful interpreter of Chopin. There is nobody who can give a finer grace to Mendelssohn, or a daintier touch to Schubert, or reveal the heart of Schumann more clearly. He mistakes when he departs from his congenialities and gives us the cudgeling Brahms. He played easily and brilliantly, and in the one refreshing moment of the piece he exhibited the delicacy and tenderness that are the inherent and personal qualities of his art. He made himself admired for his technic, but how many of the multitude that applauded him so industriously, and had him out so often after he tried to get away, could place their hands on their hearts and solemnly swear that they liked the piece? In consequence of the length of this unwelcome number the variations on the Austrian hymn by Haydn were omitted. A man came out and announced as much. That left only two other names on the bill—Beethoven and Tschaikowsky. The "Heroic" symphony of the first was played with power rather than subtlety, but with undeniable dignity and beauty by Mr. Paur, whose reading discovered many little individualities that gave character to the performance, and that in no wise crossed the purpose of the composer. If we live to be hundreds of years old, all of us, we ought never to come to a time when a seasoning of such noble music will be amiss. Like all of the master works, it holds something of itself in reserve, and we are therefore always able to discover new meanings and new beauties in it. The fine temper of the string orchestra is especially well exhibited by this orchestra in its Beethoven playing. Then, as a windup, we had the "1812" overture of Tschaikowsky. This work has been heard hereabouts before, but only in a modified form. Last night it was played nearly as the composer wrote it, except that the cannon were mercifully omitted and their parts were played on the drum. There was perhaps a little bit of shrewdness in this selection. We are becoming very pert in these days in our talk and attitude to other nations, and this overture of battle was as a voice of the jingo spirit. Though it describes the retreat of Napoleon from Moscow, it equally describes any trouble in process of settlement with fire and steel and arms. It is not put forward as programme music, but it comes near it. You hear a prodigious thump on the drum: that is a mortar. A second later there is a crack on the cymbals: it is the shell bursting. You hear distant rumors of marches and charges and battle yells; you hear fragments of the "Marseillaise," always, however, drowned and suppressed by Russian airs; you hear the clangor of bells warning the people of Napoleon's advance, so that they may destroy their villages before him and leave him starving in the steppes in the dead of winter; you hear serener moments of song and dance, indicating the glee of the peasantry at the defeat of the invader, and in the last there is a wild pean of triumph as savage as the Tartar blood and mind could make it. The people who had been secretly depressed by the Brahms music roused at this and got their circulation going again. The next concert occurs on February 28.

THE COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER, NEW YORK, FRIDAY JANUARY 24, 1896.

A DOUBLE TRIUMPH,

M'Dowell's Success as Soloist and Composer.

A BRILLIANT CONCERTO.

His Indian Suite Proves a New Musical Sensation.

ITS HARMONIC DRESS FRESH.

The Honors of the Evening Went to Him at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Concert.

The honors went to Edward Alexander McDowell—to the soloist and composer.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its third concert this season in the Metropolitan Opera House last evening. The fourth Brahms symphony—the E minor—had been announced. For some reason or other Mr. Emil Pauer substituted Tschaikowsky's sixth symphony (B minor), which is known as the "Pathetic," by reason of its sombre and Ibsenic finale. The symphony itself is dull and mediocre, and the adagio lamentoso—which is beautiful, I admit—has the effect of a brass knocker on a pig stye. It is unconventional, but meaningless. Walter Damrosch gave it last year with quite as little success as attended it last night—and he read it better.

And so all the honors went to Mr. McDowell.

He played his own No. 1 concerto brilliantly, effectively, with sagacious emphasis. The work is not unfamiliar, and Mr. McDowell's good qualities as a pianist are also well known, so it fell out that one's interest centered in the suite for orchestra, which was read from the manuscript and heard for the first time. Entitled the "Indian" suite, it was suggested, one learns, by an Indian legend, which has been versified by Mr. T. B. Aldrich, a minor poet well known in Boston. Though it tells no particular story—Gott sei Dank!—the different movements describe with some definiteness episodes of Indian life. The first movement was a trifle disappointing. Even one who had never eaten dog in the tepee of the sachem felt that it was not especially indian. In the second movement, headed with delightful disdain for Italian, "softly, tenderly," one passed into the shadow of the forest primeval. I do not know whether that first gracious, wild and tender theme is Indian or not. Nor do I care. Life is too short and precious to spend eating dog in the tents of the Mohawks. I only know that it was wonderfully beautiful and developed with rare ingenuity. The rest does not matter—belongs, indeed, to what Matthew Arnold called the mint and annis and cummin school of criticism. The third movement of the suite, "with rough vigor, almost savagely," was conspicuously fantastic. I believe the composer associates it with a scalp dance. In any case, it reeks with wild and savage humor. It is whimsically instrumentated—the effect is Japanese. The dirge which follows is monotonous, weird, immensely strong. The final movement, "swift and light," equals the third in the strangeness of its fantasy and the freshness of its thematic beauty.

As I have said, I do not think the source of Mr. McDowell's inspiration is a matter of much moment. Here, certainly, is not the spirit which moved in Dr. Dvorak's "New World" symphony, and which his German admirers hailed as "American." The important fact is that this young New York composer has given us a new musical sensation. Here is a new beauty. Here is new cause for aesthetic satisfaction. These half-barbarous, nostalgic melodies haunt one. The harmonic dress is brilliant, savage and effective. Whether the suite be Indian or not, it is essentially original, essentially individual.

Music in New York has been so long the plaything of second-rate, expatriated Teutons, that Mr. McDowell's success is significant. So far as I know, he is the first American musician who has escaped the contagion of German platitude. There is no reason why music, here or anywhere else, should be national; there is every reason why it should exalt the natural impulse. Mr. McDowell is a protest against the second-rate Teutonism which has done so much to hinder musical progress in this country. In addition, he is a composer of fine accomplishment and finer promise, imaginative, individual, daring, inventive.

And last night he triumphed.

VANCE THOMPSON.

The Evening Post.

New York, Friday, Jan. 24. 1896.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Not since it moved to the Metropolitan Opera-house has the Boston Symphony orchestra drawn such a large and interested audience as it did last evening; and if any one wondered what the special magnet was, his curiosity must have been gratified when he noted the cordial reception given to Mr. E. A. MacDowell and his six recalls after the performance of his first concerto and new Indian suite. There were two other interesting works on the programme, Liszt's second rhapsody and Tchaikovsky's Pathetic Symphony, which is not really one of his most inspired works, except in its last movement, which is aptly named adagio lamentoso, and the pathos of which is deepened by the fact that it was the great Russian's swan song. The Liszt rhapsody was technically well played, but in the matter of tempo changes Mr. Paur did not catch the true Magyar spirit. The Russian symphony, however, was admirably played, and so were the MacDowell pieces on the whole. Indeed, Mr. Paur has never before appeared to such advantage in New York as a conductor, and the audience was in consequence unusually animated, while the American composer, as already intimated, was especially favored with applause. New Yorkers who are interested in the future of American music are proud of the fact that Mr. MacDowell was born in this city, even if he does live in Boston.

How many of those who heard Mr. MacDowell play his first concerto last evening would have imagined that it was written when he was only nineteen? There are passages in it, especially in the cadenza of the first movement, which sound so mature that it seems hard to believe it, and which suggest the idea that it must have been retouched in later years. But this is not the case, as the score, which was published a year after its composition, shows. But then did not Mendelssohn write his "Midsummer Night's Dream" at seventeen, and Schubert his "Erl King" at eighteen? Musical genius is, like Kant's Ding an sich, independent of time and space. Not only is the piano part of the MacDowell concerto remarkably idiomatic, but the orchestration shows the hand of a born master. No wonder that Liszt, when he heard Mr. MacDowell play this concerto, immediately after a certain now prominent German pianist and composer had played one of his pieces for him, tapped the latter on the shoulder and told him he would have to make haste if he wanted to catch up with "the American." There is in this early concerto the brightness, the conciseness, the avoidance of commonplace and padding which place its author's works in refreshing contrast to the compositions of most of his contemporaries of either hemisphere. The second movement is especially remarkable for its broad melody and dreamy harmonic coloring. The third is necessarily a tribute to virtuosity, but not of the cheap kind. His performance of the concerto showed once more that if he wished to devote himself to the career of concert pianist, he could easily be in the first rank; for not only is his technique fascinating in its brilliancy, but he plays with a romantic spirit and a depth of expression that only a great composer has at command. But, after all, it is more important that he should devote himself to the task of building up an American school of music.

His Indian suite, which had its first performance anywhere last evening, is one of the building-stones for such a school, and a very big one. It is an attempt to do with Indian themes what Dvorák has done in the spirit of negro melodies in his "New World Symphony." And just as Dvorák based one of his movements on a poem by Longfellow, so Mr. MacDowell derived his inspiration partly from Aldrich's Indian legend, "Miantowona." And yet he has not imitated the Bohemian, for his suite was written a year or two before Dvorák's symphony. But he was not quite satisfied with it in its original form, and last summer he rewrote it at Vevey, so that it now stands as his latest and most mature orchestral work. Unfortunately the printed score has not yet arrived from Leipsic, so that our estimate of the suite must be based on last evening's performance.

When Dr. Dvorák wrote his "New World" symphony, he collected all the negro melodies he could find, and distilled their spirit without copying any one of them verbatim. Mr. MacDowell, on the other hand, took the themes of the red men bodily and made them the text of his musical commentary. Collections of Indian melodies have been published by Theodore Baker, Fillmore, and others. Fillmore's collection was not out four years ago, but use was made of Baker's material. Barring some rhythmic changes, the transcription is made faithfully; yet how differently these themes sound as transmuted by genius and developed orchestrally! Saint-Saëns once said very neatly that Liszt's rhapsodies were "civilized gypsy music." Adapting this expression, we might say that Mr. MacDowell's suite is civilized Indian music. But, after all, there is much more of the civilizer in it than of the Indian. He has often invented better themes of his own, but all the more must we admire the fine results obtained in this case with his rather unhealthy raw materials.

The suite is divided into five movements, short. The first has the headings, "With much dignity and character; legend-like. Twice as fast, with decision," this being the part suggested by Aldrich's poem. (Mr. MacDowell, by the way, has set some of Mr. Howells's poems to admirable music.) There are in this movement passages so exquisitely beautiful, so romantically colored, that one stops breathing in listening to them. The second, which may stand for an Indian love song, seems less inspired—possibly because Indians are not capable of loving romantically—Dr. Brinton and the poets to the contrary notwithstanding. The third has a very wild and woolly Western theme, and is carried out in the same frisky, savage spirit. It is a very odd fact that this theme, genuinely Indian, occurs in the Antar symphony of the Russian Rimsky-Korsakoff. "Dirge-like, mournfully," is the superscription of the fourth movement—words which concisely sum up its spirit. There is a slight suggestion here, not so much in the music as in the atmosphere, of Wagner's Amfortas music. The last part is headed "swift and light," and may be semi-officially considered a picture of Indian dancing and merry-making. There is a delightful Slavic élan (ausgelassenheit) to it. Indeed, the atmosphere of this whole suite is more Slavic than German, and we may perhaps find a hint in this fact as to the future of American music. Certainly the nervous, restless, mercurial Slavic temperament is more nearly allied to the American than the staid, solemn German temperament. Mr. MacDowell has absorbed all that is good in German music, but he travels his own road. There is perhaps no living composer whose music is so strikingly free from reminiscences. Much more might be said if space permitted, but we have room for only one more observation. It has been found that "Indians" on the operetta stage are always a failure; but Indian themes on the concert stage are, in this case at least, a decided success.

BROOKLYN TIMES.

JANUARY 25, 1896.

SYMPHONY CONCERT AND JOSEFFY.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra at the Academy of Music last night was very largely attended, and the audience was more than ordinarily demonstrative. There were present many friends of Mr. Joseffy, the pianist, who was the soloist of the evening, and the warmth of his reception was surely all that he could desire.

Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, No. 3, opened the concert, and the other numbers on the program announced were Liszt's concerto for piano and orchestra, No. 2; the variations on the Austrian national hymn by Haydn and Tschaikowsky's "1812" overture. A printed slip inserted in the programs stated that "in response to numerous requests" Mr. Joseffy would play the Brahams B flat concerto, No. 2, and an announcement from the stage during the concert made known the fact that owing to the length of the concerto, the variations on the Austrian hymn would be omitted. The changing of a concert number for any but an extraordinary cause is always inadvisable, and it approaches the reprehensible in the case of a concert of the artistic importance of those given by the orchestra. From an unbiased standpoint the change was not for the better, and it seemed to have been made out of deference to the wishes of some pupils or former pupils of Mr. Joseffy, who happened to be particularly interested in the Brahms work. This impression was borne out by the fervor of the applause which followed its performance, and the comments of some young people in the house.

It was stimulating to one's musical sensibilities to hear a Beethoven symphony for the first time this season. To be without them for a while seems to prepare the mind for a clearer and emphatic intimation of their serene majesty and to lend fresh interest to Wagner's declaration that beyond Beethoven absolute music could not go.

Mr. Joseffy has been in retirement for a few years, and the disposition of the audience indicated that much interest was felt in his reappearance. It would be straining a point to try to define wherein his playing is different from what it was when last heard here. He has been steadily engaged at teaching, and the formal elegance of his touch and execution implied that Joseffy the teacher had to a certain extent absorbed Joseffy the virtuoso. There is a beautiful finish and grace to his playing that must win the highest admiration. He was loudly applauded after each movement of the concerto, and had several recalls when he had finished. He was not inclined to respond to an encore, and repeatedly bowed his acknowledgment of the plaudits and the clapping did not cease until the piano was removed to the side of the stage. The Tschaikowsky overture is a tone picture based on the incident of Napoleon's invasion of Russia in 1812. It is a rushing, stirring composition with considerable brazen brass and cannon effects to illustrate the war incident, but the material is interesting and is handled with the skill of a master. It is a vigorous elucidation of the picturesque possibilities of music.

A word of praise is due the energetic policy of the Brooklyn institute in the management of the symphony concerts this season—a policy which has gained for these concerts the public attention they deserve.

YORK RECORDER.

JANUARY 24. 1896.

SYMPHONY'S THIRD TRIUMPH

Composer MacDowell Played One of His Pieces with the Orchestra.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Metropolitan Opera House last evening was rendered exceptionally interesting by the presence on its programme of not only two works of probably our foremost American composer, E. A. MacDowell, but by the performance of one, a piano concerto, by the composer himself.

The orchestra, under Mr. Paur of unmagnetic notoriety, did noble spirited and finished work. Mr. Paur is learning to join hands with his men, and the electric spirit brought to a climax in this finished body of musicians by Nikisch seems gradually diffusing itself through the well-regulated veins of its present conductor.

Replacing the Brahms E minor symphony advertised, Tschaikowsky's sixth and last symphony was played. New York has had it twice already by the Symphony Orchestra, but a superb performance like that of last evening made the work almost novel, and redeemed the Brahms disappointment. In the allegro con grazia 5-4 movement, the phrasing of the 'cellos was delightfully piquant and precise, something to be noted where the violins, always in prominence, were not quite so distinguished.

The bold barbaric march was superbly distinct in its sharp rhythm and fierce and bold in sonority and color. The last lamentoso movement, which justifies the pathetique title, was given with a sympathy and mournful smoothness which certainly owed its development to the improved indication of Mr. Paur's beat. Paur was always sharp in rhythm, but until last night did not show over strong faculty for the suaviter in modo.

MacDowell's concerto, smacking of Grieg in its first movements, and with a cello solo in the andante, which stands distinctly lovely in the work and is separably of melodic value, is fluent, suave and graceful rather than robust in aim. We say in aim because this gifted young man shows himself to be of the stuff who can achieve any aim he sets forth to obtain, if not by purely spontaneous, most certainly by intellectual means.

This was proved in his Suite No. 2 for orchestra, which displays a firm unity of style and a fine skill in instrumental color and combination when handling the themes—or supposed themes—of North American Indians, which gives the Suite its title "Indian."

A pianist and composer united make a lucky combination. MacDowell played the gracious fluent themes of his own concerto charmingly, and has a crisp, clean, clear incisive technic, with a poetic touch, which might do justice to the whole romantic school.

He had three big recalls after this work, and, indeed, on all scores as composer and pianist was enthusiastically received and acknowledged as he deserved.

He may not be in every instance a veritable poet born, this young man, but he has certainly an ardent imagination, and he has laid a grip on his material and in especial on orchestral power and variety which make him a man to be acclaimed.

The second dreamy movement of the suite was delicious, and the piquant rhythms of the third movement, representing clearly a scalp-dance most cleverly conceived. And MacDowell understands contrast within unity as does a master in this suite. The orchestra played it admirably, but was not so happy in the accompaniment to the concerto.

The programme closed with another blaring Liszt Rhapsody, the second.

For what section of the community was it? A large audience made MacDowell a central sun, and also showed the orchestra how well they thought of its noble labors, not forgetting Mr. Paur.

PHILADELPHIA TIMES.

JANUARY 21, 1896.

Academy of Music.

The interest of the third monthly concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra centered in the reappearance of Rafael Joseffy, who had not been heard here for five or six years and who confirmed the belief that in the recent long procession of pianists he is the most completely satisfying. Brahms' B flat major concerto is not a great solo work, the piano being treated as a member of the orchestra; but the piano part is strong and varied, and Joseffy's execution of it showed not only absolute mastery of technique, but a breadth and certainty of musical understanding, an unaffected dignity of style and a sentiment at once poetical and virile, that left nothing to be asked. Joseffy does not parade himself or his eccentricities; he simply plays the music, like a manly artist, and with the excellent performance of the orchestra he made the Brahms concerto consistently interesting and beautiful. The symphony which preceded it was Tschaikowsky's so-called "Pathetique," and the concert closed with Lalo's confusing "Namouna" suite.

THE STANDARD UNION.

WILLIAM BERRI. MURAT HALSTEAD.

SATURDAY EVENING, JAN. 25, 1896.

JOSEFFY'S PLAYING.

THE PIANIST APPEARS WITH THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Rafael Joseffy as the soloist, at the Academy of Music last evening, drew one of the largest audiences of the season. About all the musical people seemed to be present. These were doubtless attracted by the announcement of Joseffy's reappearance, for which persons learned in music have been clamoring for years. Those who had heard him years ago, when he first came to the country, and those who had never heard him, extended a cordial welcome, in which they were joined by Mr. Paur, Franz Kneisel, the first violin player of the orchestra, and some of the other musicians. Joseffy came on the stage after a superb rendering of Beethoven's "Heroic Symphony" by the orchestra. He was obliged to rise from his seat before the piano several times and bow before he could begin to play his number, Brahms' "Concerto in B flat major No. 2." Each movement was followed by enthusiastic applause, and at the close he was recalled five times, but there was no encore. Comparisons are said to be odious, but they are always made between pianists, and of late Joseffy has been compared with Paderewski. Their playing is as different as their appearance. Both are great, but both are great in different ways. Brahms is the dryest of composers, but Joseffy's exquisite playing made him delightful for once. The concert was brought to a brilliant close by Tschaikowsky's "Overture," 1812, during the playing of which the orchestra was reinforced by a full brass band and the tolling of bells. The fourth concert will be given Friday evening, Feb. 23.

THE PHILADELPHIA RECORD, TUESDAY

JANUARY 21, 1896.

Third Boston Symphony Concert.

The feature of the third Boston Symphony concert of the season at the Academy of Music last evening was Edouard Lalo's splendid suite, "Namouna." The distinctive peculiarity of this composition, arranged after his original ballet, is "its picturesquely odd instrumentation." It seems as if the composer had deliberately set to work to create a kaleidoscopic series of color effects. His queer grouping of trumpets and horns, of strings and harp, and, in fact, of all the instruments in the score, is absolutely unique and memorable. The climax is reached in the second movement, an allegro serenade in D minor, in which the blending of pizzicato strings and harps constitutes one of the most delightful musical novelties to which we have ever listened. Berlioz came near it, but did not exactly describe it, by styling the effect as that of "an enormous guitar." There was a characteristic splendor of style to the entire number. Of the Tschaikowsky "Pathetique" symphony (in B minor) we have already given our impression on its first performance in this city—if we remember rightly, by the New York Symphony Orchestra. It must be confessed, however, that a second hearing has given rise to a keener appreciation of the elaborate majesty of this solemn death-legacy, especially of the true threnody in the final adagio lamentoso. The sharp color contrasts bewilder and actually distress the auditors at first; a number of ladies were actually frightened, last night, by the abrupt outburst of drum and tam-tam after the pianissimo calm of the otherwise noisy first movement. But Director Paur brought out the true colors more impressively than Director Damrosch, and emphasized more poetically the sighing theme and the sobbing undertones. We predict that, despite its confused manner, this symphony will grow in popularity. The occasion was rendered doubly notable by the reappearance of Pianist Rafael Joseffy, and that virtuoso of the black and white keys was welcomed with a perfect ovation. The Brahms concerto in B-flat major was a very heavy, even if brilliantly written, composition, but it gave an admirable opportunity in its arpeggios and trills to reveal Joseffy's same old-time delicacy, which is his distinguishing peculiarity. The grace and tenderness of his silvery touch cannot fail to evoke admiration, and yet his warmth does not inspire like Paderewski's brilliancy. Joseffy's technique, however, admits no superior. It is a pleasure to know that he will be heard again at the Hinrichs concert at the Academy next Thursday evening.

[82]

PUBLIC LEDGER
PHILADELPHIA,
JANUARY 21, 1896.

Academy of Music—Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Sprigthly Kitty Clive once said of Garrick that with the aid of a magic hammer he could pound his ideas into the heads of any audience. Rafael Joseffy, who made his reentry at the Academy of Music last evening before a very large house, does not need to employ a magic hammer—for his work is cast in too refined a mould to suggest the gentle art of pounding—but he might be likened unto the happy possessor of a fairy-like wand with which many a pretty transformation can be produced. It is a wand that charms by virtue of its very daintiness, and which is yet, for all that, a badge of authority and distinction. For Joseffy is a pianist who is essentially a master of delicate effect, and whose feathery notes, sweetness of tone and brilliancy (a brilliancy that never becomes garrish or sensational), stamp him at once as an executant of rare taste and judgment. He may not dive into the depths of emotion, but he can conjure up, with that self-same magic wand, many a poetic suggestion,

He was heard last night in Brahm's No. 2 (B flat major) concerto, an impressive work wherein the performance of the soloist put an imaginative listener in mind of a series of graceful traceries inscribed upon a rather massive monument. The simile may not be remarkable, but it will perhaps serve to express the finesse of the player, as compared to the ponderous impression (the word is used in the best sense) left by certain portions of the purely orchestral score. In the first movement Joseffy was disappointing; he may have been slightly nervous and not altogether at his ease, but be that as it may, he soon manifested his old form and played the remaining movements, notably the andante and the allegro grazioso, with a charm that won the enthusiastic applause of the house.

The concert consisted, otherwise, of but two numbers, Tschaikowsky's Symphony, "Pathetique (No. 6, B minor, op. 74), and Lalo's "Namouna" suite, the latter a delightful composition, full of tonal color and graphic suggestion. The symphony of Tschaikowsky, the last the master ever wrote, is verily a swan song, with all the pathos of a farewell to the great world of music. A sympathetic Boston critic has written that "it seems like one long wail of grief and despair over lost illusions, hard-earned experience, that was not worth the earning, and the final knowledge that the wages of sin is death." One would think that never had such complete physical misery and mental wretchedness been so eloquently set to music before; whether we take that wondrous love-theme in the first movement—the saddest theme Tschaikowsky ever wrote, for it seems to tell of a youthful ardor and enthusiasm that have long since been burnt out, and are now doubly tragic, as the memory of something no longer possible—or the forced high spirits of the 5-4 second movement, or again the utter blackness of despair of the Finale:—whichever of these we take, it speaks of nothing but sorrow, desperation that cannot take to the sham-relief of irony, and is equally impotent to force itself to the calmness of resignation."

This may be an idealistic consideration of the work, and possibly attributes to Tschaikowsky more soulfulness than he put forth, but there is no denying the nobleness of the score. It was admirably played by the orchestra, with the aid of the sympathetic conductorship of Mr. Paur.

Next Saturday afternoon the orchestra gives a popular matinée, at which Madame Materna is to be the soloist. This will be the programme:

Beethoven.....Overture, "Egmont"
Wagner.
Vorspiel and Liebestod, from "Tristan and Isolde."
Tschaikowsky.....Overture, "1812"
Wagner.....Monologue from the Götterdämmerung
Saint-Saëns.....Danse Macabre"
Auber.....Overture, "Carlo Broschi"

NORTH AMERICAN
PHILADELPHIA,
JANUARY 21, 1896.

MUSIC AT THE ACADEMY.

Third Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Last Evening.

There was the usual crowded and brilliant audience at the Academy of Music last evening to hear the third concert for the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the forceful and intelligent direction of Mr. Emil Paur, but it may be doubted whether the performance gave the usual amount of pleasure. This was not the fault of the orchestra, which played superbly, but was due to the arrangement of the programme, which sadly lacked variety and relief. It only contained three numbers, but they were all long, all exacting in every kind of way, and all relatively unfamiliar.

The result was a strain upon the attention of the listener, which prolonged over a period of more than two hours, became wearisome, and even exhausting. Mr. Paur is a good conductor, but he doesn't know how to get up a really attractive programme. He ought to take some lessons from Theodore Thomas in the art—for it is an art—and learn to give the relief of contrast, and to offset the exactions of some arduous novelty by the familiar charms of some old favorite. He seems to think that all the people who attend his concerts are professional musicians. That is a mistake.

The two purely orchestral numbers last night were Tschaikowsky's B minor symphony, No. 6, the so-called "Pathetique," and a suite by Lalo. The symphony has been heard here before, but this was its first performance by the Boston orchestra. It is a gloomy, stormy, sombre work, saturated with the Slavonic sentiment, full of fire and fury, and yet adorned at times with a fascinating grace, not always coherent, and far from lucid, but always vigorous and vital, and distinguished in its utterance of a changeful but constantly passionate emotion by a singularly subtle and convincing eloquence. It was magnificently played, and made a deep impression. The Lalo suite is on an altogether different level. It is programme music pure and simple, but very brilliant and ingenious, and it served admirably to exhibit the virtuosity of the orchestra.

A pleasant feature of the concert was the reappearance, after an absence of five or six years, of Mr. Rafael Joseffy. He looked well and little changed, and received a most cordial welcome. His selection was Brahms' "Concerto No. 2" in B flat, a difficult and not very grateful work, in which the piano is treated rather as an obligato than as a solo instrument, and the performer is allowed little opportunity for personal display. Mr. Joseffy played it in a masterly manner. His style, without losing the beautiful delicacy which always distinguished it, has broadened since he was heard here last, and gained in strength, and his rendering of the concerto was thoroughly artistic and wholly satisfying.

The management announces a concert on next Saturday afternoon, with Mme. Materna as the soloist. The following will be the programme: Beethoven overture, "Egmont;" Wagner vorspiel and liebestod, from "Tristan and Isolde:" Tschaikowsky overture, "1812;" Wagner monologue from the "Gotterdammerung;" Saint-Saens "Danse Macabre," and Auber overture, "Carlo Broschi."

The Philadelphia Inquirer
TUESDAY - - - JANUARY 21, 1896

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

A Great Orchestra and a Famous Pianist at the Academy.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its third concert of the season at the Academy of Music last night. The following was the program:

Symphony No. 6, in B minor, "Pathetique," Peter Tschaikowsky.

Concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, in B flat major; Johannes Brahms.

Suite, "Namouna," Edouaurd Lalo.

Special interest was attached to the first and last numbers, from the fact that they were played for the first time at these concerts. The Tschaikowsky symphony, which was the last work of the composer, was published not long before his death. If, as has been said, clouds receive the configuration of the countries over which they travel, so it is no stretch of fancy to say that music gains a color, a vividness and a strength in harmony with the national characteristics of the land in which the composer has been born, or which he has made his home. There may not be a Slavonic, as there is an Italian, school of music, but only a Russian could have conceived the harmonies with which the Symphony Pathetique is filled. It differs from the traditional symphony in that its slow movement comes at last, instead of in the middle; it has about it an occasional monotony of rhythm, reminding one of the seemingly never-ending and barren steppes of Russia; but, like them, it has the sharpest of color contrasts; the phrases of the strings, although sombre, are warm; the harmonies from the horns and wood-winds swell and diminish in the most delicate gradations; each one of the movements is not merely symphonic, but dramatic and elaborately developed, and the slow movement with which the work ends is a solemn and impassioned threnody. Nothing could have exceeded the technical skill and wondrous art with which the orchestra pictured the bizarre effects and extravagance of harmony of the work. The playing of each performer was a piece of perfect realism, and by no possibility could it be imagined that the symphony would ever receive a clearer or more sympathetic exposition.

The "Namouna Suite" is of a directly opposite character; its sylvan beauty, sensuous coloring and rhythmic melody offering sharp and vivid contrasts to the strong and massive movements of the symphony. It was here where the light and airy touch of the orchestra was seen. Horns and harps, flutes and oboes, trumpets and trombones each mingled their brass themes with the tremolo of the strings, and the effect was inspiring and almost intoxicating. In the second movement, which is called a serenade, the strings played pizzicato throughout, while in the third movement—a theme with variations—the vivid contrasts in tone-color were pictured in the richest and daintiest fashion.

The Brahms concerto served to introduce Mr. Rafael Joseffy, pianist, who has not been heard here for at least six years. His technique is as perfect as ever. His playing is full of grace, delicacy and expression. He never thrills with broad and sweeping effects, but he is a cameo artist, a worker in musical ivory, and his tone-pictures are as perfect as a painting by Meissonier.

The New-York Times.
NEW-YORK, FRIDAY, JAN. 24, 1896.

We are all agreed that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is a perfect instrument. The only questions about its concerts are what the conductor chooses to play, and how he plays it. Last night both questions were answered very satisfactorily. New-York had the honor of being chosen for the first performance, from manuscript, of Mr. MacDowell's Indian Suite, and the composer also appeared as the soloist in his own first concert. The suite is even a more remarkable and brilliant work than its author's previous successes have justified us in expecting. The themes are for the most part actual, aboriginal melodies, and the work is thus full of local color. But the themes are also developed and joined with an impressive mastery of musical form, as well as of orchestral color, and the work is plainly predestined to become a great favorite in our concert rooms. At its close the composer was twice called out and forced to bow his acknowledgments. Doubtless the change in the programme, Mr. Brahms's Fourth Symphony to Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic," was welcome to the great majority of concertgoers. It was admirably played by M. Paur, especially the third movement (allegro molto vivace) and the final adagio. But as a piece of orchestral virtuosity the last number, Liszt's Second Rhapsody, was the most surprising of all. Hackneyed as it is, it had all the air of a novelty in M. Paur's interpretation, which seemed, indeed, like an improvisation upon the orchestra, so individual was the conductor's version of it and so perfectly was it conveyed through the orchestra.

THE JOURNAL.
W. R. HEARST.
162 NASSAU STREET, NEW YORK.
FRIDAY, JANUARY 24, 1896.

GRAND SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Boston Orchestra Again Heard at the Metropolitan.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at the Metropolitan Opera House last night before a large audience. Under the direction of Emil Paur, the orchestra opened with Symphony No. 6, in B minor, by Peter Tschaikowsky. It was rendered in excellent style, and evoked hearty applause.

E. A. MacDowell, the pianist and only soloist of the occasion, played first a concerto, then Suite No. 2 (Indian), which was performed for the first time. Beginning with dignity and character of a legend-like nature, the technique became faster and more decisive. Dying away softly, the theme rose again to an almost savage movement, fading to dirge-like, and ending with swift and light touches. It was a masterly performance, and deserved the liberal applause bestowed. The entertainment concluded with Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 2.

The Springfield Union
WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 29, 1896.

A RARE MUSICAL TREA

The Symphony Concert at City Hall Last Night.

BEETHOVEN AND WAGNER'S WORKS

The Program Was an Excellent One Brilliantly Executed, and the Audience Unusually Appreciative.

The combination of an orchestra composed of artists, and a program which included some of the best musical compositions ever writen was sufficient to attract a large audience of the music-loving people of the city and surrounding towns to city hall last night. The Boston Symphony orchestra was known by its work and reputation, and those who attended last night's concert expected to hear music of a high order rendered perfectly, and were not disappointed. This orchestra is without doubt the best of its kind in the country and is composed of men who are finished musicians. The program of seven numbers which was rendered last night included some of the best work of the master composers, arranged so as to furnish variety, without which a concert becomes monotonous. Too much of one kind of music, no matter how good, tires the hearer.

Last night's program opened with the overture to "Leonore" in C major by Beethoven, and closed with the overture to "Rienzi" by Wagner. While every number was excellent, the closing number was the better, and its grand finish was a brilliant closing of a successful concert.

The "Leonore" overture is a weird composition, with two destinct themes, worked out in dramatic passages and beautiful modulations which at times come with startling suddenness, all leading up to a tremendous climax with which the overture ends. The composition is one of the best of this favorite composer. Schubert's unfinished symphony in B minor, in the hands of the Symphony orchestra is a delightful number. Its theme is pleasing, though at times almost overshadowed by the subsidiary themes which are interwoven and play an important part in the movement. The main theme, however, is carried through from beginning to end though with changes of key.

The fourth number on the program, Volkmann's "Serenade," was a very defferent work from the numbers that preceded it, and one of the most enjoyable of the evening. The 'cello work of Alwin Schroeder was masterly. The compositions opens with a mournful recitative passage for the 'cello without accompaniment, followed by a four-part passage, which leads up to a tender melody which brightens the number and makes it thoroughly enjoyable.

Berlioz is not so well known to the average lover of music as some of the other composers, but the selections from his "Damnation of Faust," were greatly enjoyed. The "Waltz of Sylphs" was rendered with good effect. A sweet waltz melody runs through the composition. The harp effect is very pleasing. But the great number of the evening was the "Rienzi" overture. The work has several themes, all taken from the body of the opera, and worked out, and up, as only Wagner could do. The church-like harmonies, the terrific blasts of the brasses, the thunder of the drums, and the trumpet signals, work up to the grand finale.

Miss Gertude Franklin, the soloist, is a soprano with a very pleasing voice of good range, clear as a bell. Her one fault is her enunciation which is not as clear or perfect as could be wished. Her "Ave Maria" was delightful and the audience called her out half a dozen times, to smile her thanks. There were no enchores given, although the audience was persistent in demanding them. It may be that Springfield audiences are over-doing the enchore business, and that the refusal to respond last night by the soloists and the orchestra, was only in the line of just rebuke.

Emil Paur is a conductor who is well placed. He has surrounded himself with musicians who are capable of doing great works in a masterly way and the orchestra is fortunate in having so capable a man at its head. His command is remarkable and the orchestra responds to his demands with military promptness and precision.

The program follows:

Overture, "Leonore," No 3, C major, Beethoven
Scene, from "Taming of the Shrew," Goetz
Miss Gertrude Franklin.
Unfinished Symphony, B minor, Schub
Allegro moderato (B minor); Andante con moto (E major).
Serenade No 3 (D minor), op. 69. Volkm.
String orchestra; Alwin Schroeder, solo violoncello.
"Ave Maria," Gounod
(With violin obligato and harp accompaniment.)
Miss Franklin.
(a) Minuet of Will o' the Wisps, Berlioz
(b) Waltz of the Sylphs. Berlioz
(From "The Damnation of Faust.")
Overture, "Rienzi," Wagner

PHILADELPHIA PRESS
JANUARY 21, 1896.

JOSEFFY APPEARS IN CONCERT.

The Famous Pianist Heard at the Academy After an Absence of Years.

Rafael Joseffy, after an absence from the concert stage lasting six years, during which time he has been in a complete, not to say mysterious retirement, was heard with great pleasure at the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the Academy of Music, last evening. The pianist who is one of the great masters of the instrument, chose for his new debut, as it were, not a set effect of the nature of programme music which would allow him to take the house by the ears, but a concerto of the modern, No. 2 in B flat major, by Brahms, which put him to the test in the way of technique and expression. The effect was therefore not of unusual brilliancy, but of perfect command of the piano, and as regards the general interpretation, Joseffy gives you the feeling that difficulties are nothing, and that the meaning of the composer is before you in all its delicious beauty. The concert does not really arouse you until the andante is rendered, which movement not only has exquisite passages for the solo instrument, but is scored most effectively for the general orchestra. This and the fourth movement, allegro grazioso, were in every way delightful and Joseffy's part in the rendering called out the enthusiasm of the evening.

The general programme as arranged by M. Paur was excessively modern and had much the effect of a banquet that was all entrees. It opened with Tschaikowsky's Symphony No 6, in B Minor, "Pathetique," which with its variations of tone from the orchestral whisper to the blare and bluster of all the instruments in wild ensemble was an exceedingly characteristic piece of Slav music. Beginning thus with Tschaikowsky the programme concluded with Lalo's "Namorine" suite, an example of the French school, or rather the French school as affected by the great German, not forgetting Wagner. The themes, movements and treatment have some delightful characters with most interesting contrasts of instruments and complicated effects. The result of it all was that Brahms' Tschaikowsky and Lalo made a evening of the new and one that

THE BALTIMORE NEWS,
WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 22,

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Rafael Joseffy, the Pianist, to Appear As the Soloist.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's third concert for this season in Baltimore, at Music Hall tonight, will be an occasion of unusual interest on account of the reappearance of Rafael Joseffy, pianist, after several years' retirement from the platform.

Joseffy is preferred by many to Paderewski as having more warmth of expression. Joseffy was born in Miskolcz, Hungary, in 1853. Moscheles, in Leipzic, was his first teacher, and the equally well-known Tausig, his second. He became celebrated with but a single trip through Holland and Germany. On the occasion of his appearance in Vienna, a well-known critic said: "With equal force he produces the peculiar effects of the classic Bach, the tender Chopin, the sentimental Mendelssohn and the impetuous Liszt."

When Joseffy came to America it was with an already established reputation as one of the greatest pianists in the world. He made his first appearance this season with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its regular series of concerts at Providence, R. I., two weeks ago. The applause was prolonged, Mr. Joseffy being recalled five times.

Tonight's concert will be the Orchestra's 1354th. The programme will be as follows:

Beethoven, Symphony No. 3, "Eroica;" Brahms, Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 2; Berlioz, a, Minuet of Will-o'-the-Wisps; b, Waltz of Sylphs; from "The Damnation of Faust;" Beethoven, Overture, "Egmont."

Prof. Richard Burmeister of the Peabody will give a dinner to Rafael Joseffy, the Kneisel Quartette and Mr. Emil Pauer tonight after the concert. The dinner will be given at his home, 918 North Calvert street.

[83]

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 29, 1896.

Boston's prime orchestra introduced at its concert last Thursday night Edward Alexander MacDowell's (a sturdy name for you) second orchestral suite, Indian, the thematic material of which is based on authentic North American Indian melodies. Mr. Apthorp, in his program notes, declares that only three or four of the themes are Mr. MacDowell's own, "and these sprang up in his mind more as opposite counter themes to the Indian melodies than as independent themes in themselves."

The results of MacDowell's vacation abroad last summer are doubtless given us, although the suite was written four years ago, several seasons before Dr. Dvorák composed his so-called American Symphony, the fifth in E minor, which is based on negro airs and several Indian melodies.

This new suite is as American as we can hope for, at least for half a century. The composer has gone to the coarse haired aborigines for his themes, and, while the music has a Gaelic and Norse flavor, it must be called American—Indian-American. The theme of the third movement of the suite resembles a theme employed by Rimsky-Korsakoff in his Antar symphony—that Antar, child of the desert, glorified by Lamartine.

Mr. MacDowell avoids a program, but acknowledges having won suggestions from T. B. Aldrich's Indian legend, Miantowna. The dirge—the fourth number—is a remarkably original treatment of the subject. Indeed the suite is a revelation of the composer's advance. His handling of the orchestra is masterly, and it is no exaggeration to write that his music held its own on a program with the name of Tschaikowsky leading.

The last movement of the suite is a vivid picture—and I hate being pinned down to a musical synopsis—of wild merrymaking. You can see the red and painted devils dancing with many strange shoutings around their tepees.

Best of all is the fact that it is all good music. It is MacDowell's forty-eighth work. His first piano concerto, charming and clever as it is, and written when he was nineteen, is interesting as a comparative study. Numbered opus 15, the enormous advance in the technical treatment of the orchestra could readily be judged on account of the juxtaposition of the youthful and mature compositions. I pin my faith to MacDowell. He is the hope of our country, and I long for that first symphony which he composed in Switzerland last summer—a most memorable summer, I imagine.

* * *

The sixth symphony of Tschaikowsky has never allured me as have the fourth and fifth, in F and E minor. It does not seem to hang together; it suggests the suite, not the symphony. The last movement—the adagio lamentoso—is the best, and its second theme, the broad cantabile, unmistakably suggests the beautiful slow movement in D of the fifth symphony. The first allegro has a sugary, Mendelssohnian quality, and then those two middle movements, are they not trivial—the one which has that Raffish march? No, Tschaikowsky has little new to say in his last work, but he says it supremely well. The symphony, if symphony it be, lacks homogeneity. The last adagio, however, is noble and impressive—a marked mood of musical melancholy.

* * *

The man who first remarked that comparisons are odious must have been bow-legged mentally. He feared comparisons. Big people do not. Therefore, if I speak of Rafael Joseffy's exquisite art, that great pianist need not be put on a lonely pedestal, for he can court comparisons with Paderewski, d'Albert, De Pachmann, Rosenthal, Menter, Bloomfield Zeisler, Sauer, Siloti, Reisenauer, Friedheim, or any of the new gods of the keyboard. Not only may his marvelous work be set up as an exemplar for all other artists, but he leads the list for the reason that he possesses qualities that are unique to-day in the world of piano playing.

With several passionate pilgrims I journeyed to Brooklyn last Friday night to hear Joseffy play Liszt's greatest concerto—the one in A. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Mr. Paur, was giving a concert at the Academy of Music in the City of Churches and Sunday thirst, and as Joseffy had not played in New York State for about six years it was with febrile pulse that his old admirers flocked across the bridge. He did not play the Liszt, but the second Brahms concerto in B flat. He was pale when he came out upon the platform and doubtlessly nervous. He looked the same Joseffy of fifteen years ago. Age has dealt leniently with him. There is the same characteristic pose of the head—the medallion-like profile, the brows more serene and intellectually stronger. His hands—those wonderful white paws of velvet, as an enthusiastic girl called them—were placed upon the keyboard with the same caressing attack. It was Rafael Joseffy, beloved of Apollo, god of music, yet spared to us.

* * *

He is the greatest classical pianist alive. Observe I do not bracket his name with another. In the externals of his art he stands alone, as did Karl Tausig, his master. He is the great pupil of a great teacher. He has spoken to me of Tausig, Tausig who painted a perfect picture of a composition and hung it upon the wall of your memory, there to remain forever. I thought of this as I listened to Joseffy's playing. It is so Hellenic, so aristocratic, so distinguished, so noble, calm and satisfying that my mind reverted naturally to Greek art. Great, serene sculptural images, full of that serenity that comes of perfect equipoise of temperament, yet full of the blitheness Goethe speaks of in his Italian Journey. "Heiterkeit," Winkelmann called it. Joseffy's art is so human, not so warm, not passionate, not multicolored as the vital, startling art of Paderewski. Paderewski has the dramatic accent, Joseffy has not. The latter is austere, a trifle chilly, detached and more remote. It is objective art. Paderewski is violently subjective. Paderewski forces you to regard his personality. He overflows every bar of music with it. He looms largely in the foreground of your consciousness. He is ever present, a rich, beneficent nature. He overshadows the music he plays. Joseffy retreats in the background. He makes for the idea of beauty. Every note is beautiful of itself. Every group is carved with cunning touches. It is the art of the cameo of the master miniaturist.

But where, ten years ago, there was merely a deliciously molded shell, now we get a rich kernel. Joseffy has lived and suffered. He has grown richer in feeling, yet no tragic hint does he impart in his playing, no tale of sorrow. As if he said: "What has Hecuba to do with music?" he sternly represses all personal utterance of feeling. Where Paderewski is bold, free, outspoken, Joseffy is contained, reticent, proudly poetic and understands the tact of omission.

* * *

As might be expected, his playing is largely a matter of nuance, he is a master of the linear. Paderewski's palette glows with golden hues, Joseffy paints in sober, pearly grays, exquisite blendings of half-expressed tints, palimpsests of tone. His technic is the last word in technic. In this he outrivals Rosenthal or the crafty Chopinzee—De Pachmann.

If I must criticise his work it is for the lack of dynamic weight. From Tausig, Joseffy learned the lesson of clarity and tonal balance. He never forces the tone and his chord playing, deficient in actual depth, is clean cut and just.

His rhythms are spiritualized, and oh! the silvery scales, the rapid arpeggios, like the flight of some delicate bird across a nocturnal lake! A trill, full throated and at ease, like the lark's, and a staccato that is incomparable. His octave playing is a tour de force. Where other pianists labor, or at least prove to you by unmistakable symbols that they are piling Pelion upon Ossa, Joseffy plays with the mysterious forces of mechanism. There were tones in his playing on Friday night that were not human—or rather not of the piano. He seemed to be playing on an instrument of crystal and water. All was liquid, yet crystalline; velvet, yet thrilling. There was the argentine Thalberg tone, the pure, unforced vocal tone, the power of building up climaxes, yet never the harsh, clangorous, ear shattering sounds that the average concert pianist produces.

* * *

Now to the interpretation. There is an intellectual strenuousness, a nobility of conception and a dignity and elevation of style that were all missing when this artist retired to private life a half decade ago.

He thinks now, and his reading of Brahms' serious work was very gratifying. It is ungrateful music for the pianist. It contains no fireworks. The pyromanists of the keyboard avoid it. It frets their shallow souls. But what a first movement! Coming, as it did, after Beethoven's E flat symphony, it bore the test of comparison—that comparison the sane mind is forced to make.

Joseffy was at his best in the scherzo. There I saw the extent of his artistic growth. In the slow movement he was so grateful because of his suppression of the solo instrument and gentle accord with the violoncello. Of course, that Gypsy finale gave us a taste of the old Joseffy. There were refined brilliancy, elasticity of touch, phenomenal articulation and a riant mobility that was absolutely captivating. It was great, controlled art, the art of proportion, the art of classic symmetry, the art of beauty for itself. Classic, in a word, not romantic, yet I could not help recalling the lines of the dead, romantic Verlaine:

Pas la couleur, rien que la nuance,
Car la nuance seule fiance
Le rêve au rêve et la flûte au cor.

Joseffy is the matchless piano artist of his generation.

* * *

Whether the Symphony concerts as now conducted are an unmixed good is a question that admits of discussion. I do not for a moment deny the courageous benevolence of the founder of the organization or the great worth of the organization itself. But does the absorbing interest shown in the Symphony concerts make for general musical righteousness? Is there to-day as diversified interest in the production of large vocal works, and in concerts where celebrated players play and singers sing? Is not the Symphony Orchestra like unto one of the enormous magasins of Paris which close the smaller shops and drive many skillful persons out of trade? Are there not too many of these concerts? Remember there are forty-eight a season, counting in the public rehearsals. Is there not too much orchestral music for sound digestion?

It is a singular fact that although a virtuoso may be loudly applauded at a Symphony concert, if he afterward give a recital there is then, as a rule, little interest and scant pecuniary reward. There are two exceptions—Paderewski and Ysaye; and yet, incredible as this statement may be to the hysterical, Paderewski is not the only pianist worth hearing, and Ysaye is not the only fiddler in the world. A person of moderate means is likely to say: "I shall hear X. or Y. at a Symphony concert; what do I care to hear him in a recital?" And yet the hearer would be very apt to form a sounder judgment of the musical ability of the pianist or singer or fiddler if he should go to a concert where the versatility of the performer would be tested.

It is also a significant fact that the audience at a Symphony concert is made up of people many of whom are seldom seen at lesser concerts of conspicuous merit, unless the lesser concert is for some reason or other a "social function."

Ondricek and Miss Szumowska have been heard at Symphony concerts. When they appeared together this season in Music Hall the audience was small.

It is my impression and belief that if either Sauret or Marsick should give a concert here the audience would be unworthy as regards size.

Is there any lively curiosity to hear a new vocal work? There is little or no desire on the part of the crowd to become acquainted with a new opera. There is not a novelty in the repertory of the first week of the Abbey, Schoeffel & Grau Opera Company in Mechanics' Building. Faust, The Huguenots, Carmen; 'tis the singers the great public wishes to hear, not the operas. And in the Symphony concert the audience is inclined to shy at a novelty. Bach, Mozart, Haydn, Beethoven, Schubert, Schumann, the Weber of the overtures; excellent names, brave men; we all know what they did.

But we should know what men are now doing.

Did not the Händel and Haydn declare through its secretary that The Messiah is given twice a year to make up the loss attendant on the production of new works? And this season no new work is announced.

I merely jot down these disconnected thoughts for the purpose of inviting discussion. I ask if the present condition of music is due to the overweening importance assumed by the Symphony concerts.

* * *

Boston Symphony Concert.

THE third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra occurred last Thursday evening at the Metropolitan Opera House. It was the most successful so far of the series. The house was well filled and Mr. Paur conducted with unusual animation. This was the program:

Symphony No. 6, in B minor, Pathétique, op. 74.....Peter Tschaikowsky
(First time at these concerts.)

Concerto No. 1, op. 15.....E. A. MacDowell
Maestoso—Allegro con fuoco.
Andante tranquillo.
Presto.

Suite No. 2 (Indian), op. 48.....E. A. MacDowell
With much dignity and character; legend-like.
Twice as fast, with decision.
Softly, tenderly.
With rough vigor, almost savagely.
Dirge-like, mournfully.
Swift and light.
(First performance, MS.)

Hungarian Rhapsody No. 2.....Franz Liszt
(Scored by Karl Müller-Berghaus.)

After all it was a MacDowell night. The Tschaikowsky symphony, which was played with the utmost nicety, did not make a profound impression. Indeed we liked far better Mr. Damrosch's reading, especially his interpretation of the finale. Mr. Paur was not in sympathy with the poetical melancholy of the lamentoso.

Mr. MacDowell had an enormous success as pianist and composer. His first piano concerto, played by Carreño under Mr. Thomas' baton in Chicago, at an M. T. N. A. meeting in 1888, is a charming, graceful piece of writing. It is modeled in the free fantasia style of Liszt, and it savors of Grieg in the first movement. It is healthy, breezy, brilliant, and its andante is full of sentiment. It has neither the poetic depth nor intellectual breadth of this composer's D minor concerto. As a piece of idiomatic piano music it is excellent, the presto in particular being effective and almost sensational. Despite Mr. Paur's lagging accompaniment Mr. MacDowell played with great verve and finesse. He was recalled many times, but did not play an encore.

The suite is a masterly serving up of Indian thematic material and was presented in a most fascinating garb. Mr. MacDowell has frankly gone to the red man for nature music, believing that in the wigwam is the real stuff and not in Dvorák's negroid tunes. He has made a beautiful suite, the second and third movement being most original in treatment. The work is one of the most original we have yet had from the pen of an American composer. It is quite characteristic of MacDowell that he had this suite in his portfolio four years ago, and before all the pother about American music. His unerring judgment sent him to the North American Indian and the result justifies him. It is the most interesting music we have listened to since Tschaikowsky's death.

Mr. Apthorp had the following note about the work in his analytical program:

This suite was nearly completed some four years ago; but it has lain for some time in the composer's portfolio, and the finishing touches have only recently been put to it. The title Indian is no misnomer, for almost all the themes that appear in the work are authentic North American Indian melodies, only three or four themes being of Mr. MacDowell's invention, and these sprang up in his mind more as apposite counter themes to the Indian melodies than as independent themes in themselves.

* * *

y concerts as now conducted are estion that admits of discussion. leny the courageous benevolence ganization or the great worth of But does the absorbing interest concerts make for general musical to-day as diversified interest in ocal works, and in concerts where and singers sing? Is not the unto one of the enormous magase the smaller shops and drive ut of trade? Are there not too Remember there are forty-eight public rehearsals. Is there not c for sound digestion?

that although a virtuoso may be mphony concert, if he afterward en, as a rule, little interest and There are two exceptions—nd yet, incredible as this statrical, Paderewski is not the only d Ysaye is not the only fiddler in moderate means is likely to Y. at a Symphony concert; what a recital?" And yet the hearer a sounder judgment of the muor singer or fiddler if he should he versatility of the performer t fact that the audience at a e up of people many of whom concerts of conspicuous merit, is for some reason or other a umowska have been heard at en they appeared together this udience was small.

belief that if either Sauret or cert here the audience would be sity to hear a new vocal work? on the part of the crowd to bew opera. There is not a novthe first week of the Abbey, mpany in Mechanics' Building. Carmen; 'tis the singers the r, not the operas. And in the dience is inclined to shy at a Haydn, Beethoven, Schubert, the overtures; excellent names, hat they did.

t men are now doing.

Haydn declare through its sec- given twice a year to make up roduction of [illegible] Symp-

Izeyl implores her pity and gets woman learns that her son is hate masters her and she gives people.

e place of execution. Izeyl has s torn out and she is dying of e Master whispers to her:

and she exclaims, "What care less the death that has given e. Come, kindly Death, lay thy my soul in one last kiss!" He Oh, Faith that I betray! Oh, e! Oh, Faith, let me be but a et me be meek and suffer like look elsewhere if it needs an ay. Die not, Izeyl; be reborn spised beauty! Thy voice re to the immortal duties I have d."

cantation of his life's philosophy ter, press me in thy arms; lay heart; give me thy lips; there is thus, in a moment of love and ses into Nirvana. A very pretty istic exotic "blend" all this ends in the same fashion, and in second act of Tristan and Isolde the same philosophy, a curious and before all the pother about herring judgment sent him to the nd the result justifies him. It is usic we have listened to since following note about the work in y completed some four years ago; time in the composer's portfolio, s have only recently been put to it. o misnomer, for almost all the the work are authentic North es, only three or four themes being ention, and these sprang up in his counter themes to the Indian melot themes in themselves,

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 29, 1896.

Boston's prime orchestra introduced at its concert last Thursday night Edward Alexander MacDowell's (a sturdy name for you) second orchestral suite, Indian, the thematic material of which is based on authentic North American Indian melodies. Mr. Apthorp, in his program notes, declares that only three or four of the themes are Mr. MacDowell's own, "and these sprang up in his mind more as opposite counter themes to the Indian melodies than as independent themes in themselves."

The results of MacDowell's vacation abroad last summer are doubtless given us, although the suite was written four years ago, several seasons before Dr. Dvorák composed his so-called American Symphony, the fifth in E minor, which is based on negro airs and several Indian melodies.

This new suite is as American as we can hope for, at least for half a century. The composer has gone to the coarse haired aborigines for his themes, and, while the music has a Gaelic and Norse flavor, it must be called American—Indian-American. The theme of the third movement of the suite resembles a theme employed by Rimsky-Korsakoff in his Antar symphony—that Antar, child of the desert, glorified by Lamartine.

Mr. MacDowell avoids a program, but acknowledges having won suggestions from T. B. Aldrich's Indian legend, Miantowna. The dirge—the fourth number—is a remarkably original treatment of the subject. Indeed the suite is a revelation of the composer's advance. His handling of the orchestra is masterly, and it is no exaggeration to write that his music held its own on a program with the name of Tschaikowsky leading.

The last movement of the suite is a vivid picture—and I hate being pinned down to a musical synopsis—of wild merrymaking. You can see the red and painted devils dancing with many strange shoutings around their tepees.

Best of all is the fact that it is all good music. It is MacDowell's forty-eighth work. His first piano concerto, charming and clever as it is, and written when he was nineteen, is interesting as a comparative study. Numbered opus 15, the enormous advance in the technical treatment of the orchestra could readily be judged on account of the juxtaposition of the youthful and mature compositions. I pin my faith to MacDowell. He is the hope of our country, and I long for that first symphony which he composed in Switzerland last summer—a most memorable summer, I imagine.

* * *

The sixth symphony of Tschaikowsky has never allured me as have the fourth and fifth, in F and E minor. It does not seem to hang together; it suggests the suite, not the symphony. The last movement—the adagio lamentoso—is the best, and its second theme, the broad cantabile, unmistakably suggests the beautiful slow movement in D of the fifth symphony. The first allegro has a sugary, Mendelssohnian quality, and then those two middle movements, are they not trivial—the one which has that Raffish march? No, Tschaikowsky has little new to say in his last work, but he says it supremely well. The symphony, if symphony it be, lacks homogeneity. The last adagio, however, is noble and impressive—a marked mood of musical melancholy.

* * *

The man who first remarked that comparisons are odious must have been bow-legged mentally. He feared comparisons. Big people do not. Therefore, if I speak of Rafael Joseffy's exquisite art, that great pianist need not be put on a lonely pedestal, for he can court comparisons with Paderewski, d'Albert, De Pachmann, Rosenthal, Menter, Bloomfield Zeisler, Sauer, Siloti, Reisenauer, Friedheim, or any of the new gods of the keyboard. Not only may his marvelous work be set up as an exemplar for all other artists, but he leads the list for the reason that he possesses qualities that are unique to-day in the world of piano playing.

With several passionate pilgrims I journeyed to Brooklyn last Friday night to hear Joseffy play Liszt's greatest concerto—the one in A. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Mr. Paur, was giving a concert at the Academy of Music in the City of Churches and Sunday thirst, and as Joseffy had not played in New York State for about six years it was with febrile pulse that his old admirers flocked across the bridge. He did not play the Liszt, but the second Brahms concerto in B flat. He was pale when he came out upon the platform and doubtlessly nervous. He looked the same Joseffy of fifteen years ago. Age has dealt leniently with him. There is the same characteristic pose of the head—the medallion-like profile, the brows more serene and intellectually stronger. His hands—those wonderful white paws of velvet, as an enthusiastic girl called them—were placed upon the keyboard with the same caressing attack. It was Rafael Joseffy, beloved of Apollo, god of music, yet spared to us.

* * *

He is the greatest classical pianist alive. Observe I do not bracket his name with another. In the externals of his art he stands alone, as did Karl Tausig, his master. He is the great pupil of a great teacher. He has spoken to me of Tausig, Tausig who painted a perfect picture of a composition and hung it upon the wall of your memory, there to remain forever. I thought of this as I listened to Joseffy's playing. It is so Hellenic, so aristocratic, so distinguished, so noble, calm and satisfying that my mind reverted naturally to Greek art. Great, serene sculptural images, full of that serenity that comes of perfect equipoise of temperament, yet full of the blitheness Goethe speaks of in his Italian Journey. "Heiterkeit," Winkelmann called it. Joseffy's art is so human, not so warm, not passionate, not multicolored as the vital, startling art of Paderewski. Paderewski has the dramatic accent, Joseffy has not. The latter is austere, a trifle chilly, detached and more remote. It is objective art. Paderewski is violently subjective. Paderewski forces you to regard his personality. He overflows every bar of music with it. He looms largely in the foreground of your consciousness. He is ever present, a rich, beneficent nature. He overshadows the music he plays. Joseffy retreats in the background. He makes for the idea of beauty. Every note is beautiful of itself. Every group is carved with cunning touches. It is the art of the cameo of the master miniaturist.

But where, ten years ago, there was merely a deliciously molded shell, now we get a rich kernel. Joseffy has lived and suffered. He has grown richer in feeling, yet no tragic hint does he impart in his playing, no tale of sorrow. As if he said: "What has Hecuba to do with music?" he sternly represses all personal utterance of feeling. Where Paderewski is bold, free, outspoken, Joseffy is contained, reticent, proudly poetic and understands the tact of omission.

* * *

As might be expected, his playing is largely a matter of nuance, he is a master of the linear. Paderewski's palette glows with golden hues, Joseffy paints in sober, pearly grays, exquisite blendings of half-expressed tints, palimpsests of tone. His technic is the last word in technic. In this he outrivals Rosenthal or the crafty Chopinzee—De Pachmann.

If I must criticise his work it is for the lack of dynamic weight. From Tausig, Joseffy learned the lesson of clarity and tonal balance. He never forces the tone and his chord playing, deficient in actual depth, is clean cut and just.

His rhythms are spiritualized, and oh! the silvery scales, the rapid arpeggios, like the flight of some delicate bird across a nocturnal lake! A trill, full throated and at ease, like the lark's, and a staccato that is incomparable. His octave playing is a tour de force. Where other pianists labor, or at least prove to you by unmistakable symbols that they are piling Pelion upon Ossa, Joseffy plays with the mysterious forces of mechanism. There were tones in his playing on Friday night that were not human—or rather not of the piano. He seemed to be playing on an instrument of crystal and water. All was liquid, yet crystalline; velvet, yet thrilling. There was the argentine Thalberg tone, the pure, unforced vocal tone, the power of building up climaxes, yet never the harsh, clangorous, ear shattering sounds that the average concert pianist produces.

* * *

Now to the interpretation. There is an intellectual strenuousness, a nobility of conception and a dignity and elevation of style that were all missing when this artist retired to private life a half decade ago.

He thinks now, and his reading of Brahms' serious work was very gratifying. It is ungrateful music for the pianist. It contains no fireworks. The pyromanists of the keyboard avoid it. It frets their shallow souls. But what a first movement! Coming, as it did, after Beethoven's E flat symphony, it bore the test of comparison—that comparison the sane mind is forced to make.

Joseffy was at his best in the scherzo. There I saw the extent of his artistic growth. In the slow movement he was so grateful because of his suppression of the solo instrument and gentle accord with the violoncello. Of course, that Gypsy finale gave us a taste of the old Joseffy. There were refined brilliancy, elasticity of touch, phenomenal articulation and a riant mobility that was absolutely captivating. It was great, controlled art, the art of proportion, the art of classic symmetry, the art of beauty for itself. Classic, in a word, not romantic, yet I could not help recalling the lines of the dead, romantic Verlaine:

> Pas la couleur, rien que la nuance,
> Car la nuance seule fiance
> Le rêve au rêve et la flûte au cor.

Joseffy is the matchless piano artist of his generation.

* * *

Whether the Symphony concerts as now conducted are an unmixed good is a question that admits of discussion. I do not for a moment deny the courageous benevolence of the founder of the organization or the great worth of the organization itself. But does the absorbing interest shown in the Symphony concerts make for general musical righteousness? Is there to-day as diversified interest in the production of large vocal works, and in concerts where celebrated players play and singers sing? Is not the Symphony Orchestra like unto one of the enormous magasins of Paris which close the smaller shops and drive many skillful persons o many of these concerts?
a season, counting in th too much orchestral mus

It is a singular fact loudly applauded at a S give a recital there is t scant pecuniary reward
Paderewski and Ysaye;
ment may be to the hyst pianist worth hearing, ar the world. A person o say: "I shall hear X. or do I care to hear him in would be very apt to forn sical ability of the pianist go to a concert where would be tested.

It is also a significan
Symphony concert is mad are seldom seen at lesser unless the lesser concert
"social function."

Ondricek and Miss Sz
Symphony concerts. Wh season in Music Hall the a

It is my impression and Marsick should give a con unworthy as regards size.

Is there any lively curi
There is little or no desire come acquainted with a n elty in the repertory of Schoeffel & Grau Opera Co
Faust, The Huguenots, great public wishes to hea
Symphony concert the au novelty. Bach, Mozart, Schumann, the Weber of brave men; we all know w

But we should know wh

Did not the Händel an retary that The Messiah the loss attendant on the this season no new work i

I merely jot down the s purpose of inviting discuss tion of music is due to t
sumed by the Symphony c

Boston Sym

THE third concert o
chestra occurred la Metropolitan Opera House far of the series. The hou conducted with unusual an

Symphony No. 6, in B mi
op. 74.....
(First time

Concerto No. 1, op. 15.....
Maestoso—Allegro con
Andante tranquillo.
Presto.

Suite No. 2 (Indian), op. 48.
With much dignity and Twice as fast, with dec
Softly, tenderly.
With rough vigor, almo
Dirge-like, mournfully.
Swift and light.
(First pe

Hungarian Rhapsody No. 2..
(Scored by Ka

After all it was a MacD symphony, which was pla not make a profound impr ter Mr. Damrosch's readin the finale. Mr. Paur was melancholy of the lamento

Mr. MacDowell had an composer. His first pian under Mr. Thomas' bato meeting in 1888, is a cha
It is modeled in the fr savors of Grieg in the breezy, brilliant, and its has neither the poetic dep composer's D minor con piano music it is excelle effective and almost sensa ging accompaniment Mr verve and finesse. He w not play an encore.

The suite is a master material and was present
MacDowell has frankly music, believing that in t in Dvorák's negroid tune the second and third m treatment. The work is yet had from the pen of characteristic of MacD portfolio four years ago
American music. His t
North American Indian and the result justifies him. It is the most interesting music we have listened to since Tschaikowsky's death.

Mr. Apthorp had the following note about the work in his analytical program:

This suite was nearly completed some four years ago; but it has lain for some time in the composer's portfolio, and the finishing touches have only recently been put to it. The title Indian is no misnomer, for almost all the themes that appear in the work are authentic North American Indian melodies, only three or four themes being of Mr. MacDowell's invention, and these sprang up in his mind more as apposite counter themes to the Indian melodies than as independent themes in themselves.

The similarity in general character between the Indian themes and well-known melodies of Norse origin is not to be overlooked. Indeed, one of them, the principal theme of the third movement, is almost note for note identical with a theme used by Rimsky-Korsakoff in his Antar symphony. Whether this similarity between Norse and North American Indian melodies is sufficiently specific to form an argument in favor of certain ethnological theories, I shall surely not take upon myself to determine. But I suspect that it is, upon the whole, little if anything more than the general similarity in character of most uncivilized melodic forms.

That this suite holds itself strictly aloof from the domain of program music, properly so called, may be said emphatically. Yet it is interesting to know what ideas Mr. MacDowell had in his mind while composing it, and what was the poetic substratum of his inspiration.

The first movement is headed: "With much dignity and character; legend-like. Twice as fast, with decision." In it the composer has tried to tell no particular story. But the movement was suggested to him by reading T. A. Aldrich's Indian legend, Miantowona. He has made no attempt to follow out Mr. Aldrich's poem, incident by incident; but the poem was what suggested to him to write something of a similar general character in music.

The second movement, headed: "Softly, tenderly," might be characterized as an Indian love-song.

In a similar spirit, the third movement, "With rough vigor, almost savagely," might be called a scalp dance; not that it is intended as a musical reflection of any special ceremonies connected with the scalp dance, but that its character is that of savage warlike ardor and bloodthirsty excitement.

The fourth movement, "Dirge-like, mournfully," is plainly an Indian dirge; but whether over the remains of a slain warrior and chief, whose loss is bewailed by a whole tribe, or the secret lament of an Indian mother over the body of her dead son, the listener is left to determine for himself. There is a great deal of picturesque and imaginative writing in the movement, suggestive of midnight darkness, the vastness and solitude of prairie surroundings, and the half-nomadic, half warlike Indian life.

The fifth movement, "Swift and light," may be taken as a musical picture of a gay popular festival in an Indian village, with dancing and merry making. Here, again, the composer has been at no trouble to suggest any of the specific concomitants of Indian festivities; he has merely written a movement in which merry makings of the sort are suggested in music, the Indian character of which is undeniable.

It should be said that none of the above indications are to be taken as so-called "program headings," definitely showing the poetic purpose and import of the several movements—like the headings of the separate movements in Berlioz's Fantastic or Harold symphonies—and serving as a clew to the meaning of the music. Nothing lies farther from the composer's intention than this. They merely serve to show what Mr. MacDowell had in his mind while writing the several movements of this suite; these poetic ideas acting upon him more in the way of stimulating his imagination and conditioning certain musical moods in him than in that of prompting him to attempt anything like would-be definite tone painting.

A very ungypsy-like performance of the Liszt rhapsody was given. But the orchestra, as usual, covered itself with glory.

There is a weekly paper in this city, a paper six weeks old, and a sound and healthy infant, called The Truth in Boston, "conducted by a society of gentlemen and imprinted for them once in each week." The following letter was published in No. 5:

"Col. Henry L. Higginson:

"DEAR COLONEL—You have, as you deserve, the thanks of this community, for having done more to give it high-class music than any other man or men. You have done it disinterestedly, and with the sole purpose of benefiting your fellow citizens, men and women. You sought to bring the best in music within reach of all who loved it. Sordid speculators stepped in and thwarted your plans. You resorted to auction sales, and so outflanked the speculators. But the laws of supply and demand came in to defeat your high purpose. Among many who had no real love for music, but who were rich in money, it became the rage to attend your concerts. Seats sold at fabulous prices, and even the cheapest were beyond the reach of many who wanted, nay, who needed, to hear the great performers and the trained orchestra you have employed. So, with the best of motives, and the best of endeavor on your part, you have in a sense signally failed.

"That you realize and regret this no one doubts.

"To make any change at present is out of the question. Your contracts are made; your plans must be carried out.

"But another year might there not be a change? Instead of sending the Symphony Orchestra afield, on long trips to distant cities, adventures which it is generally understood do not pay, might you not keep them at home, and on Thursday evenings or at any other convenient and suitable time, give preliminary rehearsals, with no season tickets, no reserved seats, no auction sales, but just sales at the door at the prices now charged for Friday rehearsals, minus, of course, the premium? Fashionable Boston would still throng to the concerts. The suburbs and the city would still fill the house on Friday afternoons, and there would be room at the preliminary rehearsal for those who are now shut out.

"And they would call you blessed."

* * *

This open letter furnishes food for thought.

In the first place, no one, unless he is singularly ingenuous, has any idea that Mr. Higginson will heed the letter. It is not likely that he even read it through. For he is not a man that courts opinion or takes advice.

In the next place, I doubt if the proposed scheme would turn out to be practicable.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 2[illegible]

Springfield News and Gossip.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

We have had a wealth of good things in the musical attractions of the season, but it remains for the great symphony concert to be the crowning triumph. The great Boston orchestra will play in City hall Tuesday evening and it will easily be the musical event of the season. It will not only be a concert by one of the world's greatest orchestras, but it will be one of the finest performances ever given by this famous organization. The program has been selected with great care and judgment, the very cream of the regular series of Boston concerts being selected to make up the program to be rendered here. As to the orchestra itself it can only be said that every member of it is himself a master musician. With such artists as Adamowski and Kneisel making up the membership of the organization nothing further need be said of its rank or capabilities.

Emil Paur.

Emil Paur, the leader of the Boston

Miss Franklin.

symphony, is one of the greatest conductors in the world and probably without a peer in this country, certainly in point of successful attainments, for the record of this organization since he took hold of it three years ago is altogether without parallel in this country. His success as a leader is due not a little to the attachment of the orchestra to their conductor. He is so thoroughly in sympathy with them that they will do anything for him.

It is often said of Mr Paur that he frowns on the audiences and smiles on his men and he not infrequently joins heartily with his audience in applauding some especially praiseworthy piece of work on the part of his men.

Miss Franklin, the soloist of the concert, is an old favorite who has won a wide reputation for her work with this orchestra. Miss Franklin is a Boston girl who has studied abroad and is one of the best sopranos that call Boston their home. In the most difficult and important compositions she is thoroughly at ease and her abilities are well suited to a concert of this kind.

The program selected has been chosen with a special regard for solo work, conspicuous among which will be the opportunities which will be given the great harpist, Shuebacker. The numbers on the program represent the most beautiful works of the seven great composers, Beethoven, Goetz, Schubert, Volkman, Gounod, Berlioz and Wagner. One change has been made in the program from that first announced, Gounod's Ave Maria being substituted for his Repentir.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

TO HAVE A WARM WELCOME

A Program of Surpassing Excellence Has Been Arranged—A Large Audience Assured.

Beyond question the leading musical event of the present season will be the appearance in city hall Tuesday evening of the Boston Symphony orchestra. It would be rank heresy to attempt to introduce this organization to the people of Springfield, for there are few people in the city who have not either listened to the work of this wonderful orchestra or heard of its international reputation.

Already a sufficient number of tickets have been sold to insure a large audience, but there are many of the choicest seats left, and these will remain on sale at Steinert's until 6 Tuesday evening, when the chart will be taken to city hall. The general admission tickets will be placed on sale just previous to the concert.

EMIL PAUR.

Emil Paur, the gifted leader, will personaly conduct the orchestra, while he has arranged a program of surpassing excellence. There has been an improvement made in the program over the original plan, in the substitution of Gounod's "Ave Maria," for the same author's "Repentir." The change admits of the introduction of a violin obligato and harp accompaniment, the latter by one of the greatest harpists in the world—Schuecker. The vocal soloist will be Miss Gertrude Franklin, a young woman who received the most of her musical education abroad, and who is recognized as one of the most distinguished singers the "Hub" has ever turned out.

The revised program is as follows:

Overture to "Leonore," Ludwig Van Beethoven
My Strength is Spent, from "The Taming of the Shrew," Goetz
Unfinished symphony in B minor, Schubert
Serenade for string orchestra. Volkmann
'Cello solo by Alwin Schroeder.
"Ave Maria," Gounod
Violin obligato and harp accompaniment.
Selection from "The Damnation of Faust," Berlioz
Overture to "Rienzi," Wagner

The North American

CLAYTON McMICHAEL & SONS, Publishers.

CONCERT MUSIC.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives a Matinee.

The matinee concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last Saturday afternoon was not so well attended as it should have been, partly, no doubt, because the programme was so very far from being such as might be expected to attract a matinee audience. It was a programme made up of battle, murder and sudden death. There were two vocal death scenes, one from "Die Gotterdamerung" and the other from "Tristan and Isolde," a picture of war and war's alarms in Tschaikowski's vulgar overture "1812," a description of skeletons dancing to the fiddling of Death in Saint-Saens' vividly fantastic "Danse Macabre," and two overtures—Beethoven's "Egmont" and Bizet's "La Patrie"—breathing the spirit of strife, struggle and sacrifice. That is not the kind of thing that appeals to the matinee girl, and she is the personage Mr. Paur should bear in mind when arranging a matinee programme. Suppose next time he gives us something like this: Overture, "The Hebrides," Mendelssohn; Waltz, "Village [illegible]," Strauss; symphony, B minor (unfinished), Schubert; ballet music, "Feramors," Rubinstein and Liszt's "Preludes." That is more like the kind of thing a matinee audience wants. Of course the orchestra played superbly, and Mme. Materna, who was the soloist, sang, or rather declaimed, the Wagner numbers with splendid dramatic intensity and breadth, but with such a programme the concert unavoidably assumed the aspect rather of a duty than of a pleasure.

[85]

SPRINGFIELD, WEDNESDAY, JAN. 23

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

GIVES A DELIGHTFUL CONCERT.

A Large and Enthusiastic Audience in City Hall—The Work of the Orchestra and Soloist.

It is a good many years since the Boston Symphony orchestra has played in Springfield, and the regret for what we have perforce missed becomes the more poignant after such a superb concert as that given in City hall last night. We ought to have two concerts like that every season, and there is no reason why they should not be made to pay. Mr Koop, who had brought the orchestra here at his own risk, deserves much credit for his courage and enterprise, and although the extra expense caused by the necessary postponement of the concert took away any chance of profit, it is some encouragement to know that last night's audience was the largest that the orchestra has played to here, and larger than any at Worcester, Providence and other New England cities outside of Boston. It takes a big audience to pay for so large and expensive an organization, composed so largely of distinguished solo players, but if Springfield people can once be got into the habit of it, they can support one or two concerts every season without trouble.

A more delightful entertainment, indeed, there could not be. The full orchestra is the perfection, the highest development of music, and the Boston symphony orchestra represents the perfection, the highest development of orchestral playing. By an easy inference there is nothing better to be heard in the way of music, and when a little more knowledge of music is diffused among the people the bare announcement of a concert by this famous orchestra will be enough to pack City hall to the roof. The audience last evening was really creditably large, considering the potent rival attraction at the theater, and it was very responsive and appreciative, evidently taking deep pleasure in every number.

The program was evidently selected with a view to furbishing up our education in orchestral music, which might quite naturally be supposed to have grown rusty since the orchestra was here last, some half-dozen years ago. The musicans present would doubtless have been glad of something not quite so orthodox and familiar, a new Tschaikowzki symphony, for example, or something new by Dvorak. But for the general public, dependent for musical instruction on such concerts as are given here, the program was admirably constituted. It was a real Golden Treasury program, each selection faultless of its kind. If we were to suggest any improvement it would be dropping the "Rienzi" overture, which is noisily brilliant, but hardly represents the mature Wagner, and putting something more modern and less familiar in its place. However, it is undeniably as stunning and effective as a close to a concert as it is as an overture to the opera.

From a program of such masterpieces selection of the best is impossible. Probably the favorite "Unfinished" symphony by Schubert, always as fresh and spontaneous as if we had never heard it, gave as much pleasure as anything. For pure lyric inspiration it would be hard to match the delicious song theme of the allegro, which has sung itself into millions of hearts and never stales with repetition. Even richer in lyric beauty is the andante, which bears in every measure the stamp of the greatest song writer the world has ever seen. Not the greatest of symphonies this, but surely one of the most beautiful, and for a wonder musicians do not cherish a grudge against it because it is popular. How could it be anything else? It was admirably played, and the andante gave special opportunity for displaying the wonderful quality of the solo winds in the orchestra.

The "Leonora" overture, No 3, by Beethoven, is also an old favorite here, and none the less welcome. Where is there an overture that shows a more vivid imagination, more vigor and force, or richer subject matter. Every measure is a new delight, and one never wearies of it. No selection on the program was better played than this, and the performance was remarkable both for spirit and finish. Mr Paur is evidently especially at home in Beethoven. The piquant and charming "Minuet of Will-o'-the-wisps" and "Waltz of Sylphs" from Berlioz's "The Damnation of Faust," which have never been surpassed as the expression of the fancy in music, were played with delicacy and grace, and evidently relished exceedingly. Of the "Rienzi" overture nothing need be said except that it was played with splendid vim, and that the great orchestral climax was irresistible in its sweep.

The string orchestra showed its strength in the beautiful serenade by Volkmann, with 'cello obligato, which was a happy addition to the original program. It is one of the strongest and most poetic works in the 'cellist's repertory, with a singularly wild and plaintive note in some of its strains. The antiphonal melody of the andante with its moving rhythm works up to a magnificent effect as it is tossed back and forth from violoncello to violins. The solo part was finely played by Alvin Schroeder, who has no superior as a 'cellist. Mr Adamowski also had a chance for some beautiful obligato work in the Gounod "Ave Maria," which he kindly volunteered to play for the singer of the evening, Miss Gertrude Franklin. Miss Franklin made her first appearance in Springfield last evening and was cordially received. She has a voice of good quality, and does sober, artistic work. The only moderately interesting aria from "The Taming of the Shrew," by Goetz, she sang with a true dramatic conception, and she produced a good effect in the familiar "Ave Maria," although her voice is not quite of the type to follow the peculiarly sweet tone of Mr Adamowski's violin to the best advantage. To sum up, the concert was good, very good; with one or two selections a little out of the ordinary it would have been great. The chief points of possible improvement would have been the elimination of one or two somewhat hackneyed things, and the addition of at least one novelty, and perhaps of a full symphony in place of Schubert's exquisite torso. It is to be hoped that these superb orchestral concerts may become an annual feature of our musical season.

From "The Record", Sunday, Jan. 26th.

[illegible] popular matinee at the Music yesterday was rendered [illegible] by the reappearance of Miss Amalie Materna upon the Philadelphia stage. Those opera-goers who witnessed the anniversary ovation extended to this famous Wagnerian soprano upon her last visit to this city (with Conductor Damrosch two years ago) cannot have forgotten the sincere fervor of that tribute. An enthusiastic welcome greeted her yesterday when she threaded her way to the front down the aisle of instruments, and a gracious remembrance of her old-time glory might have been detected in the stormy applause. Not that her singing of the two Wagner numbers, "Isolde's Love-Death" and Bruennhilde's dying speech over Siegfried, was not performed in praiseworthy fashion; indeed, her soprano seems in the short interval of years to have regained more of its original volume and beauty, while its compass is as magnificent as ever; but it was a severe ordeal to place her voice against such a massive orchestral background. Nevertheless, in the dramatic "Goetterdammerung" music she revealed her great sustaining power (a scena in which she was last heard, by the bye). It has now been nearly 32 years since this Styrian prima donna made her debut, and it was two decades ago that she made herself world-famous by her Bruennhilde at the Baireuth Festival. Lillie Lehman, her great rival in the role, is still singing (at Vienna), while a new Bruennhilde has made her advent in Marie Brema (now with Damrosch). The beautiful instrumental prelude to "Tristan and Isolde" was most suggestively interpreted by Conductor Paur. As a balance to this crucial dose of Wagner, he fittingly chose Tschaikowsky's "1812" Overture and Saint-Saens' "Danse Macabre" (Dance of Death)—two inspiringly picturesque compositions. The overture, which celebrates the repulse of the Napoleonic invasion of Russia, treats the Marseillaise tune most delightfully with a naive drowning of its fragmentary echoes ever and anon in the whirlwind of strings and embattled wood winds. The cannonading episode was slightly theatrical, but the use of the bell in the coda was, if queer, decidedly stirring. Beethoven's familiar "Egmont" overture was also supplemented by a novelty in Bizet's "Patrie," with its briefly-developed melody.

From "The Press", Sunday, Jan. 26th.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave another popular matinee yesterday afternoon before a large audience. This is the program:

Beethoven .....Overture, "Egmont"
Wagner, Vorspiel and Liebestod, from "Tristan and Isolde"
Tschaikowsky .....Overture, "1812"
Wagner, Monologue from the "Gotterdammerung"
Saint-Saens .....Danse Macabre"
Bizet.....Overture, "La Patrie"

This does not strike one as a strictly "popular" program, nor did it appear so to all the audience. While Mme. Materna has never been excelled as a dramatic singer in Wagnerian roles, advancing years have detracted from her earlier standard, but she still remains a powerful singer and her two numbers were given yesterday in a way to please Wagnerian idolators, though it is to be feared they did not make up a large portion of the audience.

The Egmont overture is ever a delight and the Danse Macabre is a stirring composition. The "1812" overture was played last season and was well received again.

The orchestra played with unusual vigor. Never before has it given such a volume of tone as during two of the numbers. The concert, on the whole, was very enjoyable.

From "The Inquirer", Sunday, Jan. 26th.

Mr. Paur's choice of popular music at yesterday afternoon's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the Academy of Music, was, to say the least, peculiar, not that it was not an attractive programme, for it was; but to sandwich the "liebes-tod" from Tristan and Isolde, with its emotional effect and tragic character, between "Egmont" and Tschaikowsky's circus-like overture, "1812," and then "Brunhilde's" speech over "Seigfried" in the Gotterdaemmerung between Tschaikowsky and Saint-Saens' extraordinary "Danse Macabre," seemed a little jarring. Beethoven began the programme and Bizet's overture, "Patrie," closed it, and Madame Materna, to whom nature has been more than generous, was the vocal relief. Her method in Wagnerian declamation is excellent, and she brought out all the beauty of the music yesterday, and sang it with most conscientious expression. The Tschaikowsky overture was rendered in fine spirit and so were the oddities of Saint-Saens. But after all Materna was the hit of the concert, for she is really "Brunnhilda."

News 1/11

Boston Symphony Concert.

The third concert in the series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is announced for Wednesday evening, January 22, and also the 1354th performance of this famous organization and the 36th in this city. It will be a noteworthy event musically because of the reappearance on the concert stage of Mr. Rafael Joseffy, who now for five years has been in retirement. Mr. Joseffy was easily the leading pianist in this country at the time of his withdrawal, and there is every reason to believe that he will at once return to his former triumphs.

THE HOMESTEAD.

TURDAY, JANUARY 25

Springfield News and Gossip.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

We have had a wealth of good things in the musical attractions of the season, but it remains for the great symphony concert to be the crowning triumph. The great Boston orchestra will play in city hall Tuesday evening and it will easily be the musical event of the season. It will not only be a concert by one of the world's greatest orchestras, but it will be one of the finest performances ever given by this famous organization. The program has been selected with great care and judgment, the very cream of the regular series of Boston concerts being selected to make up the program to be rendered here. As to the orchestra itself it can only be said that every member of it is himself a master musician. With such artists as Adamowski and Kneisel making up the membership of the organization nothing further need be said of its rank or capabilities.

Emil Paur.

Emil Paur, the leader of the Boston

Miss Franklin.

symphony, is one of the greatest conductors in the world and probably without a peer in this country, certainly in point of successful attainments, for the record of this organization since he took hold of it three years ago is altogether without parallel in this country. His success as a leader is due not a little to the attachment of the orchestra to their conductor. He is so thoroughly in sympathy with them that they will do anything for him.

It is often said of Mr Paur that he frowns on the audiences and smiles on his men and he not infrequently joins heartily with his audience in applauding some especially praiseworthy piece of work on the part of his men.

Miss Franklin, the soloist of the concert, is an old favorite who has won a wide reputation for her work with this orchestra. Miss Franklin is a Boston girl who has studied abroad and is one of the best sopranos that call Boston their home. In the most difficult and important compositions she is thoroughly at ease and her abilities are well suited to a concert of this kind.

The program selected has been chosen with a special regard for solo work, conspicuous among which will be the opportunities which will be given the great harpist, Shuebacker. The numbers on the program represent the most beautiful works of the seven great composers, Beethoven, Goetz, Schubert, Volkman, Gounod, Berlioz and Wagner. One change has been made in the program from that at first announced, Gounod's Ave Maria being substituted for his Repentir.

THE SPRINGFIELD UNION, JANUARY 26,

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

TO HAVE A WARM WELCOME

A Program of Surpassing Excellence Has Been Arranged—A Large Audience Assured.

Beyond question the leading musical event of the present season will be the appearance in city hall Tuesday evening of the Boston Symphony orchestra. It would be rank heresy to attempt to introduce this organization to the people of Springfield, for there are few people in the city who have not either listened to the work of this wonderful orchestra or heard of its international reputation.

Already a sufficient number of tickets have been sold to insure a large audience, but there are many of the choicest seats left, and these will remain on sale at Steinert's until 6 Tuesday evening, when the chart will be taken to city hall. The general admission tickets will be placed on sale just previous to the concert.

EMIL PAUR.

Emil Paur, the gifted leader, will personaly conduct the orchestra, while he has arranged a program of surpassing excellence. There has been an improvement made in the program over the original plan, in the substitution of Gounod's "Ave Maria," for the same author's "Repentir." The change admits of the introduction of a violin obligato and harp accompaniment, the latter by one of the greatest harpists in the world—Schuecker. The vocal soloist will be Miss Gertrude Franklin, a young woman who received the most of her musical education abroad, and who is recognized as one of the most distinguished singers the "Hub" has ever turned out.

The revised program is as follows:

Overture to "Leonore," Ludwig Van Beethoven
My Strength is Spent, from "The Taming of the Shrew," Goetz
Unfinished symphony in B minor, Schubert
Serenade for string orchestra, Volkmann
'Cello solo by Alwin Schroeder.
"Ave Maria," Gounod
Violin obligato and harp accompaniment.
Selection from "The Damnation of Faust," Berlioz
Overture to "Rienzi," Wagner

The North American

CLAYTON McMICHAEL & SONS, Publishers.

CONCERT MUSIC.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives a Matinee.

The matinee concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last Saturday afternoon was not so well attended as it should have been, partly, no doubt, because the programme was so very far from being such as might be expected to attract a matinee audience. It was a programme made up of battle, murder and sudden death. There were two vocal death scenes, one from "Die Gotterdamerung" and the other from "Tristan and Isolde," a picture of war and war's alarms in Tschaikowski's vulgar overture "1812," a description of skeletons dancing to the fiddling of Death in Saint-Saens' vividly fantastic "Danse Macabre," and two overtures—Beethoven's "Egmont" and Bizet's "La Patrie"—breathing the spirit of strife, struggle and sacrifice. That is not the kind of thing that appeals to the matinee girl, and she is the personage Mr. Paur should bear in mind when arranging a matinee programme. Suppose next time he gives us something like this: Overture, "The Hebrides," Mendelssohn; Waltz, "Village [redacted]," Strauss; symphony, B minor (unfinished), Schubert; ballet music, "Feramors," Rubinstein and Liszt's "Preludes." That is more like the kind of thing a matinee audience wants. Of course the orchestra played superbly, and Mme. Materna, who was the soloist, sang, or rather declaimed, the Wagner numbers with splendid dramatic intensity and breadth, but with such a programme the concert unavoidably assumed the aspect rather of a duty than of a pleasure.

[85]

The Republican.

SPRINGFIELD, WEDNESDAY, JAN. 29

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

GIVES A DELIGHTFUL CONCERT.

A Large and Enthusiastic Audience in City Hall—The Work of the Orchestra and Soloist.

It is a good many years since the Boston Symphony orchestra has played in Springfield, and the regret for what we have perforce missed becomes the more poignant after such a superb concert as that given in City hall last night. We ought to have two concerts like that every season, and there is no reason why they should not be made to pay. Mr Koop, who had brought the orchestra here at his own risk, deserves much credit for his courage and enterprise, and although the extra expense caused by the necessary postponement of the concert took away any chance of profit, it is some encouragement to know that last night's audience was the largest that the orchestra has played to here, and larger than any at Worcester, Providence and other New England cities outside of Boston. It takes a big audience to pay for so large and expensive an organization, composed so largely of distinguished solo players, but if Springfield people can once be got into the habit of it, they can support one or two concerts every season without trouble.

A more delightful entertainment, indeed, there could not be. The full orchestra is the perfection, the highest development of music, and the Boston symphony orchestra represents the perfection, the highest development of orchestral playing. By an easy inference there is nothing better to be heard in the way of music, and when a little more knowledge of music is diffused among the people the bare announcement of a concert by this famous orchestra will be enough to pack City hall to the roof. The audience last evening was really creditably large, considering the potent rival attraction at the theater, and it was very responsive and appreciative, evidently taking deep pleasure in every number.

The program was evidently selected with a view to furbishing up our education in orchestral music, which might quite naturally be supposed to have grown rusty since the orchestra was here last, some half-dozen years ago. The musicans present would doubtless have been glad of something not quite so orthodox and familiar, a new Tschaikowzki symphony, for example, or something new by Dvorak. But for the general public, dependent for musical instruction on such concerts as are given here, the program was admirably constituted. It was a real Golden Treasury program, each selection faultless of its kind. If we were to suggest any improvement it would be dropping the "Rienzi" overture, which is noisily brilliant, but hardly represents the mature Wagner, and putting something more modern and less familiar in its place. However, it is undeniably as stunning and effective as a close to a concert as it is as an overture to the opera.

From a program of such masterpieces selection of the best is impossible. Probably the favorite "Unfinished" symphony by Schubert, always as fresh and spontaneous as if we had never heard it, gave as much pleasure as anything. For pure lyric inspiration it would be hard to match the delicious song theme of the allegro, which has sung itself into millions of hearts and never stales with repetition. Even richer in lyric beauty is the andante, which bears in every measure the stamp of the greatest song writer the world has ever seen. Not the greatest of symphonies this, but surely one of the most beautiful, and for a wonder musicians do not cherish a grudge against it because it is popular. How could it be anything else? It was admirably played, and the andante gave special opportunity for displaying the wonderful quality of the solo winds in the orchestra.

The "Leonora" overture, No 3, by Beethoven, is also an old favorite here, and none the less welcome. Where is there an overture that shows a more vivid imagination, more vigor and force, or richer subject matter. Every measure is a new delight, and one never wearies of it. No selection on the program was better played than this, and the performance was remarkable both for spirit and finish. Mr Paur is evidently especially at home in Beethoven. The piquant and charming "Minuet of Will-o'-the-wisps" and "Waltz of Sylphs" from Berlioz's "The Damnation of Faust," which have never been surpassed as the expression of the fancy in music, were played with delicacy and grace, and evidently relished exceedingly. Of the "Rienzi" overture nothing need be said except that it was played with splendid vim, and that the great orchestral climax was irresistible in its sweep.

The string orchestra showed its strength in the beautiful serenade by Volkmann, with 'cello obligato, which was a happy addition to the original program. It is one of the strongest and most poetic works in the 'cellist's repertory, with a singularly wild and plaintive note in some of its strains. The antiphonal melody of the andante with its moving rhythm works up to a magnificent effect as it is tossed back and forth from violoncello to violins. The solo part was finely played by Alvin Schroeder, who has no superior as a 'cellist. Mr Adamowski also had a chance for some beautiful obligato work in the Gounod "Ave Maria," which he kindly volunteered to play for the singer of the evening, Miss Gertrude Franklin. Miss Franklin made her first appearance in Springfield last evening and was cordially received. She has a voice of good quality, and does sober, artistic work. The only moderately interesting aria from "The Taming of the Shrew," by Goetz, she sang with a true dramatic conception, and she produced a good effect in the familiar "Ave Maria," although her voice is not quite of the type to follow the peculiarly sweet tone of Mr Adamowski's violin to the best advantage. To sum up, the concert was good, very good, with one or two selections a little out of the ordinary it would have been great. The chief points of possible improvement would have been the elimination of one or two somewhat hackneyed things, and the addition of at least one novelty, and perhaps of a full symphony in place of Schubert's exquisite torso. It is to be hoped that these superb orchestral concerts may become an annual feature of our musical season.

From "The Record", Sunday, Jan. 26th.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's third popular matinee at the Academy of Music yesterday was rendered notable by the reappearance of Mme. Amalie Materna upon the Philadelphia stage. Those opera-goers who witnessed the anniversary ovation extended to this famous Wagnerian soprano upon her last visit to this city (with Conductor Damrosch two years ago) cannot have forgotten the sincere fervor of that tribute. An enthusiastic welcome greeted her yesterday when she threaded her way to the front down the aisle of instruments, and a gracious remembrance of her old-time glory might have been detected in the stormy applause. Not that her singing of the two Wagner numbers, "Isolde's Love-Death" and Bruennhilde's dying speech over Siegfried, was not performed in praiseworthy fashion; indeed, her soprano seems in the short interval of years to have regained more of its original volume and beauty, while its compass is as magnificent as ever; but it was a severe ordeal to place her voice against such a massive orchestral background. Nevertheless, in the dramatic "Goetterdammerung" music she revealed her great sustaining power (a scena in which she was last heard, by the bye). It has now been nearly 32 years since this Styrian prima donna made her debut, and it was two decades ago that she made herself world-famous by her Bruennhilde at the Baireuth Festival. Lillie Lehman, her great rival in the role, is still singing (at Vienna), while a new Bruennhilde has made her advent in Marie Brema (now with Damrosch). The beautiful instrumental prelude to "Tristan and Isolde" was most suggestively interpreted by Conductor Paur. As a balance to this crucial dose of Wagner, he fittingly chose Tschaikowsky's "1812" Overture and Saint-Saens' "Danse Macabre" (Dance of Death)—two inspiringly picturesque compositions. The overture, which celebrates the repulse of the Napoleonic invasion of Russia, treats the Marseillaise tune most delightfully with a naive drowning of its fragmentary echoes ever and anon in the whirlwind of strings and embattled wood winds. The cannonading episode was slightly theatrical, but the use of the bell in the coda was, if queer, decidedly stirring. Beethoven's familiar "Egmont" overture was also supplemented by a novelty in Bizet's "Patrie," with its briefly-developed melody.

From "The Press", Sunday, Jan. 26th.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave another popular matinee yesterday afternoon before a large audience. This is the program:

Beethoven .....Overture, "Egmont"
Wagner, Vorspiel and Liebestod, from "Tristan and Isolde"
Tschaikowsky .....Overture, "1812"
Wagner, Monologue from the "Gotterdammerung"
Saint-Saens .....Danse Macabre"
Bizet.....Overture, "La Patrie"

This does not strike one as a strictly "popular" program, nor did it appear so to all the audience. While Mme. Materna has never been excelled as a dramatic singer in Wagnerian roles, advancing years have detracted from her earlier standard, but she still remains a powerful singer and her two numbers were given yesterday in a way to please Wagnerian idolators, though it is to be feared they did not make up a large portion of the audience.

The Egmont overture is ever a delight and the Danse Macabre is a stirring composition. The "1812" overture was played last season and was well received again.

The orchestra played with unusual vigor. Never before has it given such a volume of tone as during two of the numbers. The concert, on the whole, was very enjoyable.

From "The Inquirer", Sunday, Jan. 26th.

Mr. Paur's choice of popular music at yesterday afternoon's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the Academy of Music, was, to say the least, peculiar, not that it was not an attractive programme, for it was; but to sandwich the "liebes-tod" from Tristan and Isolde, with its emotional effect and tragic character, between "Egmont" and Tschaikowsky's circus-like overture, "1812," and then "Brunhilde's" speech over "Seigfried" in the Gotterdaemmerung between Tschaikowsky and Saint-Saens' extraordinary "Danse Macabre," seemed a little jarring. Beethoven began the programme and Bizet's overture, "Patrie," closed it, and Madame Materna, to whom nature has been more than generous, was the vocal relief. Her method in Wagnerian declamation is excellent, and she brought out all the beauty of the music yesterday, and sang it with most conscientious expression. The Tschaikowsky overture was rendered in fine spirit and so were the oddities of Saint-Saens. But after all Materna was the hit of the concert, for she is really "Brunnhilde."

News 1/11

Boston Symphony Concert.

The third concert in the series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is announced for Wednesday evening, January 22, and also the 135th performance of this famous organization and the 36th in this city. It will be a noteworthy event musically because of the reappearance on the concert stage of Mr. Rafael Joseffy, who now for five years has been in retirement. Mr. Joseffy was easily the leading pianist in this country at the time of his withdrawal, and there is every reason to believe that he will at once return to his former triumphs.

Courier Ex

[illegible] January 22, the [illegible] Orchestra, will give its [illegible] performance of this season, the [illegible] performance, and its 26th in this [illegible]. Of unusual interest to the patrons of these concerts will be the announcement that Mr. Rafael Joseffy, after five years of retirement from the concert field, will make his reappearance. Mr. Joseffy will be remembered as the leading pianist in this country at the time of his withdrawal, and, as he has not allowed his great talent to lie idle, it is safe to assume that he will at once resume his old position as one of the greatest favorites among all our soloists.

Mr. Joseffy was born in Miskolcz, Hungary, in 1853. He had for his first teacher in Leipzic the famous Moscheles, and for his second the equally great Tausig. Joseffy's great genius enabled him to accomplish in a brief time what talent can acquire only with years of hardest study, and he became famous after but a single trip through Holland and Germany.

Mr. Joseffy, some months ago, appeared with the Thomas Orchestra in Chicago, and scored a most remarkable triumph. Two weeks ago, in the regular series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Providence, R. I., which was Mr. Joseffy's initial performance with this orchestra since his re-entering the concert field, another brilliant success was recorded.

Boston Symphony Orchestra. | MUSIC HALL.

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

Third Concert, Wednesday Evening, Jan. 22, at 8.15 precisely.

.... SOLOIST ....

MR. RAFAEL JOSEFFY.

Tickets now on sale at Albert's, 13 North Charles street.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 2.

The Symphony Concert.

The Symphony Orchestra gave its thirteenth concert of the season, last night, in Music Hall. The following was the programme:

Symphony No. 1, E-flat major.....Goldmark
Elizabeth's Greeting, "Tannhauser".....Wagner
Suite No. 2, E-minor, "Indian".....McDowell
Legend from "Lakme".....Delibes
Overture, "Dimitri Donskoi".....Rubinstein
Soloist, Mme. Melba.

A very large audience was present, but whether it came to hear Mr. MacDowell's new suite, or to feast its eyes on Melba, is a question that cannot be answered. Unfortunately for the art, a large number of music patrons receive delight and satisfaction only through sight; they go to see the famous artist, not to hear the work of art, and the pervading comment is: "Did you see her jewels?" not "Did you hear her voice?" Fortunately, on the present occasion both those who came to see and to hear had most pleasant occupation.

The novelty of the evening was Mr. MacDowell's Indian suite, which is a most fascinating work of art. It is interesting to know that he went to the American Indians for his themes; but this neither adds to nor detracts from the merits of his work. Subject matter gathered from the negroes or from the hitherward migrating Indian does not make American music; and, after all, if the music is of fine quality, it makes little difference under what heading it is placed. "Schools" in music, like in painting, serve a certain useful purpose, but provided we are given a Mozart or a Michel Angelo, we can enjoy the products of their genius without greatly concerning ourselves with their nationality. This is only a roundabout way of uttering the truism that there is no nationality in art, but at the same time it excuses us from entering into a historical and an ethnological disquisition, which would be prodigal in words and deficient in nutriment. Mr. MacDowell went to the wigwam for his themes, but he used them like a civilized artist.

What first strikes up in Mr. MacDowell's suite is its high seriousness, a seriousness that is at the base of all soundness in art. The work rings with sincerity; it is filled with ideas—a very high compliment at the present day, when technique is supposed to be ample exercise for mental and emotional vacuity—and at not infrequent intervals suggests the poet as well as the fine thinker. The music is imaginative; the themes are marked enough to stimulate thought in a particular direction but not marked enough to dictate its laws to fancy, if any one, for example, believes that the third movement is a scalp dance, the credit or blame of the discovery lies with the hearer and not with the composer. And this third movement is filled with strength, vigor and fire; the second movement is delightful in its sweet tenderness and poetic feeling. The fourth movement, "dirgelike, mournfully," is full of large imaginings, in its grasp of space and decided yet vague and mournful picturesqueness, it suggests a De Quincey opium dream set to music. The orchestration of the work is masterly, brilliant, and of rare artistic worth; learning may be found for the seeking, but it is one of Mr. MacDowell's merits as an artist that he subordinates technique to ideas, uses it as a means, and not as the end. Dignity, rare originality in the development of the themes, richness and appropriateness of coloring, technical skill of the highest order, poetic imagination, surety of hand, power, passion and sweetness, these are some of the characteristics of Mr. MacDowell's Suite which is surely one of the most promising and valuable work that recent American art has yet produced.

Of Melba, the incomparable, there is nothing new to say, her voice, and her art are of exquisite quality and her witchery is irresistible. To listen to her was a delight, and her fascinating work more than merited the wild and enthusiastic applause it won.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN ...
VOL. XCIX., NO. 33.

SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 2, 1896.

LARGEST OF THIS SEASON.

Symphony Concert Attracts a Great Audience.

Every Available Seat and All Standing Room in Music Hall Occupied—Mme. Melba the Soloist—Two Interesting Novelties Introduced in the Programme.

Every available bit of space for either sitting or standing was occupied in Music Hall last evening, despite the depressing and discouraging state of the weather and the miserable condition of the streets. The audience was the largest that has attended a Boston Symphony concert this season. The programme performed was:

Symphony, "Rustic Wedding".....Goldmark
Elisabeth's Greeting, "Tannhauser"....Wagner
Suite No. 2, "Indian," op. 48.E. A. MacDowell
Bell song, "Lakme".....Delibes
Overture, "Dimitri Donskoi".....Rubinstein

Mme. Melba was the soloist. There were two novelties, Mr. MacDowell's suite and the Rubinstein overture, neither of which had been heard at these concerts before. The suite is in five movements, and its title pertains to it because the thematic material of the work has been suggested, for the most part, by Indian melodies. It may be stated at once that the instrumentation throughout is masterly in the best sense of the word; that the composer is prolific in original devices of orchestration and unhackneyed effects of tone color; that his workmanship is fine, and that there is enough and to spare of poetic sentiment in the composition. Unfortunately, it is not clear in meaning. Mr. MacDowell is said to deny distinctly all intention of writing anything of the nature of "programme music" in this suite, and yet, what it is all about is as sorely in need of description as is the most pronounced example of such music.

There is little, if anything, in the work, except the orchestration, that makes itself understood on a first hearing. Here and there is a suave and tender gleam of tunefulness, a fragment of melody that bids fair to become interesting, but it vanishes almost before it takes form. There is much musicianship, but little music. There is a wealth of color but no discoverable reason for it. The modulations frequently surprise by their ingenuity and their newness; but when all is over one remembers nothing but tone color, modulation and strongly marked rhythms, piquant and otherwise, to no lucid end that is apparent. The suite shows the thoroughly skilled artist, sure of hand, unfailing in finding just the right way in which to express his thoughts, high of aim and scrupulously conscientious in a desire to appeal to what is loftiest in his art; but here he has exhibited more of cleverness than of what is understood as inspiration. In brief, the work verges at times closely on tiresomeness, and its affluence of rich color at length becomes monotonous through lack of contrast.

It may faithfully set forth the impressions excited in the composer by the Indian melodies he has taken for themes, but it has the faults of all impressionism in demanding that the artist's standpoint shall be first discovered and then viewed sympathetically. A second hearing may induce a more favorable impression of the work in regard to the composer's invention, but one hearing excites only admiration for his technical knowledge and the skill with which he uses it. The audience listened to it attentively, but it was moved to no very marked enthusiasm except of a complimentary nature. It was beautifully and effectively played, and at its close there was a persistent call for Mr. MacDowell, but he did not appear.

A charming reading was given of Goldmark's always delightful symphony. The lovely slow movement was exquisitely given, and the finale was rendered with a fine, a rhythmic swing, and a brilliancy that were unsurpassable. Mme. Melba was received with a storm of plaudits. Her singing of the Wagner air did not show her at her best. The music is not of the kind in which she excels. She sang it with the finish, the purity of intonation and the beauty of method that characterize all that she does, but something more of power and largeness of style were needed to do the music full justice. When it was over she was recalled many times, and was given a profusion of roses and other flowers. In the bell songs she easily redeemed herself. Here she was perfectly at home, and the florid music was trilled forth with that perfection of method and graceful charm of style that are her peculiar possessions. The performance roused her hearers to a pitch of excited enthusiasm, and they applauded until she had come forward again and again to bow her acknowledgments and to receive more roses.

The programme for the next concert is: Fantasy, Schubert; concerto for violin in D minor, Vieuxtemps; prelude to act I., "Lohengrin," Wagner; symphonic poem, "Tasso," Liszt. The soloist is to be Mr. M. Marsick.

Boston Evening Transcript.

SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 2, 1896.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

First Performance Here of MacDowell's 2d Suite.

A Very Large Audience Applauds Melba Wildly.

The program of the 13th Symphony Concert was as follows;

Symphony No. 1, in E-flat major, "Rustic Wedding," Op. 26.....Goldmark
Elisabeth's Greeting, from "Tannhäeuser".....Wagner
Suite No. 2, in E-minor, "Indian," Op. 48 (MS.).....MacDowell
(First time at these concerts.)
1. With much dignity and character; legend-like. Twice as fast; with decision.
2. Softly, tenderly.
3. With rough vigor; almost savagely.
4. Dirge-like, mournfully.
5. Swift and light.

Legend of the Pariah's Daughter, from "Lakmé".....Delibes
Overture to "Demetrius of the Don"...Rubinstein
(First time.)

The feature of last evening's concert was the first performance in Boston of MacDowell's "Indian" suite, which was first played in New York by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Jan. 23, of this year.

An eminent critic in New York laid considerable stress on the fact that the thematic material of this work was suggested for the most part by Indian melodies. By "Indian" is here meant the North American Indian. Mr. MacDowell himself acknowledges his indebtedness, and at the same time suggests that the occasional similarity between these themes and Northern European themes is "a direct testimony in corroboration of Thorfinn Karlsefni's Saga."

We go to a concert to hear music, not to study folk-lore. A composer has a right to take themes that suit his purpose, wherever he may find them. Mr. MacDowell may have received his themes from that hale old chief Not-Afraid-Of-A-Drum; he may have had copies of tunes originally poured into a phonograph by some jesting and retired warrior; or he may have secured them through the courtesy of Mr. Edward Everett Rice meditating an Indian burlesque; wherever and in what manner he got them is of little interest to the musician, who asks this one question, "What did Mr. MacDowell do with them after he got them?"

For the arts of the Indians are medicine and the use of arms. Our composers are not Indians; our audiences are not Indians. To our musical public an Indian tune has only an exotic interest. Composers in this country that wish to build up a national school of music on either Indian, negro, creole, or Canadian folk-songs are pursuing a chimera.

Mr. MacDowell himself has made no pretension to this wish; he is too sane and at the same time too imaginative a composer. He took the themes, and, using them, he painted tonal pictures in the impressionistic school. This music is not program music in the vulgar sense. He has not even given his five pictures titles. The hearer can find in these tonal pictures what he pleases, or, as for that, he is not obliged to look at them.

This music undoubtedly perplexed and disturbed many last evening. I have no doubt that some of Mr. MacDowell's warm admirers were staggered. It is perhaps to be regretted that this remarkable work was sandwiched between two tunes sung by an adored prima donna, for on such a "gala night" an audience is not in the most receptive or appreciative mood for listening to a new and singularly original orchestral work. I understand that Mr. MacDowell did not know of the conductor's complimentary purpose until Friday morning, and it will be remembered that in place of the "Indian" suite a suite by Godard was announced two weeks ago. I further understand that Mr. MacDowell protested against the performance last evening. It would have been better for composer and audience if the suite had been more becomingly introduced to Boston.

This suite first of all perplexed, possibly shocked, because it is full of a strong individuality that disdains the commonplace. The rare beauty and the wildness of certain harmonic progressions; the disdain for conventional modulations and cadences, the absence of anything that is cheaply pretty or sentimental; the avoidance of familiar effects; the extraordinary feeling for nuances—for Mr. MacDowell, like Verlaine, is the man of the shade not the color; all these attributes that are the glory of the work no doubt seemed strange, perhaps bizarre to many. Yet I know of few modern compositions that are so utterly free from the taint of insincerity, from the grievous flaw of affectation as this suite.

What a masterpiece is that interruption in the third movement! How full of unearthly suggestion! How exquisite the tenderness of the second movement! How noble is the melancholy of the dirge! In this whole suite there is no trace of crudeness; there is no awkwardness erased, and yet apparent; the thoughts are the musical thoughts of high imagination; the expression is that of the sure and serene master.

There are here no echoes of Raff, or Wagner, or Bizet, or Brahms, men that have each influenced mightily the musical thought of today. There is the voice of one composer; a virile, tender voice that does not stammer, does not break, does not wax hysterical; the voice of a composer that not only must needs pour out that which has accumulated within him, but knows all the resources of musical oratory—in a word, the voice of MacDowell.

* * *

The other orchestral numbers need not detain us. The pretty suite—or, if you please, symphony—of Goldmark is familiar here. It is this suite that moved the impertinent "Willy" in Paris to exclaim: "This interminable Wedding should be consummated. But Germans take so much time in everything."

The overture of Rubinstein's forgotten opera is also to be forgotten, and quickly. Bubble and squeak!

* * *

Melba, applauded wildly by a great audience, has sung here to greater advantage. The Greeting of Elizabeth is not in her line; her delivery lacked breadth, dignity, true feeling. Nor does such music lend itself graciously to her undisputed but sharply defined capabilities. In the song from "Lakmé" she was more at her ease, and more the mistress of her eminent art. But in this air the brilliancy of her colorature was not as dazzling as on former occasions.

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Sunday Post.

SUNDAY, FEB. 2, 1896.

Thirteenth Symphony Program.

Three features were on the 13th symphony program—the first performance here of Mr E. A. MacDowell's "Indian" suite, and Rubinstein's overture to "Demetrius of the Don," and the appearance of Mme Melba as soloist. The remaining orchestral number was Goldmark's symphony "Rustic Wedding." Every seat in Music hall was occupied, and many applicants for admission were obliged to go away without gaining an entrance, all of the tickets being sold.

Mme Melba's numbers were Elizabeth's greeting from "Tannhauser," and the legend from "Lakme." Her renditions of the two arias call for no special expressions of praise at this time, for this wonderful artist has long since about exhausted the English vocabulary dicative of commendation. Brilliance and strength characterized her singing of the Tannhauser air, which, though slightly lacking in dramatic warmth, was exquisitely delicate and artistic in every phrase. The legend from "Lakme" showed her wondrous purity and flexibility of vocalization. The runs and trills so faultless and clear, the certainty in attack and the perfect expression of the various sentiments, aroused her auditors to even greater enthusiasm than did the earlier number. Melba's recalls numbered a score or more, and she was fairly showered with bouquets.

Mr MacDowell's new work entitles him to rank with the foremost writers of music of the higher forms, for the "Indian" legend is harmonized and orchestrated more elaborately than any other strictly American composition yet given here. In a note on the program the composer states that the thematic material of the work was suggested for the most part by Indian melodies, but he has not chosen any very arbitrary sub-titles to explain the exact meaning of his tone paintings. The emotions expressed admit poetic interpretations of a general but not a specific nature. The musical ideas suggest certain fancies, without a distinctive story of an Indian character, leaving to the auditor the pleasure of weaving the narrative for himself.

To the average auditor the work will prove somewhat uninteresting, for its manifold beauties cannot be discerned at a single hearing. In the first movement, suggested by Thomas Bailey Aldrich's legend "Miantowona," two festival songs are used. In the second is an Indian love song. The third movement is expressive of a scalp dance; the fourth is some kind of a dirge, and the fifth suggests merrymaking in an Indian village.

Throughout these movements there is an originality of thought shown in the orchestration, which is very attractive to the advanced musician. The various dance rhythms are quaintly conceived and vividly set forth, and the underlying characteristics of Indian melody are truthfully preserved through all the work without undue prominence given to strident phrases and measures. The legend, which is Mr MacDowell's 48th numbered composition, was played from manuscript.

The orchestra played splendidly, conductor Paur and his men evincing a special interest in interpreting this grand work of the young Boston composer. The Rubinstein overture, played for the first time, was skilfully treated, the peculiarities of the writer being clearly shown. The stormy periods before the free fantasia were admirably smooth and vigorous, and the work of the brasses in the finale was notably harmonious, despite the fortissimo character of the phrases. In the Goldmark symphony the 13 variations were deftly given by the different contingents. In the third part of this number the clarinets and horns did splendid work. The introduction to the "Tannhauser" aria was given faultlessly.

At the concerts this week Mr M. Marsick, the eminent violinist, will be the soloist. The program will be as follows: Schubert, "Fantasy;" Vieuxtemps, concerto for violin in D minor; Wagner, prelude to act I, "Lohengrin;" Liszt, symphonic poem, "Tasso."

[86]

Herald 1/2

Joseffy to Play Here.

Wednesday evening, January 22, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its third performance of this season, the 1,384th performance, and its 36th in this city. Of unusual interest to the patrons of these concerts will be the announcement that Mr. Rafael Joseffy, after five years of retirement from the concert field, will make his reappearance. Mr. Joseffy will be remembered as the leading pianist in this country at the time of his withdrawal, and, as he has not allowed his great talent to lie idle, it is safe to assume that he will at once resume his old position as one of the greatest favorites among all our soloists.

Mr. Joseffy was born in Miskolcz, Hungary, in 1853. He had for his first teacher in Leipzic the famous Moscheles, and for his second the equally great Tausig. Joseffy's great genius enabled him to accomplish in a brief time what talent can acquire only with years of hardest study, and he became famous after but a single trip through Holland and Germany.

Mr. Joseffy, some months ago, appeared with the Thomas Orchestra in Chicago, and scored a most remarkable triumph. Two weeks ago, in the regular series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Providence, R. I., which was Mr. Joseffy's initial performance with this orchestra since his re-entering the concert field, another brilliant success was recorded.

Boston Symphony Orchestra. | MUSIC HALL

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

Third Concert, Wednesday Evening, Jan. 22, at 8.15 precisely.

.... SOLOIST ....

MR. RAFAEL JOSEFFY.

Tickets now on sale at Albert's, 13 North Charles street.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 2.

The Symphony Concert.

The Symphony Orchestra gave its thirteenth concert of the season, last night, in Music Hall. The following was the programme:

Symphony No. 1, E-flat major.....Goldmark
Elizabeth's Greeting, "Tannhauser".....Wagner
Suite No. 2, E-minor, "Indian".....McDowell
Legend from "Lakme".....Delibes
Overture, "Dimitri Donskoi".....Rubinstein
Soloist, Mme. Melba.

A very large audience was present, but whether it came to hear Mr. MacDowell's new suite, or to feast its eyes on Melba, is a question that cannot be answered. Unfortunately for the art, a large number of music patrons receive delight and satisfaction only through sight; they go to see the famous artist, not to hear the work of art, and the pervading comment is: "Did you see her jewels?" not "Did you hear her voice?" Fortunately, on the present occasion both those who came to see and to hear had most pleasant occupation.

The novelty of the evening was Mr. MacDowell's Indian suite, which is a most fascinating work of art. It is interesting to know that he went to the American Indians for his themes; but this neither adds to nor detracts from the merits of his work. Subject matter gathered from the negroes or from the hitherward migrating Indian does not make American music; and, after all, if the music is of fine quality, it makes little difference under what heading it is placed. "Schools" in music, like in painting, serve a certain useful purpose, but provided we are given a Mozart or a Michel Angelo, we can enjoy the products of their genius without greatly concerning ourselves with their nationality. This is only a roundabout way of uttering the truism that there is no nationality in art, but at the same time it excuses us from entering into a historical and an ethnological disquisition, which would be prodigal in words and deficient in nutriment. Mr. MacDowell went to the wigwam for his themes, but he used them like a civilized artist.

What first strikes up in Mr. MacDowell's suite is its high seriousness, a seriousness that is at the base of all soundness in art. The work rings with sincerity; it is filled with ideas—a very high compliment at the present day, when technique is supposed to be ample exercise for mental and emotional vacuity—and at not infrequent intervals suggests the poet as well as the fine thinker. The music is imaginative; the themes are marked enough to stimulate thought in a particular direction but not marked enough to dictate its laws to fancy, if any one, for example, believes that the third movement is a scalp dance, the credit or blame of the discovery lies with the hearer and not with the composer. And this third movement is filled with strength, vigor and fire; the second movement is delightful in its sweet tenderness and poetic feeling. The fourth movement, "dirgelike, mournfully," is full of large imaginings, in its grasp of space and decided yet vague and mournful picturesqueness, it suggests a De Quincey opium dream set to music. The orchestration of the work is masterly, brilliant, and of rare artistic worth; learning may be found for the seeking, but it is one of Mr. MacDowell's merits as an artist that he subordinates technique to ideas, uses it as a means, and not as the end. Dignity, rare originality in the development of the themes, richness and appropriateness of coloring, technical skill of the highest order, poetic imagination, surety of hand, power, passion and sweetness, these are some of the characteristics of Mr. MacDowell's Suite which is surely one of the most promising and valuable work that recent American art has yet produced.

Of Melba, the incomparable, there is nothing new to say, her voice, and her art are of exquisite quality and her witchery is irresistible. To listen to her was a delight, and her fascinating work more than merited the wild and enthusiastic applause it won.

Herald

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR. VOL. XCIX., NO. 33.

SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 2, 1896.

LARGEST OF THIS SEASON.

Symphony Concert Attracts a Great Audience.

Every Available Seat and All Standing Room in Music Hall Occupied—Mme. Melba the Soloist—Two Interesting Novelties Introduced in the Programme.

Every available bit of space for either sitting or standing was occupied in Music Hall last evening, despite the depressing and discouraging state of the weather and the miserable condition of the streets. The audience was the largest that has attended a Boston Symphony concert this season. The programme performed was:

Symphony, "Rustic Wedding".....Goldmark
Elizabeth's Greeting, "Tannhauser".....Wagner
Suite No. 2, "Indian," op. 48.....E. A. MacDowell
Bell song, "Lakme".....Delibes
Overture, "Dimitri Donskoi".....Rubinstein

Mme. Melba was the soloist. There were two novelties, Mr. MacDowell's suite and the Rubinstein overture, neither of which had been heard at these concerts before. The suite is in five movements, and its title pertains to it because the thematic material of the work has been suggested, for the most part, by Indian melodies. It may be stated at once that the instrumentation throughout is masterly in the best sense of the word; that the composer is prolific in original devices of orchestration and unhackneyed effects of tone color; that his workmanship is fine, and that there is enough and to spare of poetic sentiment in the composition. Unfortunately, it is not clear in meaning. Mr. MacDowell is said to deny distinctly all intention of writing anything of the nature of "programme music" in this suite, and yet, what it is all about is as sorely in need of description as is the most pronounced example of such music.

There is little, if anything, in the work, except the orchestration, that makes itself understood on a first hearing. Here and there is a suave and tender gleam of tunefulness, a fragment of melody that bids fair to become interesting, but it vanishes almost before it takes form. There is much musicianship, but little music. There is a wealth of color, but no discoverable reason for it. The modulations frequently surprise by their ingenuity and their newness; but when all is over one remembers nothing but tone color, modulation and strongly marked rhythms, piquant and otherwise, to no lucid end that is apparent. The suite shows the thoroughly skilled artist, sure of hand, unfailing in finding just the right way in which to express his thoughts, high of aim and scrupulously conscientious in a desire to appeal to what is loftiest in his art; but here he has exhibited more of cleverness than of what is understood as inspiration. In brief, the work verges at times closely on tiresomeness, and its affluence of rich color at length becomes monotonous through lack of contrast.

It may faithfully set forth the impressions excited in the composer by the Indian melodies he has taken for themes, but it has the faults of all impressionism in demanding that the artist's standpoint shall be first discovered and then viewed sympathetically. A second hearing may induce a more favorable impression of the work in regard to the composer's invention, but one hearing excites only admiration for his technical knowledge and the skill with which he uses it. The audience listened to it attentively, but it was moved to no very marked enthusiasm except of a complimentary nature. It was beautifully and effectively played, and at its close there was a persistent call for Mr. MacDowell, but he did not appear.

A charming reading was given of Goldmark's always delightful symphony. The lovely slow movement was exquisitely given, and the finale was rendered with a fine, a rhythmic swing, and a brilliancy that were unsurpassable. Mme. Melba was received with a storm of plaudits. Her singing of the Wagner air did not show her at her best. The music is not of the kind in which she excels. She sang it with the finish, the purity of intonation and the beauty of method that characterize all that she does, but something more of power and largeness of style were needed to do the music full justice. When it was over she was recalled many times, and was given a profusion of roses and other flowers. In the bell song she fully redeemed herself. Here she was perfectly at home, and the florid music was trilled forth with that perfection of method and graceful charm of style that are her peculiar possessions. The performance roused her hearers to a pitch of excited enthusiasm, and they applauded until she had come forward again and again to bow her acknowledgments and to receive more roses.

The programme for the next concert is: Fantasy, Schubert; concerto for violin in D minor, Vieuxtemps; prelude to act I., "Lohengrin," Wagner; symphonic poem, "Tasso," Liszt. The soloist is to be Mr. M. Marsick.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 2, 1896.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

First Performance Here of MacDowell's 2d Suite.

A Very Large Audience Applauds Melba Wildly.

The program of the 13th Symphony Concert was as follows:

Symphony No. 1, in E-flat major, "Rustic Wedding," Op. 26.....Goldmark
Elisabeth's Greeting, from "Tannhäuser".....Wagner
Suite No. 2, in E-minor, "Indian," Op. 48 (MS.).....MacDowell
(First time at these concerts.)
1. With much dignity and character; legend-like.
Twice as fast; with decision.
2. Softly, tenderly.
3. With rough vigor; almost savagely.
4. Dirge-like, mournfully.
5. Swift and light.
Legend of the Pariah's Daughter, from "Lakmé".....Delibes
Overture to "Demetrius of the Don".....Rubinstein
(First time.)

The feature of last evening's concert was the first performance in Boston of MacDowell's "Indian" suite, which was first played in New York by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Jan. 23, of this year.

An eminent critic in New York laid considerable stress on the fact that the thematic material of this work was suggested for the most part by Indian melodies. By "Indian" is here meant the North American Indian. Mr. MacDowell himself acknowledges his indebtedness, and at the same time suggests that the occasional similarity between these themes and Northern European themes is "a direct testimony in corroboration of Thorfinn Karlsefni's Saga."

We go to a concert to hear music, not to study folk-lore. A composer has a right to take themes that suit his purpose, wherever he may find them. Mr. MacDowell may have received his themes from that hale old chief Not-Afraid-Of-A-Drum; he may have had copies of tunes originally poured into a phonograph by some jesting and retired warrior; or he may have secured them through the courtesy of Mr. Edward Everett Rice meditating an Indian burlesque; wherever and in what manner he got them is of little interest to the musician, who asks this one question, "What did Mr. MacDowell do with them after he got them?"

For the arts of the Indians are medicine and the use of arms. Our composers are not Indians; our audiences are not Indians. To our musical public an Indian tune has only an exotic interest. Composers in this country that wish to build up a national school of music on either Indian, negro, creole, or Canadian folk-songs are pursuing a chimera.

Mr. MacDowell himself has made no pretension to this wish; he is too sane and at the same time too imaginative a composer. He took the themes; and, using them, he painted tonal pictures in the impressionistic school. This music is not program music in the vulgar sense. He has not even given his five pictures titles. The hearer can find in these tonal pictures what he pleases, or, as for that, he is not obliged to look at them.

This music undoubtedly perplexed and disturbed many last evening. I have no doubt that some of Mr. MacDowell's warm admirers were staggered. It is perhaps to be regretted that this remarkable work was sandwiched between two tunes sung by an adored prima donna, for on such a "gala night" an audience is not in the most receptive or appreciative mood for listening to a new and singularly original orchestral work. I understand that Mr. MacDowell did not know of the conductor's complimentary purpose until Friday morning, and it will be remembered that in place of the "Indian" suite a suite by Godard was announced two weeks ago. I further understand that Mr. MacDowell protested against the performance last evening. It would have been better for composer and audience if the suite had been more becomingly introduced to Boston.

This suite first of all perplexed, possibly shocked, because it is full of a strong individuality that disdains the commonplace. The rare beauty and the wildness of certain harmonic progressions; the disdain for conventional modulations and cadences, the absence of anything that is cheaply pretty or sentimental; the avoidance of familiar effects; the extraordinary feeling for nuances—for Mr. MacDowell, like Verlaine, is the man of the shade not the color; all these attributes that are the glory of the work no doubt seemed strange, perhaps bizarre to many. Yet I know of few modern compositions that are so utterly free from the taint of insincerity, from the grievous flaw of affectation as this suite.

What a masterpiece is that interruption in the third movement! How full of unearthly suggestion! How exquisite the tenderness of the second movement! How noble is the melancholy of the dirge! In this whole suite there is no trace of crudeness; there is no awkwardness erased, and yet apparent; the thoughts are the musical thoughts of high imagination; the expression is that of the sure and serene master.

There are here no echoes of Raff, or Wagner, or Bizet, or Brahms, men that have each influenced mightily the musical thought of today. There is the voice of one composer; a virile, tender voice that does not stammer, does not break, does not wax hysterical; the voice of a composer that not only must needs pour out that which has accumulated within him, but knows all the resources of musical oratory—in a word, the voice of MacDowell.

* * *

The other orchestral numbers need not detain us. The pretty suite—or, if you please, symphony—of Goldmark is familiar here. It is this suite that moved the impertinent "Willy" in Paris to exclaim: "This interminable Wedding should be consummated. But Germans take so much time in everything."

The overture of Rubinstein's forgotten opera is also to be forgotten, and quickly. Bubble and squeak!

* * *

Melba, applauded wildly by a great audience, has sung here to greater advantage. The Greeting of Elizabeth is not in her line; her delivery lacked breadth, dignity, true feeling. Nor does such music lend itself graciously to her undisputed but sharply defined capabilities. In the song from "Lakmé" she was more at her ease, and more the mistress of her eminent art. But in this air the brilliancy of her colorature was not as dazzling as on former occasions.

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, FEB. 2, 1896.

Thirteenth Symphony Program.

Three features were on the 13th symphony program—the first performance here of Mr E. A. MacDowell's "Indian" suite, and Rubinstein's overture to "Demetrius of the Don," and the appearance of Mme Melba as soloist. The remaining orchestral number was Goldmark's symphony "Rustic Wedding." Every seat in Music hall was occupied, and many applicants for admission were obliged to go away without gaining an entrance, all of the tickets being sold.

Mme Melba's numbers were Elizabeth's greeting from "Tannhauser," and the legend from "Lakme." Her renditions of the two arias call for no special expressions of praise at this time, for this wonderful artist has long since about exhausted the English vocabulary indicative of commendation. Brilliancy and strength characterized her singing of the Tannhauser air, which, though slightly lacking in dramatic warmth, was exquisitely delicate and artistic in every phrase. The legend from "Lakme" showed her wondrous purity and flexibility of vocalization. The runs and trills so faultless and clear, the certainty in attack and the perfect expression of the various sentiments, aroused her auditors to even greater enthusiasm than did the earlier number. Melba's recalls numbered a score or more, and she was fairly showered with bouquets.

Mr MacDowell's new work entitles him to rank with the foremost writers of music of the higher forms, for the "Indian" legend is harmonized and orchestrated more elaborately than any other strictly American composition yet given here. In a note on the program the composer states that the thematic material of the work was suggested for the most part by Indian melodies, but he has not chosen any very arbitrary sub-titles to explain the exact meaning of his tone paintings. The emotions expressed admit poetic interpretations of a general but not a specific nature. The musical ideas suggest certain fancies, without a distinctive story of an Indian character, leaving to the auditor the pleasure of weaving the narrative for himself.

To the average auditor the work will prove somewhat uninteresting, for its manifold beauties cannot be discerned at a single hearing. In the first movement, suggested by Thomas Bailey Aldrich's legend "Miantowona," two festival songs are used. In the second is an Indian love song. The third movement is expressive of a scalp dance; the fourth is some kind of a dirge, and the fifth suggests merrymaking in an Indian village.

Throughout these movements there is an originality of thought shown in the orchestration, which is very attractive to the advanced musician. The various dance rhythms are quaintly conceived and vividly set forth, and the underlying characteristics of Indian melody are truthfully preserved through all the work without undue prominence given to strident phrases and measures. The legend, which is Mr MacDowell's 48th numbered composition, was played from manuscript.

The orchestra played splendidly, conductor Paur and his men evincing a special interest in interpreting this grand work of the young Boston composer. The Rubinstein overture, played for the first time, was skilfully treated, the peculiarities of the writer being clearly shown. The stormy periods before the free fantasia were admirably smooth and vigorous, and the work of the brasses in the finale was notably harmonious, despite the fortissimo character of the phrases. In the Goldmark symphony the 13 variations were deftly given by the different contingents. In the third part of this number the clarinets and horns did splendid work. The introduction to the "Tannhauser" aria was given faultlessly.

At the concerts this week Mr M. Marsick, the eminent violinist, will be the soloist. The program will be as follows: Schubert, "Fantasy;" Vieuxtemps, concerto for violin in D minor; Wagner, prelude to act I, "Lohengrin;" Liszt, symphonic poem, "Tasso."

[86]

American Art Journal.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, FEB. 1, 1896.

RAFAEL JOSEFFY IN BRAHMS' CONCERTO WITH THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The third concert on Friday evening, January 24th, was a memorable event, owing largely to the appearance of Rafael Joseffy as solo pianist. The program comprised Beethoven's Symphony, No. 3, in E flat "Eroica," Brahms' Pianoforte Concerto in B flat and Tschaikowsky's Overture "1812."

That the performers were handicapped by the acoustical properties of the stage is probably true. A "kind of canvas box with curtain hangings" would not assist very materially the propagation of an incomprehensible and illimitable family of sonorous waves of baffling complexity.

Still under any conditions or circumstances such an array of artists—artists in the true sense of the word—were bound to create an undying impression upon any sympathetic tympanic membrane within their locality, and this they "did to the Queen's taste." To particularize would be, from a musical standpoint, invidious, perhaps worse, but this must be done.

The orchestra, though not large, has a world wide reputation, and its high standard of excellence is everywhere acknowledged. In all its departments, strings, wood, wind, brass and instruments of percussion it is irreproachable.

Mr. Emil Paur.

Mr. Emil Paur at the present time is the conductor of this band, and in many respects he may be called an almost "ideal" conductor. He seems to recognize the fact that the highest attainments are gained when the original inspiration and intention of the composer is faithfully reproduced.

At no time was the attention of the audience centered in him except at the commencement and conclusion of a movement, when he was forced into prominence by the heartiest expressions of approval and respect by the vast concourse of grateful listeners present. He has none of those ridiculous pantomimic tricks and gestures so often seen now-a-days, in fact, nothing emanates from him to detract from the serious attention of the musical student or critic to the work as it proceeds. A better conductor would be hard to find.

The performance of the Symphony was most satisfying, although the effect of the splendid group of 'cello and "Bass" players could not be fully realized, owing to the acoustical opacity of the surroundings before mentioned.

Rafael Joseffy.

Despite the fact that the wonderful Brahms' Concerto, with its enormous technical and other difficulties, was the work selected for the reappearance of this remarkable man; it must be admitted that to the uninitiated it is not as grateful a work to either performer or audience as either of the Rubinstein or Saint-Saens Concertos.

It has everything connected with it to tax the highest powers of the soloist in a way hardly realized by those unacquainted with its unprecedented intricacies. All kinds of twisted, forced and opposite rythmic pulsations, every device and ingenuity known to pianistic art are employed to an almost bewildering extent. Mr. Joseffy's selection of this noble work shows how unselfish an artist he is, and more particularly at this time when the entire world seems to have its eyes fixed with hypnotic unmovableness on one star—a star of the first magnitude certainly—but not the only one that shines on this particular plane in the musical firmament, as was abundantly demonstrated on Friday night in the Brooklyn Academy of Music. It is, therefore, so much the more gratifying to Joseffy that, in the face of the obstacles just enumerated, he aroused his audience to a wild enthusiasm that could only be understood and appreciated by those who witnessed it. It would, perhaps, have been better had he responded to the most persistent calls of the audience for an "encore." It would have been no trouble to him and to them it meant a great deal.

His performance was a wonderful one. An immense technique coupled with true musicianship in all its branches combine to make Mr. Joseffy a pianist of the very first rank. There is nothing more that can or need be said. He is great!

The "1812" overture, by Tschaikowsky, was played by the Symphony Orchestra, and their efforts were adequately crowned by a storm of applause and a universal sentiment that of the laurels they have already gained nothing was lost.

The concert altogether emphasized the already existing impression that American musicians have nothing to fear from the "war scare," for it demonstrated the fact that the "wise men who came from the East" some time ago did not go back.

JOHN H. GOWER,
Mus. Doc. Oxon.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

In 1881 a music-loving citizen of Boston, actuated only by a desire to present good music in the best way, and fortunately possessed of means to carry out his desire, conceived the idea of a large permanent orchestra which should give each year an extended series of concerts in Music Hall, Boston, and make an occasional visit to the adjacent New England cities. The idea was acted upon, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra thus began its existence. To-day what was then a Boston organization has grown to be a national pride; an orchestra whose name and fame are known in every cultured city in the world, and one dependent upon no subsidy from the public exchequer, as is the case in all of the European cities.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra had been in existence five years, and was already half way through its sixth season, before it paid its first visit to New York, Feb. 14, 1887. Since then forty-two concerts have been given here, fifteen in Steinway Hall, fifteen in Chickering Hall, five in the Carnegie Music Hall, and five in the Metropolitan Opera House, in regular series, and two extra concerts, one on the evening of Sunday, March 27, 1892, at the Metropolitan Opera House, given jointly with Paderewski in aid of the Washington Arch fund, and the second at the Madison Square Garden Concert Hall on the evening of Monday, May 2, of the same year, when D'Albert was the soloist.

Of the forty-two concerts, eleven were given under the leadership of Wilhelm Gericke, twenty-one under Nikisch, and ten under the leadership of the present conductor, Mr. Emil Paur.

Mr. George Henschel was the first conductor of the orchestra and retained the position for three years. In 1885 he went to London, and in a few years became the leader of a large orchestra there.

Mr. Henschel's successor was Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, who came from Vienna, and to this second leader can be attributed much of the wonderful precision and finish of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Five years of untiring zeal and persistent striving for absolute perfection of ensemble, during which time he spared neither the orchestra nor himself, and Mr. Gericke returned to Vienna, leaving behind him the stamp of a skill so marvellous that it can not be effaced.

The third and youngest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was Arthur Nikisch, a Hungarian, leader of the orchestra at the Stadt Theatre at Leipsic, the first opera house in that city. His leadership continued four years. One thing the Boston Symphony Orchestra has always done for its conductors, it has given to them a greater renown than was theirs when they assumed control. Henschel, Gericke, and Nikisch must all own that a greater fame attended their return to Europe because of their association with America's first orchestra. Nikisch, on leaving Boston, was appointed director of the Royal Opera and also conductor of the orchestra at Budapest, but has just accepted a more congenial position as the conductor of the Gewandhaus Concerts at Leipsic.

When Arthur Nikisch left the Stadt Theatre in Leipsic to come to Boston he was succeeded by the same man who followed him as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the present leader, Mr. Emil Paur. It is also worthy of comment that Mr. Nikisch and Mr. Paur played at the same desk as first violinists under Mr. Gericke, at the very same Stadt Theatre, several years before. Mr. Paur enters upon his third year with the orchestra this season.

Some of the famous soloists who have appeared with the orchestra in New York are: Lilli Lehmann, Eames, Nordica, Mme. Henschel, Emma Juch, Mme. Nikisch, Wyman, Brema, Edmands, Aus der Ohe, Rivé-King, Suza Doane, Eugenia Castellano, Madge Wickham, Eugen d'Albert, Ignace Paderewski, Rafael Joseffy, Vladimir de Pachmann, F. Busoni, Pol Plancon, George Henchel, Max Heinrich, Anton Schott, Paul Kalisch, Watkin Mills, Cesar Thomson, Franz Kneisel, T. Adamowski, Fritz Giese, Anton Hekking, Alwin Schroeder.

[87]

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 2, 1896.

The thirteenth Symphony programme would have been an important one if only because it gave Boston its first hearing of Mr. E. A. MacDowell's new "Indian" suite, which has already had the honor of meeting the patronizing and encyclopædic approbation of New York criticism. The Tribune is particularly learned in its remarks, and gives information as to the sources of the thematic material which may have come instructively to the composer himself; for his own prefatory note and the details in the programme-book (presumably supplied by him) do not so much as hint at what Mr. Krehbiel asserts as facts. Be this as it may, Mr. MacDowell's suite is a great and valuable contribution to American music, and one to be ranked far above Mr. Dvorak's hybrid "American" symphony.

Its "Indian" is of course the aborigine of this continent, and its five parts give the very mood and spirit of some great phases of his character and life, even though the composer has not labelled them to his will, as Olivia was to inventory her features. The Iowas or the Iroquois may have created some of the themes as the Tribune declares, but the expressions of savagery, wild pathos, desolate gloom, fierce excitement, lonesome melancholy, furious activity, quaint emotion and eager festivity are Mr. MacDowell's own.

First of American composers we have always held him to be in respect of original thought, forceful enunciation, introspective temperament, unusual fancy, dainty conceit and intense forcefulness. But his writing has not always been clear, temperate and apposite. Sometimes he has seemed to waste himself upon comparatively insignificant topics and to complicate a naturally simple conception into involved and harassed deductions. In this suite he is at his strongest and best. The Indian nature, for all its many passions, yet moved in narrower and deeper cut grooves than a more civilized disposition would, and Mr. MacDowell has been forced therefore to concentrate himself, to seek intensity rather than fantasy and the single-mindedness of primitive peoples instead of the vagrant fancy of poetical or rhapsodical nations. The first movement is of a legendary and mystical character; and although its suggestion is said to have come from Aldrich's "Miantowona," we were more reminded by it of the early cantos of "Hiawatha," wherein are recounted the wild sources and characteristic qualities of the legends which breathe the voices of mountain, prairie, bird, beast, water and wind and woodland. The second is of tenderer and softer type and might well stand for the milder influences which even the savage felt and could respond to. Then comes a moment (marked to be played "with rough vigor, almost savagely") which can easily be understood to represent the uprising and gathering of fierce and destructive passions. In it one seems to hear the leap of the brave in the war-dance, and can fancy the whirling of the tomahawk as the hideous battle-paint shines in the lurid firelight. A moment of awful depression comes just before the movement ends, as if in warning and augury of some fearful fate; then the riotous revelry begins again. A gloomy and saddening dirge, weird, remote and impressive with its strange, dull reiterations of isolated notes, follows. Then the suite ends with what is clearly a high revelry "with dances and delight."

Mr. MacDowell has wisely abstained from any programme nomenclatures. He has merely prefixed to each movement a brief indication of the manner of its rendering and then left it to tell its own story and to make its own way according to the knowledge, the imagination and the sympathy of the listener's nature. And surely that must be but a dull or untaught mind which does not find in these movements, distinct and perfect each, some trait or representative of that powerfully marked and tenaciously maintained individuality which differentiated the North American Indian—as a race, we mean, taking no account of tribal peculiarities,—from every other savage man upon the globe. And so, too, it must be a rather unresponsive nature which does not yield to the sway of the moods with which the composer has imbued his pages, so powerfully and pervadingly.

The orchestra has been admirably used for the composer's purposes. Occasionally,—and this especially in the second movement,—one feels the influence of Raff, for whose instrumentation Mr. MacDowell has a great liking, we believe. But for the most part the treatment is independent and individual. There are some adaptations of tone color and some choice of instrumental types which come almost like inspirations. Such, for instance, are the rattle of the cymbals under the snare-drum sticks: the remote, lonely lament of horn and trumpet; the bell-like beats of penetrating monotones; the solitary entrances of flute and clarinet in the war-dance; the union of the shrillest and the dullest tones in the same measures; the surly imperiousness of the muted horn and the persistent, palpitating trills which override the theme in the first movement. These devices and others, so scattered through the suite that it would take too long to locate them here, are not by any means all Mr. McDowell's inventions; but their application is always artfully and closely significant and often uniquely effective. In fact, the whole score is wonderfully well-knit together; and, considering how wide its range really is, it seems in many pages absolutely compressed by a masterful hand. It may not be a popular work—at first one could hardly expect it to be—but it is a noble, potent, poetic and spiritual one.

There was another novelty on the programme—Rubinstein's overture to "Demetrius of the Don," an opera celebrating the prowess of the Russian Emperor Dimitri, who beat the Tartars on the Don, some six hundred years ago. It is noisy, battlesome, rough and crushing in temper and manner, and not interesting or consequential enough for a second hearing, although it served very well to play the audience out.

The only other orchestral number was Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding" symphony, which took up too much time at the top of a programme rather unduly long. It was beautifully and appropriately played as were the other pieces, the suite receiving an especially careful, symmetrical and appreciative reading.

Mme. Melba sang. The house was simply crammed and she was received with extreme cordiality and recalled again and again with all fervor until it seemed as if she must have walked a half mile in her trips between the ante room and the stage. She brought new music—for her—in Elizabeth's greeting song from "Tannhäuser," and the "Indian bell" air from "Lakme." There is nothing else to do but extol again the elegant perfection, the unclouded purity, the effortless delivery and the complete command which dwell in her voice and manner. To the Wagner air she gave a large simplicity and a volume of tone so enhanced that it stirred a telling vibrato in the more resonant notes, and to the "Lakme" floriture a fine, flying distinctness which left nothing to be desired. One could only wonder why she had not used that exquisite vehicle for her art before and oftener.

At the next concert Mr. Marsick will make his Boston debut in the D-minor violin concerto of Vieuxtemps, and the orchestra will play a Schubert fantasy, the first prelude in "Lohengrin" and Liszt's "Tasso."

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 3, 1896.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the thirteenth symphony concert, given last Saturday evening in the Music Hall, was as follows:

Goldmark: Symphony No. 1, in E-flat major, "Rustic Wedding," opus 26.
Wagner: Elisabeth's Greeting, from "Tannhäuser."
MacDowell: Suite No. 2, in E minor, "Indian," opus 48 (MS.)
Delibes: The Legend of the Pariah's Daughter, from "Lakmé."
Rubinstein: Overture to "Dimitri Donskoi."
Mme. Melba was the singer.

Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding" is not the most interesting work in the world; neither is it the least so. When one hears of the enormous care Goldmark is said to bestow upon his compositions, and of his searching self-criticism, one is a little inclined to wonder that the results he obtains are not more striking. When this "Rustic Wedding" of his was first given here, some years ago, we could find little in it; and longer and closer acquaintance with the work has not much increased our respect for it. There are moments of beauty, especially of cleverness, in it; but we cannot but find it pretty tedious for the most part.

Mr. MacDowell's new "Indian" suite is a curious work. Perhaps the most curious thing about it is that Mr. MacDowell should have written it; for, if we mistake not, he is not in the least bitten with the now popular fad for barbarous folk-tunes, and far prefers music of civilized origin and character. How conscious he was, in writing this suite, of the handicap under which his talent labored in trying to transmute his authentic North American Indian thematic material into something recognizable as modern music, we do not know; but to the listener the handicap is apparent enough. Mr. MacDowell admits the resemblance of some of these Indian tunes to Norse and Russian melodies; and, in hearing them, we could not but feel, as we did in listening to the negro themes in Dr. Dvorak's "From the New World" symphony, the most barbarous tunes, of no-matter-what origin, have so much in common that it takes an expert to recognize anything very specific in their musical character. To the experienced musical ethnologist the Indian melodies chosen by Mr. MacDowell may present some features which differentiate them from other savage or semi-barbarous themes; but to the ordinary musician their general barbarousness is about all that is noteworthy in them. We personally could not help finding these Indian tunes not only irredeemably hideous, but terribly tedious. What Mr. MacDowell has done with them is no doubt interesting—as all clever work is interesting—but seldom more than this. The first movement has moments of great beauty and impressiveness; but the rest of the suite left us cold and unmoved. We could not but feel all the while that the composer had made a serious mistake in thus trying to make a silk purse out of a sow's ear. No doubt a second or third hearing might reverse our judgment; but at present we feel as if Mr. MacDowell had been trying to do the undoable.

Rubinstein's "Dimitri Donskoi" overture has its admirers; we find it dull and rather characterless. The early date of its composition made us hope for more melodic invention and more snap in style.

Mme. Melba sang Elisabeth's scene from the second act of "Tannhäuser" superbly; with noble breadth and simplicity of style and great dignity of expression. Perhaps her performance on Friday afternoon was just a thought finer than on Saturday evening; the audience was certainly more responsive at the public rehearsal than at the concert. Friday afternoon was the first time in our experience that this particular selection has aroused any enthusiasm in an audience. Mme. Melba's singing of the Legend from Delibes's "Lakmé" was superb; saving a slip or two in intonation in the concluding staccato phrases, superb at every point. The audience went fairly wild over it.

The next programme is: Schubert, Fantasia; Vieuxtemps, concerto for violin, in D minor; Wagner, introduction to Act I. of "Lohengrin;" Liszt, symphonic poem, "Tasso." Mr. M. Marsick will be the violinist.

American Art Journal.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, FEB. 1, 1896.

RAFAEL JOSEFFY IN BRAHMS' CONCERTO WITH THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The third concert on Friday evening, January 24th, was a memorable event, owing largely to the appearance of Rafael Joseffy as solo pianist. The program comprised Beethoven's Symphony, No. 3, in E flat "Eroica," Brahms' Pianoforte Concerto in B flat and Tschaikowsky's Overture "1812."

That the performers were handicapped by the acoustical properties of the stage is probably true. A "kind of canvas box with curtain hangings" would not assist very materially the propagation of an incomprehensible and illimitable family of sonorous waves of baffling complexity.

Still under any conditions or circumstances such an array of artists—artists in the true sense of the word—were bound to create an undying impression upon any sympathetic tympanic membrane within their locality, and this they "did to the Queen's taste." To particularize would be, from a musical standpoint, invidious, perhaps worse, but this must be done.

The orchestra, though not large, has a world wide reputation, and its high standard of excellence is everywhere acknowledged. In all its departments, strings, wood, wind, brass and instruments of percussion it is irreproachable.

Mr. Emil Paur.

Mr. Emil Paur at the present time is the conductor of this band, and in many respects he may be called an almost "ideal" conductor. He seems to recognize the fact that the highest attainments are gained when the original inspiration and intention of the composer is faithfully reproduced.

At no time was the attention of the audience centered in him except at the commencement and conclusion of a movement, when he was forced into prominence by the heartiest expressions of approval and respect by the vast concourse of grateful listeners present. He has none of those ridiculous pantomimic tricks and gestures so often seen now-a-days, in fact, nothing emanates from him to detract from the serious attention of the musical student or critic to the work as it proceeds. A better conductor would be hard to find.

The performance of the Symphony was most satisfying, although the effect of the splendid group of 'cello and "Bass" players could not be fully realized, owing to the acoustical opacity of the surroundings before mentioned.

Rafael Joseffy.

Despite the fact that the wonderful Brahms' Concerto, with its enormous technical and other difficulties, was the work selected for the reappearance of this remarkable man; it must be admitted that to the uninitiated it is not as grateful a work to either performer or audience as either of the Rubinstein or Saint-Saens Concertos.

It has everything connected with it to tax the highest powers of the soloist in a way hardly realized by those unacquainted with its unprecedented intricacies. All kinds of twisted, forced and opposite rythmic pulsations, every device and ingenuity known to pianistic art are employed to an almost bewildering extent. Mr. Joseffy's selection of this noble work shows how unselfish an artist he is, and more particularly at this time when the entire world seems to have its eyes fixed with hypnotic unmovableness on one star—a star of the first magnitude certainly—but not the only one that shines on this particular plane in the musical firmament, as was abundantly demonstrated on Friday night in the Brooklyn Academy of Music. It is, therefore, so much the more gratifying to Joseffy that, in the face of the obstacles just enumerated, he aroused his audience to a wild enthusiasm that could only be understood and appreciated by those who witnessed it. It would, perhaps, have been better had he responded to the most persistent calls of the audience for an "encore." It would have been no trouble to him and to them it meant a great deal.

His performance was a wonderful one. An immense technique coupled with true musicianship in all its branches combine to make Mr. Joseffy a pianist of the very first rank. There is nothing more that can or need be said. He is great!

The "1812" overture, by Tschaikowsky, was played by the Symphony Orchestra, and their efforts were adequately crowned by a storm of applause and a universal sentiment that of the laurels they have already gained nothing was lost.

The concert altogether emphasized the already existing impression that American musicians have nothing to fear from the "war scare," for it demonstrated the fact that the "wise men who came from the East" some time ago did not go back.

JOHN H. GOWER,
Mus. Doc. Oxon.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

In 1881 a music-loving citizen of Boston, actuated only by a desire to present good music in the best way, and fortunately possessed of means to carry out his desire, conceived the idea of a large permanent orchestra which should give each year an extended series of concerts in Music Hall, Boston, and make an occasional visit to the adjacent New England cities. The idea was acted upon, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra thus began its existence. To-day what was then a Boston organization has grown to be a national pride; an orchestra whose name and fame are known in every cultured city in the world, and one dependent upon no subsidy from the public exchequer, as is the case in all of the European cities.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra had been in existence five years, and was already half way through its sixth season, before it paid its first visit to New York, Feb. 14, 1887. Since then forty-two concerts have been given here, fifteen in Steinway Hall, fifteen in Chickering Hall, five in the Carnegie Music Hall, and five in the Metropolitan Opera House, in regular series, and two extra concerts, one on the evening of Sunday, March 27, 1892, at the Metropolitan Opera House, given jointly with Paderewski in aid of the Washington Arch fund, and the second at the Madison Square Garden Concert Hall on the evening of Monday, May 2, of the same year, when D'Albert was the soloist.

Of the forty-two concerts, eleven were given under the leadership of Wilhelm Gericke, twenty-one under Nikisch, and ten under the leadership of the present conductor, Mr. Emil Paur.

Mr. George Henschel was the first conductor of the orchestra and retained the position for three years. In 1885 he went to London, and in a few years became the leader of a large orchestra there.

Mr. Henschel's successor was Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, who came from Vienna, and to this second leader can be attributed much of the wonderful precision and finish of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Five years of untiring zeal and persistent striving for absolute perfection of ensemble, during which time he spared neither the orchestra nor himself, and Mr. Gericke returned to Vienna, leaving behind him the stamp of a skill so marvellous that it can not be effaced.

The third and youngest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was Arthur Nikisch, a Hungarian, leader of the orchestra at the Stadt Theatre at Leipsic, the first opera house in that city. His leadership continued four years. One thing the Boston Symphony Orchestra has always done for its conductors, it has given to them a greater renown than was theirs when they assumed control. Henschel, Gericke, and Nikisch must all own that a greater fame attended their return to Europe because of their association with America's first orchestra. Nikisch, on leaving Boston, was appointed director of the Royal Opera and also conductor of the orchestra at Budapest, but has just accepted a more congenial position as the conductor of the Gewandhaus Concerts at Leipsic.

When Arthur Nikisch left the Stadt Theatre in Leipsic to come to Boston he was succeeded by the same man who followed him as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the present leader, Mr. Emil Paur. It is also worthy of comment that Mr. Nikisch and Mr. Paur played at the same desk as first violinists under Mr. Gericke, at the very same Stadt Theatre, several years before. Mr. Paur enters upon his third year with the orchestra this season.

Some of the famous soloists who have appeared with the orchestra in New York are: Lilli Lehmann, Eames, Nordica, Mme. Henschel, Emma Juch, Mme. Nikisch, Wyman, Brema, Edmands, Aus der Ohe, Rivé-King, Suza Doane, Eugenia Castellano, Madge Wickham, Eugen d'Albert, Ignace Paderewski, Rafael Joseffy, Vladimir de Pachmann, F. Busoni, Pol Plancon, George Henchel, Max Heinrich, Anton Schott, Paul Kalisch, Watkin Mills, Cesar Thomson, Franz Kneisel, T. Adamowski, Fritz Giese, Anton Hekking, Alwin Schroeder.

[87]

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 2, 1896.

The thirteenth Symphony programme would have been an important one if only because it gave Boston its first hearing of Mr. E. A. MacDowell's new "Indian" suite, which has already had the honor of meeting the patronizing and encyclopædic approbation of New York criticism. The Tribune is particularly learned in its remarks, and gives information as to the sources of the thematic material which may have come instructively to the composer himself; for his own prefatory note and the details in the programme-book (presumably supplied by him) do not so much as hint at what Mr. Krehbiel asserts as facts. Be this as it may, Mr. MacDowell's suite is a great and valuable contribution to American music, and one to be ranked far above Mr. Dvorak's hybrid "American" symphony.

Its "Indian" is of course the aborigine of this continent, and its five parts give the very mood and spirit of some great phases of his character and life, even though the composer has not labelled them to his will, as Olivia was to inventory her features. The Iowas or the Iroquois may have created some of the themes as the Tribune declares, but the expressions of savagery, wild pathos, desolate gloom, fierce excitement, lonesome melancholy, furious activity, quaint emotion and eager festivity are Mr. MacDowell's own.

First of American composers we have always held him to be in respect of original thought, forceful enunciation, introspective temperament, unusual fancy, dainty conceit and intense forcefulness. But his writing has not always been clear, temperate and apposite. Sometimes he has seemed to waste himself upon comparatively insignificant topics and to complicate a naturally simple conception into involved and harassed deductions. In this suite he is at his strongest and best. The Indian nature, for all its many passions, yet moved in narrower and deeper cut grooves than a more civilized disposition would, and Mr. MacDowell has been forced therefore to concentrate himself, to seek intensity rather than fantasy and the single-mindedness of primitive peoples instead of the vagrant fancy of poetical or rhapsodical nations. The first movement is of a legendary and mystical character; and although its suggestion is said to have come from Aldrich's "Miantowona," we were more reminded by it of the early cantos of "Hiawatha," wherein are recounted the wild sources and characteristic qualities of the legends which breathe the voices of mountain, prairie, bird, beast, water and wind and woodland. The second is of tenderer and softer type and might well stand for the milder influences which even the savage felt and could respond to. Then comes a moment (marked to be played "with rough vigor, almost savagely") which can easily be understood to represent the uprising and gathering of fierce and destructive passions. In it one seems to hear the leap of the brave in the war-dance, and can fancy the whirling of the tomahawk as the hideous battle-paint shines in the lurid firelight. A moment of awful depression comes just before the movement ends, as if in warning and augury of some fearful fate; then the riotous revelry begins again. A gloomy and saddening dirge, weird, remote and impressive with its strange, dull reiterations of isolated notes, follows. Then the suite ends with what is clearly a high revelry "with dances and delight."

Mr. MacDowell has wisely abstained from any programme nomenclatures. He has merely prefixed to each movement a brief indication of the manner of its rendering and then left it to tell its own story and to make its own way according to the knowledge, the imagination and the sympathy of the listener's nature. And surely that must be but a dull or untaught mind which does not find in these movements, distinct and perfect each, some trait or representative of that powerfully marked and tenaciously maintained individuality which differentiated the North American Indian—as a race, we mean, taking no account of tribal peculiarities,—from every other savage man upon the globe. And so, too, it must be a rather unresponsive nature which does not yield to the sway of the moods with which the composer has imbued his pages, so powerfully and pervadingly.

The orchestra has been admirably used for the composer's purposes. Occasionally,—and this especially in the second movement,—one feels the influence of Raff, for whose instrumentation Mr. MacDowell has a great liking, we believe. But for the most part the treatment is independent and individual. There are some adaptations of tone color and some choice of instrumental types which come almost like inspirations. Such, for instance, are the rattle of the cymbals under the snare-drum sticks: the remote, lonely lament of horn and trumpet; the bell-like beats of penetrating monotones; the solitary entrances of flute and clarinet in the war-dance; the union of the shrillest and the dullest tones in the same measures; the surly imperiousness of the muted horn and the persistent, palpitating trills which override the theme in the first movement. These devices and others, so scattered through the suite that it would take too long to locate them here, are not by any means all Mr. McDowell's inventions; but their application is always artfully and closely significant and often uniquely effective. In fact, the whole score is wonderfully well-knit together; and, considering how wide its range really is, it seems in many pages absolutely compressed by a masterful hand. It may not be a popular work—at first one could hardly expect it to be—but it is a noble, potent, poetic and spiritual one.

There was another novelty on the programme—Rubinstein's overture to "Demetrius of the Don," an opera celebrating the prowess of the Russian Emperor Dimitri, who beat the Tartars on the Don, some six hundred years ago. It is noisy, battlesome, rough and crushing in temper and manner, and not interesting or consequential enough for a second hearing, although it served very well to play the audience out.

The only other orchestral number was Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding" symphony, which took up too much time at the top of a programme rather unduly long. It was beautifully and appropriately played as were the other pieces, the suite receiving an especially careful, symmetrical and appreciative reading.

Mme. Melba sang. The house was simply crammed and she was received with extreme cordiality and recalled again and again with all fervor until it seemed as if she must have walked a half mile in her trips between the ante room and the stage. She brought new music—for her—in Elizabeth's greeting song from "Tannhauser," and the "Indian bell" air from "Lakme." There is nothing else to do but extol again the elegant perfection, the unclouded purity, the effortless delivery and the complete command which dwell in her voice and manner. To the Wagner air she gave a large simplicity and a volume of tone so enhanced that it stirred a telling vibrato in the more resonant notes, and to the "Lakme" fioriture a fine, flying distinctness which left nothing to be desired. One could only wonder why she had not used that exquisite vehicle for her art before and oftener.

At the next concert Mr. Marsick will make his Boston debut in the D-minor violin concerto of Vieuxtemps, and the orchestra will play a Schubert fantasy, the first prelude in "Lohengrin" and Liszt's "Tasso."

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 3, 1896.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The programme of the thirteenth symphony concert, given last Saturday evening in the Music Hall, was as follows:

Goldmark: Symphony No. 1, in E-flat major, "Rustic Wedding," opus 26.
Wagner: Elisabeth's Greeting, from "Tannhäuser."
MacDowell: Suite No. 2, in E minor, "Indian," opus 48 (MS.)
Delibes: The Legend of the Pariah's Daughter, from "Lakmé."
Rubinstein: Overture to "Dimitri Donskoi."
Mme. Melba was the singer.

Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding" is not the most interesting work in the world; neither is it the least so. When one hears of the enormous care Goldmark is said to bestow upon his compositions, and of his searching self-criticism, one is a little inclined to wonder that the results he obtains are not more striking. When this "Rustic Wedding" of his was first given here, some years ago, we could find little in it; and longer and closer acquaintance with the work has not much increased our respect for it. There are moments of beauty, especially of cleverness, in it; but we cannot but find it pretty tedious for the most part.

Mr. MacDowell's new "Indian" suite is a curious work. Perhaps the most curious thing about it is that Mr. MacDowell should have written it; for, if we mistake not, he is not in the least bitten with the now popular fad for barbarous folk-tunes, and far prefers music of civilized origin and character. How conscious he was, in writing this suite, of the handicap under which his talent labored in trying to transmute his authentic North American Indian thematic material into something recognizable as modern music, we do not know; but to the listener the handicap is apparent enough. Mr. MacDowell admits the resemblance of some of these Indian tunes to Norse and Russian melodies; and, in hearing them, we could not but feel, as we did in listening to the negro themes in Dr. Dvorak's "From the New World" symphony, the most barbarous tunes, of no-matter-what origin, have so much in common that it takes an expert to recognize anything very specific in their musical character. To the experienced musical ethnologist the Indian melodies chosen by Mr. MacDowell may present some features which differentiate them from other savage or semi-barbarous themes; but to the ordinary musician their general barbarousness is about all that is noteworthy in them. We personally could not help finding these Indian tunes not only irredeemably hideous, but terribly tedious. What Mr. MacDowell has done with them is no doubt interesting—as all clever work is interesting—but seldom more than this. The first movement has moments of great beauty and impressiveness; but the rest of the suite left us cold and unmoved. We could not but feel all the while that the composer had made a serious mistake in thus trying to make a silk purse out of a sow's ear. No doubt a second or third hearing might reverse our judgment; but at present we feel as if Mr. MacDowell had been trying to do the undoable.

Rubinstein's "Dimitri Donskoi" overture has its admirers; we find it dull and rather characterless. The early date of its composition made us hope for more melodic invention and more snap in style.

Mme. Melba sang Elisabeth's scene from the second act of "Tannhäuser" superbly; with noble breadth and simplicity of style and great dignity of expression. Perhaps her performance on Friday afternoon was just a thought finer than on Saturday evening; the audience was certainly more responsive at the public rehearsal than at the concert. Friday afternoon was the first time in our experience that this particular selection has aroused any enthusiasm in an audience. Mme. Melba's singing of the Legend from Delibes's "Lakmé" was superb; saving a slip or two in intonation in the concluding staccato phrases, superb at every point. The audience went fairly wild over it.

The next programme is: Schubert, Fantasia; Vieuxtemps, concerto for violin, in D minor; Wagner, introduction to Act I. of "Lohengrin;" Liszt, symphonic poem, "Tasso." Mr. M. Marsick will be the violinist.

Established 1813.

The Official Paper of the State.

The Official Paper of the City.

MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 3, 1896.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The 730th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was chiefly made up of modern dissonances ranging from Indian yells to Russian groans; yet it was of sustained interest and drew forth the largest of audiences and a continuity of applause. The programme began innocently enough with Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding Symphony," which is a suite rather than a true symphony; in his second symphony Goldmark came much closer to the sonata-form which is the essence of symphonic construction.

The "Rustic Wedding" opens with a march and variations, and the latter serve excellently to pass the orchestra in review. Of especial excellence was the pizzicato of the violins and the oboe variation; M. Sautet is practically master of two schools of blowing the oboe (and our second oboist, Mr. Mueller, is also an artist of great excellence) giving at times the broad tone, almost like the English horn, which suits to the German school of scoring, and at times the delicate thin tone which the French composers prefer. In this work he appropriately gave the tender and lighter quality.

Most charming in character and in their execution were the imitative phrases of the second movement, the daintiest of free canonic effects, and here the rustic character is never lost; but the earnest and soulful character of the scene in the garden might have told of the passion of Francesca and Paolo, or Tristan and Isolde, instead of a pair of country lovers. There was a ragged attack in the woodwind in the last movement and the work could have had a freer interpretation as regards tempi and shading, but it won much applause and was the only melodic bit of orchestral composition upon the programme.

Nordica has led the way from Bellini and Donizetti to Wagner, and Melba took the same path in this concert, giving as her first number "Elizabeth's Greeting" from "Tannhaeuser." She was welcomed into the Wagnerian fold with a mighty outburst of applause. But the Greeting to the Hall was after all, rather a tame one; one would have greeted even an ante-room in a broader manner. The pure sweet, and flexible voice is not cast in the heroic mould, and one measure sung by Materna or Lehmann would have shown the hopelessness of the excursion of the singer into this new path. Nevertheless, there was much applause and a floral tribute at the end of the number.

In her second number, the Parah song, though the voice seemed a trifle jaded from from "Lakme," Melba was decidedly more at home; her intonation in the difficult unaccompanied passages was perfect, al- the effort made in the Wagner number, and was not at its very best. What an odd resemblance to Beckmesser's serenade there is in certain phrases of this song! Melba's enunciation was a model of clearness, and towards the end she seemed to triumph over her difficulties, and the voice, which had lacked resonance before, became brilliant and effective in the final cadenza. Recall after recall followed, but in accordance with the excellent rule at these concerts, no encore was given.

Among the orchestral numbers the chief interest centred upon MacDowell's "Indian Suite." This suite was first played in New York, and aroused great enthusiasm there. This enthusiasm the present writer cannot share; he believes it to be a wild-goose chase to seek out North American Indian themes with a view of founding a national school; the plantation negroes have a musical repertoire, the Indians have not; the negroes are to some extent fond of melody and are musically gifted, the Indians are not; while the researches of Messrs. Baker, Fillmore, Krehbiel, Cushing and Fewkes, among the Indian musical records and traditions are of ethnological value, they will never produce anything of permanent musical worth.

It did not greatly matter where the themes of this suite came from, for they were treated with such musical skill that their development was bound to become respectable and interesting. A French cook once made a most palatable dish out of an old glove; "it's all in the sauce," said he; and the beauty of this suite was "all in the sauce," and was in no degree to be credited to the Indians. The work suggested a Wagnerian tribe of Indians, armed with oboes, bassoons and clarinettes, engaged in fierce combat with another tribe armed with contrabasses and violins. If Mr. Paur had only conducted with a tomahawk!!

There was masterly scoring everywhere in the work. The first movement gave some strange rustling effects upon the violins, sull ponticello, and the baleful tones of the muted horns were heard in profusion. The second movement seemed to suggest a dusky Minnehaha of Scotch relationship, for the "Scotch snap" (a 16th note followed by a dotted 8th note) was freely used. There was much beauty in this movement.

The next movement was most remarkable for its vigor. The spectral color of the deepest register of the clarinette ("Chalumeau," it is called) is well understood by Mr. MacDowell, and he made free use of it in this strange ghost-dance. There was a strange dying-away in this movement, and as the muted horn had signified more trouble, it may be supposed that some victim was expiring either of the Indian themes or by other slow torture; after which some wild yells and a half-dozen blows of a tomahawk (tutti) brought the movement to an end.

The fourth movement ("Dirgelike, Mournfully") is very impressive. It begins with a bell-like organpoint, or stationary tone, which gives a solemn monotony which is very effective and is added to by the reiteration of a figure of three notes which is as full of evil as the leading figure in "Carmen," and that portentous interval, the augmented second, is frequently in evidence. It would be easy to satirize the repetitions and the monotony, but there is a certain majesty of sorrow and brooding here which forbids flippancy of treatment.

Not so the finale, which seemed noisy and meaningless on a first hearing and might well cause the government to send the orchestra back to their reservation. There was a pizzicato theme here that was outre enough to have been Indian or Cochinchinese. Altogether one cannot but feel that Mr. MacDowell has exhibited his [illegible] genius, but in a wrong direction. The "national music" idea is running rampant at present, but it is not to be sought [illegible] themes; possibly we are [illegible] a people to expect a na- [illegible] of music of any kind.

[illegible] ended with Russian dis- [illegible] given by Rubinstein in his [illegible] Donskoi." It was a [illegible] outline, but its only but [illegible] was compelled to be in its second [illegible] had been an Indian work [illegible] was a needless climax [illegible] of the theme after the [illegible] The work was excellent- [illegible] and spice of its very dissonant [illegible] made a good impression. But [illegible] North American Indian yells, [illegible] wailings, and Russian dis- [illegible] began to long for a change, [illegible] dominant-tonic progression, or a [illegible] major scale would have been [illegible] welcomed.

Louis C. Elson.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 5, 1896.

The program of the thirteenth Symphony concert last night was as follows:

Symphony, Rustic Wedding.....Goldmark
Elizabeth's Greeting, Tannhäuser.....Wagner
Suite No. 2, E minor, Indian.....MacDowell
(First time here.)
Legend of the Pariah's Daughter, Lakmé.....Delibes
Overture, Demetrius Donskoi.....Rubinstein
(First time at these concerts.)

The feature of the concert was the first performance here of Mr. MacDowell's new suite. Melba was the singer, and she undoubtedly drew the crowd, which was great; but singers come and go; they are the sport of fashion; their memory is a tradition, dear to the old, challenged by irreverent youth; while a serious composition by a strong man goes to succeeding generations for judgment.

As it was a "prima donna" night, Mr. MacDowell was unfortunate, for his suite was sandwiched in between two tunes for the soprano; and an audience on such an occasion is in no mood to consider thoughtfully a new work, especially when it is of such an unconventional character.

That Mr. MacDowell took some or all of his thematic material from North American Indians does not interest me in the slightest. I go to a concert to hear music, not to study or discuss folk lore.

Then these "Indian tunes." Might not some retired warrior avenge himself upon the white oppressor by inventing some melody on the spur of the moment? Somehow or other, I always associate Indian tunes with Mr. Krehbiel. I see him in close confab with a plug hatted venerable chief, as they discuss folk songs over a jug of firewater. The phonograph is close at hand. The firewater begins to work, and old Three-Tones-in-His-Voice chirps like a cricket. "Did you ever hear this, my pale-faced brother? Listen to the Scotch snap." The phonograph records the wondrous melody. Another drink, another folk song, another burst of confidence to the phonograph. Why, the little jug is an anthology!

Mr. MacDowell may take his themes where he pleases, from an intoxicated chief who weeps at the name of J. F. Cooper; from Brer Krehbiel and his fellow explorers; from a relative of George Catlin; or from the rich storehouse of Mr. de Koven. The question is, What does Mr. MacDowell do with the tunes after he takes them home?

You have already answered this question, and I shall not go over the same ground. His suite seems to me the strong work of a singularly imaginative man, who is a master of expression. He paints his pictures; he gives them no specific titles. Find what you please in them. How often must it be repeated, There are no ideas in music except musical ideas? If Mr. MacDowell puts at the head of a movement "dirge-like, mournfully," and you have for the title of the suite "Indian," there is sufficient stimulus to your own intelligence.

I find in this suite, as in other works of the composer, rare beauty and entrancing wildness in harmonic progressions; disdain for conventional modulations, cadences, figures, padding dear to pedagogues; the avoidance of pretty shopkeeping talk. Here is no thought of crudeness; no awkwardness imperfectly erased; no meaningless correctness that maddens; no clutching after the bizzare. Even in the most frantic moments there is the assurance of serenity that stands apart and looks on at the orgy.

And I hear an individual voice. 'Tis a virile, tender voice; a voice that does not stammer, does not whine, does not wax hysterical; the voice of a composer who not only must pour out that which has accumulated within him, but knows all the resources of musical oratory. 'Tis the voice of MacDowell.

* * *

When now the pretty symphony of Goldmark is played I remember the impertinence of "Willy" in Paris: "This interminable Marriage should be consummated. But the Germans take so much time in everything."

The overture to Rubinstein's forgotten opera deserves to be forgotten. How the composer strains and twists! And the result is—nothing.

Melba was not at her vocal ease in the air from Tannhäuser. If her performance was without heroic proportions, it was, on the other hand, not frankly tender and womanly. In the air of Delibes she was more the mistress of her acknowledged art; yet the brilliancy of her coloratura was not as dazzling as on former occasions. This is not surprising; she has worked hard this season.

PHILIP HALE.

The Independent, N. Y. C.
JAN 30 1896
Music.

BY H. IRENÆUS STEVENSON.

The Boston Symphony's third local concert of the season offered a program of particular interest. The symphony was Tschaikofsy's strange and beautiful swan-song, the "Pathetique" Opus 74; and the fourth number was Liszt's Second Hungarian Rhapsody. The two middle numbers of the program were in honor of the work, and of the participation in the concert of Mr. Edward A. MacDowell, one of the most aggressive and interesting figures among contemporary American music-writers—a man who is in many respects hors ligne as to such a category. Mr. MacDowell played his own admirable Concerto No, 1, which has long been a favorite here and in European musical centers; and in his remarkable "Indian Suite" for orchestra, Opus 48, was brought forward for the first time at a public musical entertainment. This new compositio n is yet unpublished. It will be in print presently by Messrs. Breitkopff & Haertel. Peculiar individuality is imparted to its score by the fact that Mr. MacDowell has used genuine, and in certain cases very ancient, airs of the Iroquois, the Iowas and other of our aboriginal tribes, as his themes. The Suite stands thus in the same catalog with Dvorak's "From the New World" Symphony, in which typical Negro motives occur; tho Mr. MacDonald's work improves on Dvorak's, inasmuch as the American writer transcribes, not merely imitates. It is a Suite of great felicity in ideas and treatment, either while the matter be of musical archeology or of the composer's own evolving. Its success was complete. It was given with much refinement and spirit; in fact, the orchestra was in a "form" lately unusual, during all the evening. The concert's audience was of fair size. Mr. Paur directed.

Additional to the incidents above noted the Dannreuther Quartet gave, on Thursday evening, one of its standard concerts of chamber-music. The program included Rubinstein's Quartet, Op. 17, No. 2, a Prelude and Minuet by Andreoli, and Richard Strauss's Quartet (with pianoforte part), Op. 13, in C minor. The pianist was Mr. Paolo Gallico. At Chickering Hall one of the invitation-concerts that the Messrs. Chickering & Co. are giving from time to time in the winter, drew an attentive audience, the artists being Miss Margaret Lemon, Mr. Ernst Perabo and Mr. Tonzo Sauvage. Miss Antoinette Szumofska was heard in a second pianoforte recital, assisted by Mr. Franz Ondricek, with whose assistance was, in especial, played Beethoven's Sonata in C minor for piano and violin.

The Boston Traveler

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 3, 1896.

The Symphony Concert.

Fifteenth season Boston Symphony Orchestra; thirteenth concert. Melba, soloist. The programme:

Symphony No. 1, in E-flat major "Rustic Wedding," Op. 26.....Goldmark
Elizabeth's Greeting, from "Tannhauser," Wagner
Suite No. 2, in E-minor, "Indian," Op. 48 (MS.) (first time).....MacDowell
Legend of the Pariah's Daughter, from "Lakme".....Delibes
Overture to "Demetrius of the Don," (first time.....Rubinstein

Naturally, the Melba portion of the concert was responsible for the enormous crowd that sifted into every cranny of Music Hall; the diva is not often heard at Symphony prices. So fair maidens stood in long lines earlier in the week in order to have the blessed privilege of purchasing an admission ticket which might or might not mean a seat later. But having gained entrance, they pounded their hands together in a way to cause deep joy to the gloviers, and they helped swell the diapason that called and recalled the song-bird after an exhibition of her golden notes. Melba's style is not wholly adapted to the Elizabeth song and much lower-priced German women have made it more effective. Temperament counts for so much with Wagner. The "Lakme" piece was sung with crisp and delightful fluency and the "Bell Song" was an excellent exploiter of Melba's amazing technique and ease of delivery. She was called out more times than is necessary to recount.

If Melba was the magnet for the great "outside," the new "Indian" suite of McDowell was of infinitely more importance to the musicians and music-lovers of the town. The common order of things had been reversed in this case, and New York had had a first hearing of the work. Apparently it puzzled some of the brethren of Gotham, who evidently looked for a sort of musical transcription of Hiawatha, with a scalp-motif and a tomahawk scherzo. But, if there is nothing to startle or to stir the emotions in this peculiar suite, it certainly has the aboriginal themes and modes in plenty. That they are very like the north European melodies needs no explanation. Mr. McDowell has used his material as he should. There is a monotony in all this, it is true, but, starting with the premise of a work in a certain mode, you must stick to your mode. The only question arises is whether the accomplishment is after all an addition to music. We are inclined to think not. This "Indian" suite has plenty of the elements of fine musicianship, and of good taste and has a flavor of its composer's own; yet, for the most part, it is quite near to being dull. Perhaps such thematic treatment could not be otherwise, if adhered to with fidelity. But the music is thoughtful and well worth hearing at any rate.

The "Rustic Wedding" symphony is as fresh and beautiful as ever, and it was played with the exquisite daintiness it demands.

The Rubinstein overture, new to Boston, might well have remained unknown to Boston. It is mostly turmoil, and contains nothing that would do credit to the composer.

THE HOMESTEAD,
FEBRUARY 1, 1896.

Springfield News and Gossip.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Symphony concert on Tuesday evening was a series of delights, like a gallery of magnificent pictures, each masterful in its way. It is nothing against them that so many of them were not new pictures, for the old masters still hold sway in both the limning and the musical arts. One must have little acquaintance with orchestral music not to be familiar with Beethoven's Leonore symphony, No 3, Schubert's unfinished symphony, the minuet and waltz from Berlioz's Damnation of Faust, and Wagner's Rienzi overture; yet these great if not immortal works are good enough to hear again and again; one can no more tire of them than of the Sistine Madonna. It is a fair point to say that if only one Wagner selection was to be given, it should have been from his later and more characteristic works, written after he had stunned the world, so to speak, with the blare and crash of his daring innovations, but his earlier works, if not as bold as his later ones, are well worth hearing, and both Rienzi and the Flying Dutchman are full of gems and interesting as showing from what seeds his later and greater operas developed. The Volkmann serenade for string orchestra, with its sadly sweet 'cello solo, so beautifully played by Mr Schroeder, was a lovely specimen of the new school, although at some points it seemed to be too anxiously striving for novelty. The performance of all the orchestral numbers was so nearly free from blemish that we can describe it only by piling adjective upon adjective. Miss Gertrude Franklin of Boston, soprano, was a quite satisfactory soloist.

We greatly regret to learn that although the concert was fairly attended, it was not a financial success. We cannot expect first-class concerts unless the people are ready to patronize them at least to the paying point.

ANOTHER SYMPHONY CONCERT PROMISED.

Everyone who enjoyed the superb concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra Tuesday evening will be delighted to learn that arrangements have already been made for a return concert next November. The support of the concert was not all that might have been wished or expected, but it was a sufficient assurance of Springfield's appreciation of the work of this orchestra to warrant Mr Koop in making plans to include Springfield in the list of the next season's engagements. Mr Koop is deserving of no small credit for his enterprise in bringing such a costly attraction to Springfield and his efforts are certainly appreciated by the music-loving people of this city. Mr Koop's good work in bringing this company of artists to Springfield ought to result in making the coming of the Boston Symphony orchestra an annual event.

Mr Paur of the Symphony orchestra certainly shows the effect of his life in America. When he came out of city hall after the concert Tuesday night he was heard to say: "Ach! Ich muss meine carriage finden!"

[88]

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 3, 1896.

THE SY[illegible] CON[illegible]

The 730th concert of the Boston S[illegible] Orchestra was chiefly made up of modern dissonances ranging from Indian yells to Russian groans; yet it was of sustained interest and drew forth the largest of audiences and a continuity of applause. The programme began innocently enough with Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding Symphony," which is a suite rather than a true symphony; in his second symphony Goldmark came much closer to the sonata-form which is the essence of symphonic construction.

The "Rustic Wedding" opens with a march and variations, and the latter serve excellently to pass the orchestra in review. Of especial excellence was the pizzicato of the violins and the oboe variation; M. Sautet is practically master of two schools of blowing the oboe (and our second oboist, Mr. Mueller, is also an artist of great excellence) giving at times the broad tone, almost like the English horn, which suits to the German school of scoring, and at times the delicate thin tone which the French composers prefer. In this work he appropriately gave the tender and lighter quality.

Most charming in character and in their execution were the imitative phrases of the second movement, the daintiest of free canonic effects, and here the rustic character is never lost; but the earnest and soulful character of the scene in the garden might have told of the passion of Francesca and Paolo, or Tristan and Isolde, instead of a pair of country lovers. There was a ragged attack in the woodwind in the last movement and the work could have had a freer interpretation as regards tempi and shading, but it won much applause and was the only melodic bit of orchestral composition upon the programme.

Nordica has led the way from Bellini and Donizetti to Wagner, and Melba took the same path in this concert, giving as her first number "Elizabeth's Greeting" from "Tannhaeuser." She was welcomed into the Wagnerian fold with a mighty outburst of applause. But the Greeting to the Hall was after all, rather a tame one; one would have greeted even an ante-room in a broader manner. The pure sweet, and flexible voice is not cast in the heroic mould, and one measure sung by Materna or Lehmann would have shown the hopelessness of the excursion of the singer into this new path. Nevertheless, there was much applause and a floral tribute at the end of the number.

In her second number, the Parah song, though the voice seemed a trifle jaded from from "Lakme," Melba was decidedly more at home; her intonation in the difficult unaccompanied passages was perfect, although the effort made in the Wagner number, and was not at its very best. What an odd resemblance to Beckmesser's serenade there is in certain phrases of this song! Melba's enunciation was a model of clearness, and towards the end she seemed to triumph over her difficulties, and the voice, which had lacked resonance before, became brilliant and effective in the final cadenza. Recall after recall followed, but in accordance with the excellent rule at these concerts, no encore was given.

Among the orchestral numbers the chief interest centred upon MacDowell's "Indian Suite." This suite was first played in New York, and aroused great enthusiasm there. This enthusiasm the present writer cannot share; he believes it to be a wild-goose chase to seek out North American Indian themes with a view of founding a national school; the plantation negroes have a musical repertoire, the Indians have not; the negroes are to some extent fond of melody and are musically gifted, the Indians are not; while the researches of Messrs. Baker, Fillmore, Krehbiel, Cushing and Fewkes, among the Indian musical records and traditions are of ethnological value, they will never produce anything of permanent musical worth.

It did not greatly matter where the themes of this suite came from, for they were treated with such musical skill that their development was bound to become respectable and interesting. A French cook once made a most palatable dish out of an old glove; "it's all in the sauce," said he; and the beauty of this suite was "all in the sauce," and was in no degree to be credited to the Indians. The work suggested a Wagnerian tribe of Indians, armed with oboes, bassoons and clarinettes, engaged in fierce combat with another tribe armed with contrabasses and violins. If Mr. Paur had only conducted with a tomahawk!!

There was masterly scoring everywhere in the work. The first movement gave some strange rustling effects upon the violins, sull ponticello, and the baleful tones of the muted horns were heard in profusion. The second movement seemed to suggest a dusky Minnehaha of Scotch relationship, for the "Scotch snap" (a 16th note followed by a dotted 8th note) was freely used. There was much beauty in this movement.

The next movement was most remarkable for its vigor. The spectral color of the deepest register of the clarinette ("Chalumeau," it is called) is well understood by Mr. MacDowell, and he made free use of it in this strange ghost-dance. There was a strange dying-away in this movement, and as the muted horn had signified more trouble, it may be supposed that some victim was expiring either of the Indian themes or by other slow torture; after which some wild yells and a half-dozen blows of a tomahawk (tutti) brought the movement to an end.

The fourth movement ("Dirgelike, Mournfully") is very impressive. It begins with a bell-like organpoint, or stationary tone, which gives a solemn monotony which is very effective and is added to by the reiteration of a figure of three notes which is as full of evil as the leading figure in "Carmen," and that portentous interval, the augmented second, is frequently in evidence. It would be easy to satirize the repetitions and the monotony, but there is a certain majesty of sorrow and brooding here which forbids flippancy of treatment.

Not so the finale, which seemed noisy and meaningless on a first hearing and might well cause the government to send the orchestra back to their reservation. There was a pizzicato theme here that was outre enough to have been Indian or Cochin-Chinese. Altogether one cannot but feel that Mr. MacDowell has exhibited his usual genius, but in a wrong direction. The "national music" idea is running rampant at present, but it is not to be sought for in aboriginal themes; possibly we are too heterogeneous a people to expect a national school of music of any kind.

The concert ended with Russian dissonances as given by Rubinstein in his overture to "Dimitr'-Donskoi." It was a work in classical outline, but its only bit of direct melody seemed to lie in its second theme. The trombones had herculean work to do, and there was a grandiose climax with an apotheosis of the theme after the manner of Liszt. The work was excellently played and spite of its very dissonant development made a good impression. But what with North American Indian yells, East Indian wailings, and Russian discords, one began to long for a change, and a dominant-tonic progression, or a plain major scale would have been cordially welcomed.

Louis C. Elson.

The Musical Courier.
NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 5, 1896.

The program of the thirteenth Symphony concert last night was as follows:

Symphony, Rustic Wedding.....Goldmark
Elizabeth's Greeting, Tannhäuser.....Wagner
Suite No. 2, E minor, Indian.....MacDowell
(First time here.)
Legend of the Pariah's Daughter, Lakmé.....Delibes
Overture, Demetrius Donskoi.....Rubinstein
(First time at these concerts.)

The feature of the concert was the first performance here of Mr. MacDowell's new suite. Melba was the singer, and she undoubtedly drew the crowd, which was great; but singers come and go; they are the sport of fashion; their memory is a tradition, dear to the old, challenged by irreverent youth; while a serious composition by a strong man goes to succeeding generations for judgment.

As it was a "prima donna" night, Mr. MacDowell was unfortunate, for his suite was sandwiched in between two tunes for the soprano; and an audience on such an occasion is in no mood to consider thoughtfully a new work, especially when it is of such an unconventional character.

That Mr. MacDowell took some or all of his thematic material from North American Indians does not interest me in the slightest. I go to a concert to hear music, not to study or discuss folk lore.

Then these "Indian tunes." Might not some retired warrior avenge himself upon the white oppressor by inventing some melody on the spur of the moment? Somehow or other, I always associate Indian tunes with Mr. Krehbiel. I see him in close confab with a plug hatted venerable chief, as they discuss folk songs over a jug of firewater. The phonograph is close at hand. The firewater begins to work, and old Three-Tones-in-His-Voice chirps like a cricket. "Did you ever hear this, my pale-faced brother? Listen to the Scotch snap." The phonograph records the wondrous melody. Another drink, another folk song, another burst of confidence to the phonograph. Why, the little jug is an anthology!

Mr. MacDowell may take his themes where he pleases, from an intoxicated chief who weeps at the name of J. F. Cooper; from Brer Krehbiel and his fellow explorers; from a relative of George Catlin; or from the rich storehouse of Mr. de Koven. The question is, What does Mr. MacDowell do with the tunes after he takes them home?

You have already answered this question, and I shall not go over the same ground. His suite seems to me the strong work of a singularly imaginative man, who is a master of expression. He paints his pictures; he gives them no specific titles. Find what you please in them. How often must it be repeated, There are no ideas in music except musical ideas? If Mr. MacDowell puts at the head of a movement "dirge-like, mournfully," and you have for the title of the suite "Indian," there is sufficient stimulus to your own intelligence.

I find in this suite, as in other works of the composer, rare beauty and entrancing wildness in harmonic progressions; disdain for conventional modulations, cadences, figures, padding dear to pedagogues; the avoidance of pretty shopkeeping talk. Here is no thought of crudeness; no awkwardness imperfectly erased; no meaningless correctness that maddens; no clutching after the bizzare. Even in the most frantic moments there is the assurance of serenity that stands apart and looks on at the orgy.

And I hear an individual voice. 'Tis a virile, tender voice; a voice that does not stammer, does not whine, does not wax hysterical; the voice of a composer who not only must pour out that which has accumulated within him, but knows all the resources of musical oratory. 'Tis the voice of MacDowell.

* * *

When now the pretty symphony of Goldmark is played I remember the impertinence of "Willy" in Paris: "This interminable Marriage should be consummated. But the Germans take so much time in everything."

The overture to Rubinstein's forgotten opera deserves to be forgotten. How the composer strains and twists! And the result is—nothing.

Melba was not at her vocal ease in the air from Tannhäuser. If her performance was without heroic proportions, it was, on the other hand, not frankly tender and womanly. In the air of Delibes she was more the mistress of her acknowledged art; yet the brilliancy of her coloratura was not as dazzling as on former occasions. This is not surprising; she has worked hard this season.

Philip Hale.

The Independent, N. Y. C.
JAN 30 1896
Music.

BY E. IRENÆUS STEVENSON.

The Boston Symphony's third local concert of the season offered a program of particular interest. The symphony was Tschaikofsy's strange and beautiful swan-song, the "Pathetique" Opus 74; and the fourth number was Liszt's Second Hungarian Rhapsody. The two middle numbers of the program were in honor of the work, and of the participation in the concert of Mr. Edward A. MacDowell, one of the most aggressive and interesting figures among contemporary American music-writers—a man who is in many respects hors ligne as to such a category. Mr. MacDowell played his own admirable Concerto No, 1, which has long been a favorite here and in European musical centers; and in his remarkable "Indian Suite" for orchestra, Opus 48, was brought forward for the first time at a public musical entertainment. This new composition is yet unpublished. It will be in print presently by Messrs. Breitkopff & Haertel. Peculiar individuality is imparted to its score by the fact that Mr. MacDowell has used genuine, and in certain cases very ancient, airs of the Iroquois, the Iowas and other of our aboriginal tribes, as his themes. The Suite stands thus in the same catalog with Dvorak's "From the New World" Symphony, in which typical Negro motives occur; tho Mr. MacDonald's work improves on Dvorak's, inasmuch as the American writer transcribes, not merely imitates. It is a Suite of great felicity in ideas and treatment, either while the matter be of musical archeology or of the composer's own evolving. Its success was complete. It was given with much refinement and spirit; in fact, the orchestra was in a "form lately unusual, during all the evening. The concert's audience was of fair size. Mr. Paur directed.

Additional to the incidents above noted the Dannreuther Quartet gave, on Thursday evening, one of its standard concerts of chamber-music. The program included Rubinstein's Quartet, Op. 17, No. 2, a Prelude and Minuet by Andreoli, and Richard Strauss's Quartet (with pianoforte part), Op. 13, in C minor. The pianist was Mr. Paolo Gallico. At Chickering Hall one of the invitation-concerts that the Messrs. Chickering & Co. are giving from time to time in the winter, drew an attentive audience, the artists being Miss Margaret Lemon, Mr. Ernst Perabo and Mr. Tonzo Sauvage. Miss Antoinette Szumofska was heard in a second pianoforte recital, assisted by Mr. Franz Ondricek, with whose assistance was, in especial, played Beethoven's Sonata in C minor for piano and violin.

The Boston Traveler
MONDAY, FEBRUARY 3, 1896.

The Symphony Concert.

Fifteenth season Boston Symphony Orchestra; thirteenth concert. Melba, soloist. The programme:

Symphony No. 1, in E-flat major "Rustic Wedding," Op. 26.....Goldmark
Elizabeth's Greeting, from "Tannhauser," Wagner
Suite No. 2, in E-minor, "Indian," Op. 48 (MS.) (first time).....MacDowell
Legend of the Pariah's Daughter, from "Lakme".....Delibes
Overture to "Demetrius of the Don," (first time).....Rubinstein

Naturally, the Melba portion of the concert was responsible for the enormous crowd that sifted into every cranny of Music Hall; the diva is not often heard at Symphony prices. So fair maidens stood in long lines earlier in the week in order to have the blessed privilege of purchasing an admission ticket which might or might not mean a seat later. But having gained entrance, they pounded their hands together in a way to cause deep joy to the gloviers, and they helped swell the diapason that called and recalled the song-bird after an exhibition of her golden notes. Melba's style is not wholly adapted to the Elizabeth song and much lower-priced German women have made it more effective. Temperament counts for so much with Wagner. The "Lakme" piece was sung with crisp and delightful fluency and the "Bell Song" was an excellent exploiter of Melba's amazing technique and ease of delivery. She was called out more times than is necessary to recount.

If Melba was the magnet for the great "outside," the new "Indian" suite of McDowell was of infinitely more importance to the musicians and music-lovers of the town. The common order of things had been reversed in this case, and New York had had a first hearing of the work. Apparently it puzzled some of the brethren of Gotham, who evidently looked for a sort of musical transcription of Hiawatha, with a scalp-motif and a tomahawk scherzo. But, if there is nothing to startle or to stir the emotions in this peculiar suite, it certainly has the aboriginal themes and modes in plenty. That they are very like the north European melodies needs no explanation. Mr. McDowell has used his material as he should. There is a monotony in all this, it is true, but, starting with the premise of a work in a certain mode, you must stick to your mode. The only question arises is whether the accomplishment is after all an addition to music. We are inclined to think not. This "Indian" suite has plenty of the elements of fine musicianship, and of good taste and has a flavor of its composer's own; yet, for the most part, it is quite near to being dull. Perhaps such thematic treatment could not be otherwise, if adhered to with fidelity. But the music is thoughtful and well worth hearing at any rate.

The "Rustic Wedding" symphony is as fresh and beautiful as ever, and it was played with the exquisite daintiness it demands.

The Rubinstein overture, new to Boston, might well have remained unknown to Boston. It is mostly turmoil, and contains nothing that would do credit to the composer.

THE HOMESTEAD,
FEBRUARY 1, 1896.

Springfield News and Gossip.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Symphony concert on Tuesday evening was a series of delights, like a gallery of magnificent pictures, each masterful in its way. It is nothing against them that so many of them were not new pictures, for the old masters still hold sway in both the limning and the musical arts. One must have little acquaintance with orchestral music not to be familiar with Beethoven's Leonore symphony, No 3, Schubert's unfinished symphony, the minuet and waltz from Berlioz's Damnation of Faust, and Wagner's Rienzi overture; yet these great if not immortal works are good enough to hear again and again; one can no more tire of them than of the Sistine Madonna. It is a fair point to say that if only one Wagner selection was to be given, it should have been from his later and more characteristic works, written after he had stunned the world, so to speak, with the blare and crash of his daring innovations, but his earlier works, if not as bold as his later ones, are well worth hearing, and both Rienzi and the Flying Dutchman are full of gems and interesting as showing from what seeds his later and greater operas developed. The Volkmann serenade for string orchestra, with its sadly sweet 'cello solo, so beautifully played by Mr Schroeder, was a lovely specimen of the new school, although at some points it seemed to be too anxiously striving for novelty. The performance of all the orchestral numbers was so nearly free from blemish that we can describe it only by piling adjective upon adjective. Miss Gertrude Franklin of Boston, soprano, was a quite satisfactory soloist.

We greatly regret to learn that although the concert was fairly attended, it was not a financial success. We cannot expect first-class concerts unless the people are ready to patronize them at least to the paying point.

ANOTHER SYMPHONY CONCERT PROMISED.

Everyone who enjoyed the superb concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra Tuesday evening will be delighted to learn that arrangements have already been made for a return concert next November. The support of the concert was not all that might have been wished or expected, but it was a sufficient assurance of Springfield's appreciation of the work of this orchestra to warrant Mr Koop in making plans to include Springfield in the list of the next season's engagements. Mr Koop is deserving of no small credit for his enterprise in bringing such a costly attraction to Springfield and his efforts are certainly appreciated by the music-loving people of this city. Mr Koop's good work in bringing this company of artists to Springfield ought to result in making the coming of the Boston Symphony orchestra an annual event.

Mr Paur of the Symphony orchestra certainly shows the effect of his life in America. When he came out of city hall after the concert Tuesday night he was heard to say: "Ach! Ich muss meine carriage finden!"

BOSTON [illegible]
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.
FEBRUARY 2, 1896.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The last half of the season's symphonies began last night, the house being one of the largest of the season, primarily because the soloist of the occasion was none other than Melba.

The concert opened with Goldmark's Symphony No. 1, known as the "Rustic Wedding," and it probably never had a better rendering than at this time. It is a particularly joyous composition, one to which it is a delight to listen from beginning to end. The first movement presents a large number of melodious variations. This, called the wedding march, is followed successively by the bridal song, in the garden and the dance. The orchestra was at its best and the chromatic runs of the third movement taken by the various instruments in turn were as pleasing a performance of this kind as we have listened to for some time.

Melba's first selection was Elizabeth's greeting from Wagner's "Tannhauser," which was sung in a broad style and in a manner which amply showed the dramatic breadth and purity of her voice, and her work left little to be desired. Her second selection was the "Bell Song" from "Lakme," and she showed her wonderful command of technique and it was rendered in about the most brilliant manner possible.

Between the two numbers came an orchestral suite from manuscript by E. A. MacDowell, which composition the programme styled "Indian," and it was well that a key was furnished with the music, for it was difficult to tell just what the orchestra was attempting. Mr. MacDowell has given us some very good things from time to time, but in the present instance he has overreached himself. The suite is supposed to have as a groundwork the legendary music of the North American Indians, and while there are occasionally some pretty harmonies, the four movements are meaningless and thoroughly uninteresting. The composer has attempted to produce an imaginative work and in some respects he has succeeded, but so far as being at all characteristic of Indian or any other kind of music it amounts to little. The fourth movement, which is supposed to depict an Indian festival, presents a few interesting measures, but on the whole the work must be set down as a meaningless jumble of orchestration. The overture to Rubinstein's "Demetrius of the Don" finished the programme. At next week's concert Mr. M. Marsick will be the soloist, playing Vieuxtemps's concerto in D minor.

Gazette

last week was 20 per cent. more than that of the corresponding week of last year.

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 9.

The Symphony Concert.

The Symphony Orchestra gave its fourteenth concert last night, in Music Hall. The programme was:

Symphony in G major.....Haydn
Fantasia, F minor.....Schubert
(Scored for orchestra by Felix Mottl.)
Prelude to Lohengrin.....Wagner
Symphonic Poem, No. 2, Tasso.....Liszt

The programme of the evening was changed in consequence of the illness of Mr. Marsick, whose wrist incapacitated him from playing. This is to be deeply regretted, as from his playing at the Symphony rehearsal, yesterday, he gave evidence of the finest skill and taste.

Hadyn's symphony, however, was a delight to hear, doubly a delight, coming as it did at the end of a week devoted to Wagner, when overstimulated nerves were the rule, and when rest was born only of exhaustion. The work was most lovingly played, and there was no need to delve deeply to discover its beauties, or to force an admiration dictated by fashion rather than conviction.

Curiously enough Schubert's piano-forte fantasia was not "modernized" by the fine orchestral setting given to it by Mottl, and this was largely due to the fact that all music of any enduring worth is always modern. In art matters a love for beauty makes the whole world kin, and art beauty retains its youth and attractiveness for all times. It is also fortunate that the Schubert fantasia fell into reverent hands, and it is only at rare intervals one feels that the ornamentation is out of harmony with the original structure.

As will be seen, Wagner found a place on the programme and one feared to close his eyes, in dread that when he opened them again he should see the open air court of Brabrant from which he had so recently departed. One cannot escape from the suspicion that Mr. Paur is something of a satirist. "Lohengrin" twice in one week at the Boston Theatre, and then the Prelude sounding mournfully from the Symphony Orchestra stage! Of the Liszt symphonic poem it would be useless to write at this late day, criticism will not add to the number of its friends or decrease the number of its foes.

The programme for the next concert is Tschaikowsky's sixth Symphony, by request; Schumann's concerto for violoncello, and Godard's Suite No. 1, and two arias. The soloists will be Miss Kate Rolla and Mr. Leo Schulz.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.

MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 10, 1896.

The Symphony Concert — Mr. Marsick Unable to Appear.

Opera may come and opera may go, but the symphony concerts go on, like Tennyson's brook, forever. It was not to be expected that any opera season whatsoever would shake the devotion of a true and tried symphony auditor, and it was not astonishing therefore, to find the audience of Saturday quite as large as usual. Possibly, however, the appearance of a great violinist new to Boston, may have drawn many; if so, then the disappointment must have been intense when the concert orator announced in briefest fashion that Mr. Marsick was sick and could not play, and that Haydn's symphony in G (he did not particularize as to which one of the many in this key it was to be) would be performed instead of a violin solo.

It was by no means a fictitious "indisposition," such as artists sometimes are afflicted with when mundane affairs do not suit them; the great violinist has been bitten by some insect, probably a spider, during his journey to Boston, and as if inspired to do the greatest harm possible, this spider, with the whole Marsickian body to choose from, must needs take his feast on both wrists of the unfortunate musician. Spite of some slight inflammation in the arm, the violinist won a great success at Friday's rehearsal-concert, but paid for it by increased pain in the affected parts, and was obliged to go about with bandaged arms from the moment he left the concert platform.

It was as if fate had determined that a symphonic concert without a symphony should not occur in this course; had not the accident occurred there would have been only Liszt's almost formless "Tasso" to represent anything symphonic, and this more in name than in reality, for although the programme attached the name "Symphonic Poem" to the work, the word "symphonic" in its French significance (and it was in French that the adjective was used by Liszt) means simply "Orchestral."

The little Haydn symphony was welcome, spite of the fact that it replaced something of greater interest, and it was performed in a manner to do credit to Mr. Paur and his orchestra. There are not many orchestras in the world who could give such a work at a moment's notice. Especially attractive was the bright minuet with its Musette Trio, and the light-hearted simplicity of the finale had its own particular charm. The work was heartily applauded and Mr. Paur was obliged to bow his acknowledgments many times.

Schubert's "Fantasie in F minor" began the concert; it was arranged for orchestra, from the piano duet, by Felix Mottl. With the Haydn symphony superadded to this work there was a trifle too much of simple melody, but it would be manifestly unjust to animadvert on the scheme of a programme that was so unexpectedly disturbed.

The Prelude to "Lohengrin" was splendidly performed, and caused one to wish that our orchestra might sometime be heard as the New York one is at present, in connection with vocal forces, in Wagnerian opera; then, more than ever before, would the public realize the true meaning of the complex orchestration with which Wagner supports his vocal forces, and would comprehend how interdependent the two ferces are. This prelude emphasizes one of the Wagner innovations; Schumann, Berlioz, Gounod and all the other composers who deal in celestial topics, have pictured Heaven with harps; because the harp was the best instrument on earth at the time that the Scriptures were written, we find the harp alluded to in the sacred writings as the instrument of the angels. Spite of the fact that the violin had come into existence, the poets, even from mediaeval times, continued the metaphor; the composers followed suit so faithfully that there came to be a regular formula, viz:—Harps for Heaven, Piccolos for—the reverse! Wagner has broken up this tradition, and especially in this prelude, in which he gives his celestial topics upon the violins in high positions, and in harmonics, occasionally combining a sustained flute or clarinette tone with the strings, a more ecstatic and celestial tonecolor than the simple harp-tones. What might have proved a troublesome contretemps took place during the performance of this; Mr. Kneisel's E string broke during one of the earlier passages of the work; ordinarily one player, even though he be the chief violinist, would not be missed from the ensemble, but in this he was one of the four solo violins which end the work with high harmonic tones in celestial harmony, and his part was necessary. A quick exchange of violins was made and not a ripple of interruption to the flow of the composition resulted. The applause at the end of the work was very spontaneous and long-continued, and it was certainly deserved.

Liszt's "Tasso," the lament and triumph, was most brilliantly performed as the closing number of the concert. Although Liszt disdains any symphonic shape, even in the compositions, which he calls symphonies (and this is not of them) yet he is by no means as utterly without form as many of his critics claim him to be; he almost always presents well-judged contrast and continuous development; the intellectual process of ingenious treatment of themes is by no means discarded, and those who imagine that emotion rules alone in these works are sadly mistaken. Almost invariably, also, does Liszt work up a true climax at the end of his compositions, and Tasso is no exception to this rule; indeed, here the climax comes with especially legitimate force to represent the triumph of the poet.

The work was given with perfect shading, and not only was the ensemble excellent, but there were many individual points of great power. The violoncello solo was remarkably effective, and the clarinette, which the composer evidently loved and most frequently used in its spectral lower register, was splendidly played. The trumpet staccato was also strikingly clear, and the end was powerful enough to be represented by half a dozen Fs, and must have been audible in the suburbs.

Louis C. Elson.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 9, 1896.

The orchestral numbers of the fourteenth Symphony programme require no further mention than that of general commendation for the excellence of their rendering. For all were familiar—the delightfully melodious and genial fantasy in F minor which Schubert wrote for four hands at the piano and which Mott transcribed so successfully for orchestra; the prelude to "Lohengrin," offered perhaps as a tribute to the visiting German opera; and Liszt's "Tasso," sometimes poetic and sometimes merely turgid. The solo number was not unfamiliar either, for it was Vieuxtemp's fourth violin concerto. But the player was a stranger, Mr. M. Marsick, the Belgian artist. The choice of this work for his debut was wise, for his taste, style and art moved in close unison with the composition. His tone is beautifully clear and even, without too much lightness at the top of the scale or heaviness at the bottom, and his execution is easily clear and delicately distinct. He made no hard work of the many difficulties nor any appeal for admiration because of his technique, but played smoothly on as modestly as elegantly, that last word perhaps expressing better than any other single one the crowning charm of his style. In the slow movement, with its harp accompaniament, he developed a broad, bland cantabile, his double stopping in the scherzo was clear and equal, and his trills and runs were brilliant without exaggeration. It was honorable, artistic playing, and the many recalls were deserved.

On Saturday next the orchestra will repeat by request Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony and introduce a suite by Godard. Mr. Schulz will play a 'cello concerto by Schumann, and Miss Kate Rolla—an American who has been esteemed in London—will sing twice.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 9, 1896.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The program of the 14th Symphony concert, given last evening in Music Hall, Mr. Paur conductor, was as follows:

Fantasia F minor, op. 103.....Schubert
Symphony in G.....Haydn
Prelude to "Lohengrin" (Act I)...Wagner
Symphonic poem "Tasso".....Liszt

To the great disappointment of the audience Mr. Marsick, the eminent violinist, did not play the D minor concerto of Vieuxtemps. A day or two ago he was bitten on the hand, which soon began to swell. Although he was not really in condition to play at the Friday rehearsal, he appeared, to the intense enjoyment of all that heard him. He is said to have triumphed gloriously, to have charmed by purity, accuracy and, in short, by uncommon display of artistry. After the concert he was obliged to consult a physician. The awkward trifle, as he thought it, turned out to be a serious affair; for the swelling extended through the arm, and there were symptoms of blood poisoning. It is to be hoped that Mr. Marsick will soon recover and that he will be heard at a Saturday concert this season.

* * *

The familiar symphony of Haydn was substituted at a late moment, and yet it was played delightfully. With the disappearance of the solo violinist, the scheme or the program was broken into pieces; but the excellent work of the orchestra throughout the evening turned what might have been a rout into a signal victory. The fantasia of Schubert, written for the piano, and for four hands, and scored for orchestra by Felix Mottl, is an ingenious and pleasing composition. The prelude to "Lohengrin" was taken at a slower pace than is usual; yet the interest of the hearer did not flag; the details were brought out in striking relief; the climax was singularly imposing; all in all, the performance may be justly placed near that inspired performance under Mancinelli last season in Mechanics' Building, and this, indeed, is praise. A brilliant reading of Liszt's "Tasso" brought to a close one of the shortest Symphony concerts of late years.

P. H.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, FEB. 9, 1896.

Marsick at the Symphony.

The name and fame of Marsick, violin virtuoso and composer, must have preceded him, for there were uncommonly large audiences to welcome him to Music hall and the Symphony concert stage.

Nor was reasonable expectation disappointed by the artist's work. Boston has heard distinguished violinists not a few, and Marsick will hold a place of high and honorable rank in the list. He is, undoubtedly, a noteworthy exponent of the academic, not the emotional, style of playing. More nearly, perhaps, than any violinist who has appeared here within the last decade or so, he resembles Wilhelmz, though he lacks the wonderful power of that great artist.

There is nothing in the least sensational about Marsick. He is noticeably quiet and reserved in manner. But as he stands before his audience, listening apparently to his violin to see if it be in tune with the orchestra which is to accompany him, he gives one the idea that he commands all the resources of the instrument—an idea which his performance amply justifies.

Without resorting to any ad captandum devices, the artist counts upon faithfulness and correctness in interpretation rather than upon any tours de force, to arouse applause. Other violinists might give the Vieuxtemp's concerto which was his selection, yesterday, with more dash and spirit; none with greater care or skill, to interpret the composer's thought. He makes no effort to impress an audience with the idea that he is an artist of rare technique, yet no hearer can fail to realize that, for such a player, difficulties of score do not exist.

In point of vigor and directness of attack, in purity and clearness of tone, and in the brilliancy of his cadenza playing, Marsick's interpretation of the Vieuxtemp's concerto commands admiration. If he has not that fervid temperament which, from the moment an artist takes up his bow, arouses and stimulates the interest of an audience, he wins triumphs in his own way that no mere sensationalist could hope to attain.

Even the usually undemonstrative rehearsal audience was moved to enthusiastic demonstration by Marsick's playing. He was four times recalled, Mr Paur and the players of the orchestra joining heartily in the plaudits of the occasion. Marsick has unquestionably captured Boston's favor.

Schubert's fantasy in F minor, as orchestrated by Felix Mottl, formed a very agreeable opening to Mr Paur's 14th program. It was delightfully played throughout. The allegro molto moderato, in particular, could scarcely have been given with finer appreciation. On the other hand, the performance of the prelude to "Lohengrin" seemed to us a trifle disappointing in its effect, careful as was the orchestra's work. Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso," with its grandiose music, made heavy demands on the resources of the orchestra, but the players acquitted themselves with as distinguished credit as on previous presentations of this work. More need not be said in praise.

Two soloists will be heard at this week's concerts. Miss Kate Rolla is assigned two arias, and Mr Leo Schulz is to be entrusted with Schumann's concerto for violoncello. The symphony will be Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic," and a first hearing at the symphony concerts is to be given to Godard's suite, No. 1.

[illegible] 9, 1896.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The patrons of the Symphony were treated to a disappointment last night—the second one this season—in the non-appearance of M. Marsick, the violinist, who, it was announced, had been taken suddenly ill. In place of the concerto No. 4 (Vieuxtemps) Haydn's G major symphony was given. A better substitute could not have been selected, for the composition is bright and cheerful, and when given as this orchestra can give it, a lasting delight. It is clear and symmetrical throughout, and each movement is beautifully worked out. As for its interpretation, the orchestra has seldom played it better, and for his admirable reading, Mr. Paur was given the most spontaneous applause.

The Schubert fantasia, F minor, was the opening number. In this many of the instruments are frequently heard singly and in groups, and the various themes are particularly well defined, expressive and simply but effectively worked out. This, too, was greeted with considerable applause.

Out of compliment, presumably, to the Wagnerian opera season now on, the prelude to "Lohengrin" was included in the programme, and it is doubtful if the New York Symphony Orchestra, playing it but an hour or so previously at the Boston Theatre (that opera being on last night), could in any way have excelled this performance of it. More unity and perfect rhythm could scarcely be imparted to the altogether admirable reading, and with Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso, Lamento e Trionfo," one of the most uniformly excellent programmes of the season thus far was enjoyed by the audience.

At the concert next week Miss Kate Rolla and Mr. Leo Schulz will be the soloists, and Godard's suite No. 1 will be heard for the first time.

---

[89]

BOSTON POST.
The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

FEBRUARY 2, 1896.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The last half of the season's symphonies began last night, the house being one of the largest of the season, primarily because the soloist of the occasion was none other than Melba.

The concert opened with Goldmark's symphony No. 1, known as the "Rustic Wedding," and it probably never had a better rendering than at this time. It is a particularly joyous composition, one to which it is a delight to listen from beginning to end. The first movement presents a large number of melodious variations. This, called the wedding march, is followed successively by the bridal song, in the garden and the dance. The orchestra was at its best and the chromatic runs of the third movement taken by the various instruments in turn were as pleasing a performance of this kind as we have listened to for some time.

Melba's first selection was Elizabeth's greeting from Wagner's "Tannhauser," which was sung in a broad style and in a manner which amply showed the dramatic breadth and purity of her voice, and her work left little to be desired. Her second selection was the "Bell Song" from "Lakme," and she showed her wonderful command of technique and it was rendered in about the most brilliant manner possible.

Between the two numbers came an orchestral suite from manuscript by E. A. MacDowell, which composition the programme styled "Indian," and it was well that a key was furnished with the music, for it was difficult to tell just what the orchestra was attempting. Mr. MacDowell has given us some very good things from time to time, but in the present instance he has overreached himself. The suite is supposed to have as a groundwork the legendary music of the North American Indians, and while there are occasionally some pretty harmonies, the four movements are meaningless and thoroughly uninteresting. The composer has attempted to produce an imaginative work and in some respects he has succeeded, but so far as being at all characteristic of Indian or any other kind of music it amounts to little. The fourth movement, which is supposed to depict an Indian festival, presents a few interesting measures, but on the whole the work must be set down as a meaningless jumble of orchestration. The overture to Rubinstein's "Demetrius of the Don" finished the programme. At next week's concert Mr. M. Marsick will be the soloist, playing Vieuxtemps's concerto in D minor.

Gazette

last week was 20 per cent. more than that of the corresponding week of last year.

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 9.

The Symphony Concert.

The Symphony Orchestra gave its fourteenth concert last night, in Music Hall. The programme was:

Symphony in G-major.....Haydn
Fantasia, F-minor..... Schubert
(Scored for orchestra by Felix Mottl.)
Prelude to Lohengrin.....Wagner
Symphonic Poem, No. 2, Tasso.....Liszt

The programme of the evening was changed in consequence of the illness of Mr. Marsick, whose wrist incapacitated him from playing. This is to be deeply regretted, as from his playing at the Symphony rehearsal, yesterday, he gave evidence of the finest skill and taste.

Hadyn's symphony, however, was a delight to hear, doubly a delight, coming as it did at the end of a week devoted to Wagner, when overstimulated nerves were the rule, and when rest was born only of exhaustion. The work was most lovingly played, and there was no need to delve deeply to discover its beauties, or to force an admiration dictated by fashion rather than conviction.

Curiously enough Schubert's piano-forte fantasia was not "modernized" by the fine orchestral setting given to it by Mottl, and this was largely due to the fact that all music of any enduring worth is always modern. In art matters a love for beauty makes the whole world kin, and art beauty retains its youth and attractiveness for all times. It is also fortunate that the Schubert fantasia fell into reverent hands, and it is only at rare intervals one feels that the ornamentation is out of harmony with the original structure.

As will be seen, Wagner found a place on the programme and one feared to close his eyes, in dread that when he opened them again he should see the open air court of Brabrant from which he had so recently departed. One cannot escape from the suspicion that Mr. Paur is something of a satirist. "Lohengrin" twice in one week at the Boston Theatre, and then the Prelude sounding mournfully from the Symphony Orchestra stage! Of the Liszt symphonic poem it would be useless to write at this late day, criticism will not add to the number of its friends or decrease the number of its foes,

The programme for the next concert is Tschaikowsky's sixth Symphony, by request; Schumann's concerto for violoncello, and Godard's Suite No. 1, and two arias. The soloists will be Miss Kate Rolla and Mr. Leo Schulz.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.

MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 10, 1896.

The Symphony Concert — Mr. Marsick Unable to Appear.

Opera may come and opera may go, but the symphony concerts go on, like Tennyson's brook, forever. It was not to be expected that any opera season whatsoever would shake the devotion of a true and tried symphony auditor, and it was not astonishing therefore, to find the audience of Saturday quite as large as usual. Possibly, however, the appearance of a great violinist new to Boston, may have drawn many; if so, then the disappointment must have been intense when the concert orator announced in briefest fashion that Mr. Marsick was sick and could not play, and that Haydn's symphony in G (he did not particularize as to which one of the many in this key it was to be) would be performed instead of a violin solo.

It was by no means a fictitious "indisposition," such as artists sometimes are afflicted with when mundane affairs do not suit them; the great violinist has been bitten by some insect, probably a spider, during his journey to Boston, and as if inspired to do the greatest harm possible, this spider, with the whole Marsickian body to choose from, must needs take his feast on both wrists of the unfortunate musician. Spite of some slight inflammation in the arm, the violinist won a great success at Friday's rehearsal-concert, but paid for it by increased pain in the affected parts, and was obliged to go about with bandaged arms from the moment he left the concert platform.

It was as if fate had determined that a symphonic concert without a symphony should not occur in this course; had not the accident occurred there would have been only Liszt's almost formless "Tasso" to represent anything symphonic, and this more in name than in reality, for although the programme attached the name "Symphonic Poem" to the work, the word "symphonic" in its French significance (and it was in French that the adjective was used by Liszt) means simply "Orchestral."

The little Haydn symphony was welcome, spite of the fact that it replaced something of greater interest, and it was performed in a manner to do credit to Mr. Paur and his orchestra. There are not many orchestras in the world who could give such a work at a moment's notice. Especially attractive was the bright minuet with its Musette Trio, and the light-hearted simplicity of the finale had its own particular charm. The work was heartily applauded and Mr. Paur was obliged to bow his acknowledgments many times.

Schubert's "Fantasie in F minor" began the concert; it was arranged for orchestra, from the piano duet, by Felix Mottl. With the Haydn symphony superadded to this work there was a trifle too much of simple melody, but it would be manifestly unjust to animadvert on the scheme of a programme that was so unexpectedly disturbed.

The Prelude to "Lohengrin" was splendidly performed, and caused one to wish that our orchestra might sometime be heard as the New York one is at present, in connection with vocal forces, in Wagnerian opera; then, more than ever before, would the public realize the true meaning of the complex orchestration with which Wagner supports his vocal forces, and would comprehend how interdependent the two forces are. This prelude emphasizes one of the Wagner innovations; Schumann, Berlioz, Gounod and all the other composers who deal in celestial topics, have pictured Heaven with harps; because the harp was the best instrument on earth at the time that the Scriptures were written, we find the harp alluded to in the sacred writings as the instrument of the angels. Spite of the fact that the violin had come into existence, the poets, even from mediaeval times, continued the metaphor; the composers followed suit so faithfully that there came to be a regular formula, viz:—Harps for Heaven, Piccolos for—the reverse! Wagner has broken up this tradition, and especially in this prelude, in which he gives his celestial topics upon the violins in high positions, and in harmonics, occasionally combining a sustained flute or clarinette tone with the strings, a more ecstatic and celestial tonecolor than the simple harp-tones. What might have proved a troublesome contretemps took place during the performance of this; Mr. Kneisel's E string broke during one of the earlier passages of the work; ordinarily one player, even though he be the chief violinist, would not be missed from the ensemble, but in this he was one of the four solo violins which end the work with high harmonic tones in celestial harmony, and his part was necessary. A quick exchange of violins was made and not a ripple of interruption to the flow of the composition resulted. The applause at the end of the work was very spontaneous and long-continued, and it was certainly deserved.

Liszt's "Tasso," the lament and triumph, was most brilliantly performed as the closing number of the concert. Although Liszt disdains any symphonic shape, even in the compositions, which he calls symphonies (and this is not of them) yet he is by no means as utterly without form as many of his critics claim him to be; he almost always presents well-judged contrast and continuous development; the intellectual process of ingenious treatment of themes is by no means discarded, and those who imagine that emotion rules alone in these works are sadly mistaken. Almost invariably, also, does Liszt work up a true climax at the end of his compositions, and Tasso is no exception to this rule; indeed, here the climax comes with especially legitimate force to represent the triumph of the poet.

The work was given with perfect shading, and not only was the ensemble excellent, but there were many individual points of great power. The violoncello solo was remarkably effective, and the clarinette, which the composer evidently loved and most frequently used in its spectral lower register, was splendidly played. The trumpet staccato was also strikingly clear, and the end was powerful enough to be represented by half a dozen Fs, and must have been audible in the suburbs.

Louis C. Elson.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 9, 1896.

The orchestral numbers of the fourteenth Symphony programme require no further mention than that of general commendation for the excellence of their rendering. For all were familiar—the delightfully melodious and genial fantasy in F minor which Schubert wrote for four hands at the piano and which Mott transcribed so successfully for orchestra; the prelude to "Lohengrin," offered perhaps as a tribute to the visiting German opera; and Liszt's "Tasso," sometimes poetic and sometimes merely turgid. The solo number was not unfamiliar either, for it was Vieuxtemp's fourth violin concerto. But the player was a stranger, Mr. M. Marsick, the Belgian artist. The choice of this work for his debut was wise, for his taste, style and art moved in close unison with the composition. His tone is beautifully clear and even, without too much lightness at the top of the scale or heaviness at the bottom, and his execution is easily clear and delicately distinct. He made no hard work of the many difficulties nor any appeal for admiration because of his technique, but played smoothly on as modestly as elegantly, that last word perhaps expressing better than any other single one the crowning charm of his style. In the slow movement, with its harp accompaniament, he developed a broad, bland cantabile, his double stopping in the scherzo was clear and equal, and his trills and runs were brilliant without exaggeration. It was honorable, artistic playing, and the many recalls were deserved.

On Saturday next the orchestra will repeat by request Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony and introduce a suite by Godard. Mr. Schulz will play a 'cello concerto by Schumann, and Miss Kate Rolla—an American who has been esteemed in London—will sing twice.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 9, 1896.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The program of the 14th Symphony concert, given last evening in Music Hall, Mr. Paur conductor, was as follows:

Fantasia F minor, op. 103.....Schubert
Symphony in G.....Haydn
Prelude to "Lohengrin" (Act 1).....Wagner
Symphonic poem "Tasso".....Liszt

To the great disappointment of the audience Mr. Marsick, the eminent violinist, did not play the D minor concerto of Vieuxtemps. A day or two ago he was bitten on the hand, which soon began to swell. Although he was not really in condition to play at the Friday rehearsal, he appeared, to the intense enjoyment of all that heard him. He is said to have triumphed gloriously, to have charmed by purity, accuracy and, in short, by uncommon display of artistry. After the concert he was obliged to consult a physician. The awkward trifle, as he thought it, turned out to be a serious affair; for the swelling extended through the arm, and there were symptoms of blood poisoning. It is to be hoped that Mr. Marsick will soon recover and that he will be heard at a Saturday concert this season.

* * *

The familiar symphony of Haydn was substituted at a late moment, and yet it was played delightfully. With the disappearance of the solo violinist, the scheme of the program was broken into pieces; but the excellent work of the orchestra throughout the evening turned what might have been a rout into a signal victory. The fantasia of Schubert, written for the piano, and for four hands, and scored for orchestra by Felix Mottl, is an ingenious and pleasing composition. The prelude to "Lohengrin" was taken at a slower pace than is usual; yet the interest of the hearer did not flag; the details were brought out in striking relief; the climax was singularly imposing; all in all, the performance may be justly placed near that inspired performance under Mancinelli last season in Mechanics' Building, and this, indeed, is praise. A brilliant reading of Liszt's "Tasso" brought to a close one of the shortest Symphony concerts of late years.

P. H.

BOSTON POST.
FEBRUARY 9, 1896.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The patrons of the Symphony were treated to a disappointment last night—the second one this season—in the non-appearance of M. Marsick, the violinist, who, it was announced, had been taken suddenly ill. In place of the concerto No. 4 (Vieuxtemps) Haydn's G major symphony was given. A better substitute could not have been selected, for the composition is bright and cheerful, and when given as this orchestra can give it, a lasting delight. It is clear and symmetrical throughout, and each movement is beautifully worked out. As for its interpretation, the orchestra has seldom played it better, and for his admirable reading, Mr. Paur was given the most spontaneous applause.

The Schubert fantasia, F minor, was the opening number. In this many of the instruments are frequently heard singly and in groups, and the various themes are particularly well defined, expressive and simply but effectively worked out. This, too, was greeted with considerable applause.

Out of compliment, presumably, to the Wagnerian opera season now on, the prelude to "Lohengrin" was included in the programme, and it is doubtful if the New York Symphony Orchestra, playing it but an hour or so previously at the Boston Theatre (that opera being on last night), could in any way have excelled this performance of it. More unity and perfect rhythm could scarcely be imparted to the altogether admirable reading, and with Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso, Lamento e Trionfo," one of the most uniformly excellent programmes of the season thus far was enjoyed by the audience.

At the concert next week Miss Kate Rolla and Mr. Leo Schulz will be the soloists, and Godard's suite No. 1 will be heard for the first time.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, FEB. 9, 1896.

Marsick at the Symphony.

The name and fame of Marsick, violin virtuoso and composer, must have preceded him, for there were uncommonly large audiences to welcome him to Music hall and the Symphony concert stage.

Nor was reasonable expectation disappointed by the artist's work. Boston has heard distinguished violinists not a few, and Marsick will hold a place of high and honorable rank in the list. He is, undoubtedly, a noteworthy exponent of the academic, not the emotional, style of playing. More nearly, perhaps, than any violinist who has appeared here within the last decade or so, he resembles Wilhelmz, though he lacks the wonderful power of that great artist.

There is nothing in the least sensational about Marsick. He is noticeably quiet and reserved in manner. But as he stands before his audience, listening apparently to his violin to see if it be in tune with the orchestra which is to accompany him, he gives one the idea that he commands all the resources of the instrument—an idea which his performance amply justifies.

Without resorting to any ad captandum devices, the artist counts upon faithfulness and correctness in interpretation rather than upon any tours de force, to arouse applause. Other violinists might give the Vieuxtemp's concerto which was his selection, yesterday, with more dash and spirit: none with greater care or skill, to interpret the composer's thought. He makes no effort to impress an audience with the idea that he is an artist of rare technique, yet no hearer can fail to realize that, for such a player, difficulties of score do not exist.

In point of vigor and directness of attack, in purity and clearness of tone, and in the brilliancy of his cadenza playing, Marsick's interpretation of the Vieuxtemp's concerto commands admiration. If he has not that fervid temperament which, from the moment an artist takes up his bow, arouses and stimulates the interest of an audience, he wins triumphs in his own way that no mere sensationalist could hope to attain.

Even the usually undemonstrative rehearsal audience was moved to enthusiastic demonstration by Marsick's playing. He was four times recalled, Mr Paur and the players of the orchestra joining heartily in the plaudits of the occasion. Marsick has unquestionably captured Boston's favor.

Schubert's fantasy in F minor, as orchestrated by Felix Mottl, formed a very agreeable opening to Mr Paur's 14th program. It was delightfully played throughout. The allegro molto moderato, in particular, could scarcely have been given with finer appreciation. On the other hand, the performance of the prelude to "Lohengrin" seemed to us a trifle disappointing in its effect, careful as was the orchestra's work. Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso," with its grandiose music, made heavy demands on the resources of the orchestra, but the players acquitted themselves with as distinguished credit as on previous presentations of this work. More need not be said in praise.

Two soloists will be heard at this week's concerts. Miss Kate Rolla is assigned two arias, and Mr Leo Schulz is to be entrusted with Schumann's concerto for violoncello. The symphony will be Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic," and a first hearing at the symphony concerts is to be given to Godard's suite, No. 1.

---

[89]

...Symphony Orchestra.
...ceventh Symphony ...given in the Music Hall last Saturday ...was as follows:
...F minor, opus 103. ...by Felix Mottl.)
...in G major (Breitkopf and Härtel).
...Prelude to "Lohengrin."
...Symphonic Poem, No. 2, "Tasso; Lamentoe ...Trionfo."

Mr. M. Marsick, the noted Belgian violinist, was announced to play Vieuxtemps's D minor concerto, opus 31, and indeed did play it at the Friday afternoon public rehearsal. But an accident to his left wrist, which happened to him on his way to Boston, and made playing already difficult on Friday afternoon, made it physically impossible on Saturday evening. So the Haydn symphony was substituted at the last moment for the Vieuxtemps concerto.

Mottl's orchestrating Schubert's F minor fantasia (for pianoforte for four hands) seems to us a mistake. It is too extended a work to be accepted as a mere musical tidbit, in any form; yet at the same time it is not quite of the calibre to justify an orchestral setting. It is by no means in so large a form as the two-hand "Wanderer" Fantasie in C major, opus 15, which Liszt arranged so effectively for pianoforte and orchestra, as a sort of concerto. We even doubt whether the "Wanderer" fantasia itself would have well stood a purely orchestral arrangement, without that element of virtuoso brilliancy which Liszt's solo pianoforte part gives it. And this smaller and more homely fantasia in F minor stands it even less well. In Mottl's setting you feel a certain disproportion between the work and the mighty orchestral vehicle. Upon the whole, nothing is more apt to dwarf a pianoforte composition than scoring it for full orchestra; it makes you half-consciously demand something like a symphony, and you do not get it. Only the stately Largo movement in F-sharp minor, which has something of Handelian grandeur in it, seemed to us to sound thoroughly well and in character. We thought the orchestration, too, left something to be desired, as such. Mottl seems to have wavered rather hesitatingly between his natural bent for full and brilliant modern orchestration and a more reserved, quasi-classical style of scoring, adapted to some of the quieter and more homely moments in the fantasia. His orchestration accordingly lacks distinctness of individuality and character; the more simply scored passages sound dull and colorless, and the more brilliant ones rather tawdry. The work was admirably played; so no fault could be found with it on that score.

The bright and ever-beautiful Haydn symphony went finely; only the last movement seemed to us taken decidedly too slow.

But what had Wagner's "Lohengrin" prelude to do right after Haydn's symphony? It came there as an accident, it is true; but, for matter of that, we doubt if it would have come in any more appositely after the Vieuxtemps concerto. It was, however, absolutely superbly played.

Liszt's "Tasso" has been given here with more dramatic fire and intensity than on Saturday evening; the performance was finished and excellent in many ways—the minuet movement in F-sharp major was particularly well played—but it did not carry you away.

The next programme is: Tschaikowsky, symphony No. 6, in B minor, "Pathétique" (repeated by request); —— aria; Schumann, concerto for violoncello, opus 129; —— aria; Godard, suite from "Jocelyn," No. 1 (first time at these concerts). Miss Kate Rolla will be the singer, and Mr. Leo Schulz, the 'cellist.

The Boston Traveler.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 10, 1896.

The Symphony Concert.

Fifteenth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; fourteenth concert. The programme:

Fantasia in F minor, op. 103. (Scored for orchestra by Felix Mottl).....Schubert
Symphony in G.....Haydn
Prelude to "Lohengrin".....Wagner
Symphonic poem, "Tasso".....Liszt

It was expected that M. Marsick, one of the new violinists of the season, was to play Vieuxtemps' concerto, but an accident to his hand prevented, and the Haydn symphony was substituted. The orchestral arrangement of Schubert's "Fantasy" was brilliantly done by Mottl, and it was a pleasure to hear the work again after several years. It was played with excellent taste. The Lohengrin prelude went with the faultless purity of tone that the great violin section of our orchestra alone can give to it. A brilliant reading of Liszt's "Tasso" ended a concert of more than ordinary interest.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 12, 1896.

* * *

In spite of this attraction there was a large audience at the fourteenth Symphony concert, the program of which was as follows:

Fantasia, F minor, op. 103.....Schubert
Symphony in G.....Haydn
Prelude to Lohengrin (Act I.).....Wagner
Symphonic poem, Tasso.....Liszt

To the great disappointment of the audience Mr. Marsick, the eminent violinist, did not play the D minor concerto of Vieuxtemps. A day or two ago he was bitten on the hand, which soon began to swell. Although he was not really in condition to play at the Friday rehearsal he appeared, to the intense enjoyment of all that heard him. He is said to have triumphed gloriously, to have charmed by purity, accuracy and, in short, by uncommon display of artistry. After the concert he was obliged to consult a physician. The awkward trifle, as he thought it, turned out to be a serious affair; for the swelling extended through the arm, and there were symptoms of blood poisoning. This evening he was well enough to be at Mr. Adamowski's concert in the Boston Theatre.

* * *

The familiar symphony of Haydn was substituted at a late moment, and yet it was played delightfully. With the disappearance of the solo violinist the scheme of the program was broken into pieces; but the excellent work of the orchestra throughout the evening turned what might have been a rout into a signal victory. The fantasia of Schubert, written for the piano, and for four hands, and scored for orchestra by Felix Mottl, is an ingenious and pleasing composition. The prelude to Lohengrin was taken at a slower pace than is usual; yet the interest of the hearer did not flag; the details were brought out in striking relief; the climax was singularly imposing; all in all, the performance may be justly placed near that inspired performance under Mancinelli last season in Mechanics Building, and this indeed is praise. A brilliant reading of Liszt's Tasso brought to a close one of the shortest Symphony concerts of later years.

PHILIP HALE.

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 13, 1896.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Fine Performance Before a Large Audience.

The fourth symphony concert was given in Infantry Hall last evening. There can be no doubt that interest in these superb performances is on the increase; the fact has already been noted that the audiences of this season show an increased attendance; there were more auditors present last night than at any previous concert, the hall being three-quarters filled or more, which would indicate an audience of probably 1500 people. This is an encouraging state of affairs, and it is to be hoped that by another season the orchestra may receive the compliment of a full house, which its always magnificent playing certainly deserves.

On opening the programme books last evening a slip was found within stating that by the kind permission of Mr. Walter Damrosch, Fraulein Johanna Gadski, prima donna soprano of the Damrosch Opera Company, would sing in place of Mme. Lillian Blauvelt, whom sudden illness had prevented from appearing, as advertised. While this was a disappointment to the many friends and admirers of the charming little diva, it was tempered by the thought that a new and famous singer was to be heard, and the regrets were soon forgotten in the grand performance of the German prima donna.

The programme for the evening, as amended in consequence of the change of soloists, ran as follows:

Symphony No. 1, in E-flat major, "Rustic Wedding," Op. 26.....Goldmark
I. Wedding March: Moderato molto (E-flat major).
II. Bridal Song: Allegretto (B-flat major).
III. In the Garden: Andante (G minor).
IV. Dance: Allegro molto (E-flat major).
Elizabeth's Greeting, from "Tannhauser"... ..... Wagner
Orchestral Suite from "Jocelyn," No. 1..... .....Benjamin Godard
I. Prelude: Adagio (B-flat major).
II. Entr'acte, "In the Mountains:" Moderato quasi Allegretto (B-flat major).
III. Entr'acte Gavotte: Andante (A minor).
IV. Carillon: Moderato (A major). (First time.)
Agatha's Prayer and Aria, from "Der..... Freischutz".....C. M. von Weber
Hungarian Rhapsody No. 2.....Franz Liszt

A thoroughly interesting programme, and splendidly played from beginning to end. Goldmark's ever-welcome "Rustic Wedding" put everybody in a happy frame of mind at the start. Mr. Apthorp, after measuring it with his sonata yardstick and carefully calculating its cubic contents, announces with a somewhat aggrieved air in his programme notes that it is not a symphony at all, but merely a series of tone-pictures. Name it as you will, it is a most enjoyable piece of music, full of originality, color, and a genuine rustic flavor in both melody and rythm that justifies, at any rate, its secondary title. Mr. Paur gave it a very expressive reading and the players responded with their most finished and artistic work.

Godard's suite is of a sketchy character, in fact, makes no pretensions to be otherwise. The opera from which it is arranged is unknown in this country, but the music is full of variety and suggestiveness. It is also pleasant music to listen to, which the iconoclastic moderns regard as a more important matter than adherence to more or less archaic forms. Sharp contrasts and unexpected little surprises are met with at every turn. The scoring is decidedly heavy, the full modern orchestra and a largely augmented brass choir being employed. It is interesting to note the tendency of the later French composers toward the methods of their neglected countryman, Berlioz, and the long-despised and hated Wagner. This number, too, was magnificently played.

The value of the orchestral arrangements of Liszt's Hungarian rhapsodys is open to question. While certain parts—like those fierce phrases in the low register at the beginning of this No. 2—come out more clearly and sound better than upon the harsh low notes of the piano, yet the compositions are as a whole so intimately conceived for the piano that the added sonority and volume of the orchestra serves but to disguise their real character. This, the best-known and most popular of the long series of similar works, is full of tremendous energy and heaven-storming climax, which, it is needless to say, was adequately reproduced by the brilliant band of players.

Fraulein Gadski's contributions to the programme met with instant and pronounced approval. That fraction of the audience which had previously heard her in opera or gained some familiarity with her high European reputation through the musical journals, were of course prepared to listen to an artist. But to the remainder she was something in the nature of a surprise. She has a voice of magnificent volume and extensive range, which her two selections served to display to great advantage. Nor is her voice marred by any hardness of quality or unsteadiness of tone, as is not infrequently the case with these great dramatic sopranos. As for her singing, it displayed in full measure the poise, control and temperament of a great artist. She was rapturously applauded, and recalled a half dozen times at each appearance, the orchestra laying down their instruments to aid in the general acclaim.

The whole concert was well appreciated and thoroughly enjoyed by all present, a number being overheard to pronounce it the best of the series. As a matter of fact, these orchestral concerts are of such a quality that the last one heard nearly always seems the best. The fifth concert will occur on the evening of Wednesday, March 18.

The Telegram

EVENING AND SUNDAY.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 13, 1896.

The announcement through the press yesterday that a change in soloists for the Boston Symphony orchestra concert last evening had been made, owing to the sudden illness of Madame Lillian Blauvelt, who was under engagement to appear, was full of disappointment, but it was a disappointment that curiosity tempered. In notifying the public of the fact that Madame Blauvelt was sick, the management created no little interest by stating that the prima donna of the Damrosch Grand Opera company, Fraulein Gadski, now located in Boston, had been secured to fill the place. Thus while all who are acquainted with Madame Blauvelt's great talent sincerely regretted her inability to come yet general pleasure was expressed over the chance of hearing an artist so celebrated and popular in European musical fields as is Miss Gadski. The promptness with which the orchestra people found a capable person to sing and apprized Providence of the arrangement was something that can be commended to other amusement projectors as worthy of adoption.

Miss Gadski's debut was magnetically successful. She had two numbers, Elizabeth's Greeting from "Tannhauser," and Agatha's prayer and aria from "Der Freischuetz," and her interpretation of them was delightful. The scope and power of her voice were not less remarkable than its lovely melodiousness. It was a thorough dramatic voice, abounding in fire and expressiveness, and yet, as many dramatic voices do not, it possessed a vein of rich softness that captivated. In method and style she was far above the possibility of fault-finding. The audience was enraptured by her superb work and fairly crowded its testimonials of enjoyment upon her.

The orchestra had three compositions to perform, Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding," Godard's No. 1 suite from Jocelyn and the Franz-Liszt Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 2. The second was a new creation here, and it also had its first presentation in this country. It was an illustration of how the full power of a modern orchestra can be gauged and manipulated. It was wealthy in striking effects and generally was of a very appreciable quality of musical beauty. The other productions were of course grandly played under Conductor Paur's baton.

The attendance was the best yet seen at a Symphony event. The next concert—the fifth—will be given Wednesday evening, March 18.

Providence Letter
Sunday Herald
Feb. 16 '96

It was thought that the leap year ball would interfere somewhat with the attendance at the Boston Symphony concert. On the contrary, it increased and brightened it most decidedly, as many of the ball guests came to the concert arrayed in dancing attire and with opera cloaks, too, ready to go right on to the ball. Thus the attendance at the concert was the largest of the series, with even brighter gowning than was seen at its predecessor.

Those who incommoded themselves by deciding not to give nor attend dinners, so as to be faithful in their attendance at the Symphony, were more than repaid for attending, as a necessary change in the soloist helped to make it a great musical night, as well as a social one. Mme. Blauvett was too ill to appear, and the management, by the kindness of Mr. Damrosch, was enabled to announce the appearance of Frl. Johanna Gadski, one of the sopranos singing with the German opera company in Boston. As very few Providence people have been able to find sufficient time to attend the opera because of the busy whirl of the past 10 days, Frl. Gadski's appearance in her pretty pink gown and in charming voice was a most pronounced success. She was recalled again and again after each number, but did not respond with another selection, although the orchestra put down their instruments to join in the general applause. The orchestral programme was a most brilliant one, too.

[illegible] Transcript

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 10, 1896.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the fourteenth Symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Schubert: Fantasia in F minor, opus 103. (Scored for orchestra by Felix Mottl.)
Haydn: Symphony in G major (Breitkopf and Härtel, No. 13; Peters, No. 8).
Wagner: Prelude to "Lohengrin."
Liszt: Symphonic Poem, No. 2, "Tasso; Lamentoe Trionfo."

Mr. M. Marsick, the noted Belgian violinist, was announced to play Vieuxtemps's D minor concerto, opus 31, and indeed did play it at the Friday afternoon public rehearsal. But an accident to his left wrist, which happened to him on his way to Boston, and made playing already difficult on Friday afternoon, made it physically impossible on Saturday evening. So the Haydn symphony was substituted at the last moment for the Vieuxtemps concerto.

Mottl's orchestrating Schubert's F minor fantasia (for pianoforte for four hands) seems to us a mistake. It is too extended a work to be accepted as a mere musical tidbit, in any form; yet at the same time it is not quite of the calibre to justify an orchestral setting. It is by no means in so large a form as the two-hand "Wanderer" Fantasie in C major, opus 15, which Liszt arranged so effectively for pianoforte and orchestra, as a sort of concerto. We even doubt whether the "Wanderer" fantasia itself would have well stood a purely orchestral arrangement, without that element of virtuoso brilliancy which Liszt's solo pianoforte part gives it. And this smaller and more homely fantasia in F minor stands it even less well. In Mottl's setting you feel a certain disproportion between the work and the mighty orchestral vehicle. Upon the whole, nothing is more apt to dwarf a pianoforte composition than scoring it for full orchestra; it makes you half-consciously demand something like a symphony, and you do not get it. Only the stately Largo movement in F-sharp minor, which has something of Handelian grandeur in it, seemed to us to sound thoroughly well and in character. We thought the orchestration, too, left something to be desired, as such; Mottl seems to have wavered rather hesitatingly between his natural bent for full and brilliant modern orchestration and a more reserved, quasi-classical style of scoring, adapted to some of the quieter and more homely moments in the fantasia. His orchestration accordingly lacks distinctness of individuality and character; the more simply scored passages sound dull and colorless, and the more brilliant ones rather tawdry. The work was admirably played; so no fault could be found with it on that score.

The bright and ever-beautiful Haydn symphony went finely; only the last movement seemed to us taken decidedly too slow.

But what had Wagner's "Lohengrin" prelude to do right after Haydn's symphony? It came there as an accident, it is true; but, for matter of that, we doubt if it would have come in any more appositely after the Vieuxtemps concerto. It was, however, absolutely superbly played.

Liszt's "Tasso" has been given here with more dramatic fire and intensity than on Saturday evening; the performance was finished and excellent in many ways—the minuet movement in F-sharp major was particularly well played—but it did not carry you away.

The next programme is: Tschaikowsky, symphony No. 6, in B minor, "Pathétique" (repeated by request); —— aria; Schumann, concerto for violoncello, opus 129; —— aria; Godard, suite from "Jocelyn," No. 1 (first time at these concerts). Miss Kate Rolla will be the singer, and Mr. Leo Schulz, the 'cellist.

The Boston Traveler

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 10, 1896.

The Symphony Concert.

Fifteenth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; fourteenth concert. The programme:

Fantasia in F minor, op. 103. (Scored for orchestra by Felix Mottl).....Schubert
Symphony in G.....Haydn
Prelude to "Lohengrin".....Wagner
Symphonic poem, "Tasso".....Liszt

It was expected that M. Marsick, one of the new violinists of the season, was to play Vieuxtemps' concerto, but an accident to his hand prevented, and the Haydn symphony was substituted. The orchestral arrangement of Schubert's "Fantasy" was brilliantly done by Mottl, and it was a pleasure to hear the work again after several years. It was played with excellent taste. The Lohengrin prelude went with the faultless purity of tone that the great violin section of our orchestra alone can give to it. A brilliant reading of Liszt's "Tasso" ended a concert of more than ordinary interest.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 12, 1896.

* *

In spite of this attraction there was a large audience at the fourteenth Symphony concert, the program of which was as follows:

Fantasia, F minor, op. 103.....Schubert
Symphony in G.....Haydn
Prelude to Lohengrin (Act I.).....Wagner
Symphonic poem, Tasso.....Liszt

To the great disappointment of the audience Mr. Marsick, the eminent violinist, did not play the D minor concerto of Vieuxtemps. A day or two ago he was bitten on the hand, which soon began to swell. Although he was not really in condition to play at the Friday rehearsal he appeared, to the intense enjoyment of all that heard him. He is said to have triumphed gloriously, to have charmed by purity, accuracy and, in short, by uncommon display of artistry. After the concert he was obliged to consult a physician. The awkward trifle, as he thought it, turned out to be a serious affair; for the swelling extended through the arm, and there were symptoms of blood poisoning. This evening he was well enough to be at Mr. Adamowski's concert in the Boston Theatre.

* * *

The familiar symphony of Haydn was substituted at a late moment, and yet it was played delightfully. With the disappearance of the solo violinist the scheme of the program was broken into pieces; but the excellent work of the orchestra throughout the evening turned what might have been a rout into a signal victory. The fantasia of Schubert, written for the piano, and for four hands, and scored for orchestra by Felix Mottl, is an ingenious and pleasing composition. The prelude to Lohengrin was taken at a slower pace than is usual; yet the interest of the hearer did not flag; the details were brought out in striking relief; the climax was singularly imposing; all in all, the performance may be justly placed near that inspired performance under Mancinelli last season in Mechanics Building, and this indeed is praise. A brilliant reading of Liszt's Tasso brought to a close one of the shortest Symphony concerts of later years.

PHILIP HALE.

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 13, 1896.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Fine Performance Before a Large Audience.

The fourth symphony concert was given in Infantry Hall last evening. There can be no doubt that interest in these superb performances is on the increase; the fact has already been noted that the audiences of this season show an increased attendance; there were more auditors present last night than at any previous concert, the hall being three-quarters filled or more, which would indicate an audience of probably 1500 people. This is an encouraging state of affairs, and it is to be hoped that by another season the orchestra may receive the compliment of a full house, which its always magnificent playing certainly deserves.

On opening the programme books last evening a slip was found within stating that by the kind permission of Mr. Walter Damrosch, Fraulein Johanna Gadski, prima donna soprano of the Damrosch Opera Company, would sing in place of Mme. Lillian Blauvelt, whom sudden illness had prevented from appearing, as advertised. While this was a disappointment to the many friends and admirers of the charming little diva, it was tempered by the thought that a new and famous singer was to be heard, and the regrets were soon forgotten in the grand performance of the German prima donna.

The programme for the evening, as amended in consequence of the change of soloists, ran as follows:

Symphony No. 1, in E-flat major, "Rustic Wedding," Op. 26.....Goldmark
I. Wedding March: Moderato molto (E-flat major).
II. Bridal Song: Allegretto (B-flat major).
III. In the Garden: Andante (G minor).
IV. Dance: Allegro molto (E-flat major).
Elizabeth's Greeting, from "Tannhauser"..... Wagner
Orchestral Suite from "Jocelyn," No. 1.....Benjamin Godard
I. Prelude: Adagio (B-flat major).
II. Entr'acte, "In the Mountains:" Moderato quasi Allegretto (B-flat major).
III. Entr'acte Gavotte: Andante (A minor).
IV. Carillon: Moderato (A major).
(First time.)
Agatha's Prayer and Aria, from "Der Freischute".....C. M. von Weber
Hungarian Rhapsody No. 2.....Franz Liszt

A thoroughly interesting programme, and splendidly played from beginning to end. Goldmark's ever-welcome "Rustic Wedding" put everybody in a happy frame of mind at the start. Mr. Apthorp, after measuring it with his sonata yardstick and carefully calculating its cubic contents, announces with a somewhat aggrieved air in his programme notes that it is not a symphony at all, but merely a series of tone-pictures. Name it as you will, it is a most enjoyable piece of music, full of originality, color, and a genuine rustic flavor in both melody and rythm that justifies, at any rate, its secondary title. Mr. Paur gave it a very expressive reading and the players responded with their most finished and artistic work.

Godard's suite is of a sketchy character, in fact, makes no pretensions to be otherwise. The opera from which it is arranged is unknown in this country, but the music is full of variety and suggestiveness. It is also pleasant music to listen to, which the iconoclastic moderns regard as a more important matter than adherence to more or less archaic forms. Sharp contrasts and unexpected little surprises are met with at every turn. The scoring is decidedly heavy, the full modern orchestra and a largely augmented brass choir being employed. It is interesting to note the tendency of the later French composers toward the methods of their neglected countryman, Berloiz, and the long-despised and hated Wagner. This number, too, was magnificently played.

The value of the orchestral arrangements of Liszt's Hungarian rhapsodys is open to question. While certain parts—like those fierce phrases in the low register at the beginning of this No. 2—come out more clearly and sound better than upon the harsh low notes of the piano, yet the compositions are as a whole so intimately conceived for the piano that the added sonority and volume of the orchestra serves but to disguise their real character. This, the best-known and most popular of the long series of similar works, is full of tremendous energy and heaven-storming climax, which, it is needless to say, was adequately reproduced by the brilliant band of players.

Fraulein Gadski's contributions to the programme met with instant and pronounced approval. That fraction of the audience which had previously heard her in opera or gained some familiarity with her high European reputation through the musical journals, were of course prepared to listen to an artist. But to the remainder she was something in the nature of a surprise. She has a voice of magnificent volume and extensive range, which her two selections served to display to great advantage. Nor is her voice marred by any hardness of quality or unsteadiness of tone, as is not infrequently the case with these great dramatic sopranos. As for her singing, it displayed in full measure the poise, control and temperament of a great artist. She was rapturously applauded, and recalled a half dozen times at each appearance, the orchestra laying down their instruments to aid in the general acclaim.

The whole concert was well appreciated and thoroughly enjoyed by all present, a number being overheard to pronounce it the best of the series. As a matter of fact, these orchestral concerts are of such a quality that the last one heard nearly always seems the best. The fifth concert will occur on the evening of Wednesday, March 18.

The Telegram

EVENING AND SUNDAY.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 13, 1896.

The announcement through the press yesterday that a change in soloists for the Boston Symphony orchestra concert last evening had been made, owing to the sudden illness of Madame Lillian Blauvelt, who was under engagement to appear, was full of disappointment, but it was a disappointment that curiosity tempered. In notifying the public of the fact that Madame Blauvelt was sick, the management created no little interest by stating that the prima donna of the Damrosch Grand Opera company, Fraulein Gadski, now located in Boston, had been secured to fill the place. Thus while all who are acquainted with Madame Blauvelt's great talent sincerely regretted her inability to come yet general pleasure was expressed over the chance of hearing an artist so celebrated and popular in European musical fields as is Miss Gadski. The promptness with which the orchestra people found a capable person to sing and apprized Providence of the arrangement was something that can be commended to other amusement projectors as worthy of adoption.

Miss Gadski's debut was magnetically successful. She had two numbers, Elizabeth's Greeting from "Tannhauser," and Agatha's prayer and aria from "Der Freischuetz," and her interpretation of them was delightful. The scope and power of her voice were not less remarkable than its lovely melodiousness. It was a thorough dramatic voice, abounding in fire and expressiveness, and yet, as many dramatic voices do not, it possessed a vein of rich softness that captivated. In method and style she was far above the possibility of fault-finding. The audience was enraptured by her superb work and fairly crowded its testimonials of enjoyment upon her.

The orchestra had three compositions to perform, Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding," Godard's No. 1 suite from Jocelyn and the Franz-Liszt Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 2. The second was a new creation here, and it also had its first presentation in this country. It was an illustration of how the full power of a modern orchestra can be gauged and manipulated. It was wealthy in striking effects and generally was of a very appreciable quality of musical beauty. The other productions were of course grandly played under Conductor Paur's baton.

The attendance was the best yet seen at a Symphony event. The next concert—the fifth—will be given Wednesday evening, March 18.

Providence Letter
Sunday Herald
Feb. 16 '96

It was thought that the leap year ball would interfere somewhat with the attendance at the Boston Symphony concert. On the contrary, it increased and brightened it most decidedly, as many of the ball guests came to the concert arrayed in dancing attire and with opera cloaks, too, ready to go right on to the ball. Thus the attendance at the concert was the largest of the series, with even brighter gowning than was seen at its predecessor.

Those who incommoded themselves by deciding not to give nor attend dinners, so as to be faithful in their attendance at the Symphony, were more than repaid for attending, as a necessary change in the soloist helped to make it a great musical night, as well as a social one. Mme. Blauvett was too ill to appear, and the management, by the kindness of Mr. Damrosch, was enabled to announce the appearance of Frl. Johanna Gadski, one of the sopranos singing with the German opera company in Boston. As very few Providence people have been able to find sufficient time to attend the opera because of the busy whirl of the past 10 days, Frl. Gadski's appearance in her pretty pink gown and in charming voice was a most pronounced success. She was recalled again and again after each number, but did not respond with another selection; although the orchestra put down their instruments to join in the general applause. The orchestral programme was a most brilliant one, too.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 16, 1896.

Fifteenth Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall—Appearance of Kate Rolla, Soprano, and Martin Marsick, Violinist.

The program of the Symphony concert last night, Mr. Paur conductor, was as follows:

Symphony No. 6, in B minor, "Pathetique," op. 74, Tschaikowsky. (By request.) Air, "Mon coeur s'ouvre a ta voix," from "Samson et Dalila." Saint Saens. Concerto for Violin, No. 4, in D minor, op. 31. Vieuxtemps. Orchestral Suite from "Jocelyn." No. 1. I. Prelude; Adagio. II. Entr'acte, "Dans les Montagnes;" Moderato quasi Allegretto. III. Entr'acte Gavotte: Andante. IV. Carillon: Moderato. Godard. (First time at these concerts.)

A third hearing of Tschaikowsky's last symphony only strengthens the deep impression made by this work when it was first produced here. The third movement, which formerly seemed incongruous, is now revealed as full of purport. The noisy triumph, the shouts of the populace, all awards for personal prowess or mental discovery, the hurrahs, the drums, the trumpets, the rockets—these amuse the Gaunt Man with the Scythe.

"The glories of our blood and state
Are shadows, not substantial things;
There is no armour against fate;
Death lays his icy hands on Kings."

Truly a marvelous work, this symphony; and as for the requiem, I know of nothing sublimer in the history of absolute music.

* * *

Godard's suite from his opera "Jocelyn" recalls the melancholy life and the sad death of a man who had reason to regard himself as misunderstood. This music was written for the theatre; heard in a concert room, it naturally loses in effectiveness, and to the musician it is chiefly interesting on account of its instrumentation. The second movement is pretty, and the little gavotte is charming. As for the carillon, Bizet used the same idea to greater advantage in "L'Arlésienne." Brilliant music, with true melody and rich vocabulary of expression, but it should be heard in its proper place. By the way, there is a delightful "Village suite" by Godard, and the "Oriental" and the "Gothic" symphonies are by no means to be despised. Two movements from the "Oriental" were played here under Mr. Nikisch. "The Elephants" were not then brought on the stage, and yet that movement is a masterpiece.

Miss Rolla is a singer of certain experience, but she gave last evening no good reason for her appearance at a Symphony concert. Her voice is neither sensuous nor strong; her sense of rhythm is defective; and for once the great air of Delilah was tame and ordinary.

Mr. Marsick is a most accomplished violinist. In these days to speak at length concerning a player's technique is faint praise even when loud words are used. For this is an age of technique, except, alas, in song. It is enough to say that he surmounts all difficulties with graceful ease. His accuracy would, indeed, be annoying, were it not in a measure put into the background by fine artistry. Mr. Marsick is not merely a master of technique; he is not controlled by it, nor does he worship it. He uses it in the service of the composer.

While you cannot help admiring the delivery of this or that phrase, you do not in recollection forget the performance of the composition as a whole. To him the concerto of Vieuxtemps—now 46 years old—the one so praised by Berlioz, is an organic whole; he does not regard it as an occasion for playing pet passages, and then filling in the gaps almost carelessly; the beauty of the whole is brought into the clearest light, and yet when you examine each detail how perfect it seems. Now the man that succeeds in this task is not only an accomplished virtuoso, he is a thorough musician. Mr. Marsick's cantabile in the Adagio was incomparably sustained and noble; and the trying scherzo was capitally performed. All in all, Mr. Marsick is one of the most satisfying violinists that has been heard here of late years. His personality is dignified and winning. There is no attempt to catch applause by forcing of tone sentimentality, or physical display.

An admirable musician plays admirably the violin. And in Mr. Marsick's case praise halts between the musician and the virtuoso. Now, this is rare. No wonder that he enchanted musician and layman alike. Such violinists are very welcome to Boston, and it is to be hoped that there will be occasions of hearing him again.

* * *

It is also a great pleasure to find the compiler of the program book forsaking for a moment his deep study of Greek and mediæval music and indulging himself publicly in entertaining personal reminiscences. Thus, from the program book of last night we learn this valuable information: (1) That the compiler is an "educated musician;" (2) that he went "every night for a fortnight to Offenbach's 'La Perichole' in London;" (3, and most important of all) "he hadn't lost his heart to Schneider, either!" Of course, by Schneider he refers to the giddy and celebrated opéra bouffe singer—and not to Rip's ex.

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Herald.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCIX., NO. 47.

SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 16, 1896.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mme. Kate Rollo and Mr. M. Marsick the Soloists.

The programme for last night's concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall was:

Symphony No. 6, "Pathetique"..Tschaikowsky
Air, "Mon coeur s'ouvre a ta voix"..... Saint-Saens
Concerto for violin, No. 4, D-minor..... Vieuxtemps
Suite from "Jocelyn," No. 1.....B. Godard

There were two soloists, Mme. Kate Rollo and Mr. M. Marsick. The imposing symphony was heard at these concerts only a few weeks ago, and was repeated thus soon after in compliance with many requests. It was well worth the hearing again before the impression it made earlier had time to fade. Every successive performance of the work discovers new beauties, and intensifies the belief that it is the largest and most impressive symphony of modern date, not only for its splendor of color, its wealth of refined and flowing melody and the lofty dignity that pervades it, but also for the nobility of its inspiration and the purity of its sentiment. The broad and graceful swing of the lovely second subject of the opening movement; the piquant vivacity that characterises the whole of the second movement, and the smoothness with which the rarely-used 5-4 rythm floats along on an indescribably charming theme; the spirited march theme of the third movement—which, by the way, always recalls the march in Raff's "Lenore" symphony—and the grand melancholy and moving pathos of the finale, enraptured and delighted, as before.

Mr. Paur again read the work in a profoundly deep sympathy, with its varying moods, and obtained from his orchestra one of its most brilliant efforts of the season. The Godard suite was made by the composer from themes in his opera, "Jocelyn." Godard, who died a little over a year ago, at the early age of 46, after a dispiriting career, and a life passed in trial and disappointment, was a prominent figure in the modern French school. He wrote much music of a high order for both the stage and the concert room, but is only known in this country by his songs, and chiefly by the soprano prayer from "Jocelyn." This suite does his genius scant justice. It was played last night for the first time at these concerts. The four movements of which it consists are brief, and charm by their true color, rather than by any clearly defined themes that they contain. The opening movement, a slow prelude, is vague in meaning, but the instrumentation has a strong element of originality in its rapidly contrasted effects. The second movement, entitled "Dans les Montagnes," is the merest sketch, which is scarcely begun before it comes to a close.

The programme book, by the way, describes this movement as a quaint sort of peasant dance, whereas its opening theme, which is thus misinterpreted, is a few bars of the revolutionary tune, "Ca ira," that became so brutally prominent with the mob during the reign of terror. It is curious that the compiler of the book could have gone thus far astray on a point with which every well informed student of folk tunes with a history should be familiar. The third movement is one of the prettiest gavottes imaginable, but is as fragile as a cobweb and flutters for a few brief moments only. The finale is the most brilliant portion of the suite, and a succession of florid and charming flights of orchestration is built over a pedal formed of the notes of a simple chiming of bells, which is obstinately continued without cessation from the beginning to the end of the movement. Here, also, the orchestra was heard at its very best.

Of Mrs. Rollo's singing there is not much to be said that is pleasing in the saying. She has a mezzo-soprano voice of ample volume, but its quality is dry, cold and acid. Her style is commonplace, and her sense of rhythm imperfect. She sang the warm and sensuous Saint-Saens aria in an unimpassioned and inartistic style, and with such fickleness in regard to time that she changed it in nearly every bar, and made it almost impossible for the conductor to follow her. She was applauded, and received two recalls that were not earned by the worth of her singing. There may have been good and sufficient reasons why she did not acquit herself better, but, as judged by what she did, she was wholly out of place in a symphony concert.

It was quite another story with Mr. Marsick, whose performance of the Vieuxtemps concerto made known an artist of the finest powers. He has a beautiful tone, a perfect technique, the purest of intonation and the highest finish of style. His bowing is large and free, his cantabile playing is exquisite, and a noble artistic feeling dignifies all that he does. Above all, he is sincere and convincing, and though eminently classical in spirit, is never lacking in warmth of sentiment. There is not the remotest suggestion of affectation in him, nor of playing for the mere reward of applause. He had scarcely made his way well into the opening movement when it became clear that an artist of the first rank was before the audience.

The whole concerto was read and performed with unsurpassable purity of taste and dignity of style, but it was in the slow movement that his worth was fully revealed, and at its close the concerto was interrupted for some moments until the audience had exhausted itself in paying applausive tribute to him. At the end of the work, there was a still greater outburst of admiration, and he was recalled some three or four times with as great enthusiasm as has ever gone out to an artist in Music Hall. Not since Ysaye has a violinist met with so spontaneous, so just and so stormy a recognition of his merits.

The programme for the next concert is announced as follows: Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony; a concerto for violin, by Moszkowski; "Midnight at Sedan," by Zollner (first time), and Brahm's "Academic" overture. Another violinist, Mr. Emil Sauret, is to be the soloist.

SUNDAY, FEB. 16, 1896.

Fifteenth Symphony Program.

Two soloists appeared at the symphony last week, Mme Kate Rolla, soprano, and Mr Marsick, violinist. The orchestral numbers were Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony, which was performed at the concert Jan 11, and Godard's suite from "Jocelyn," the latter for the first time here. The Tschaikowsky symphony was given with grand effect by Mr Paur's men, the performance being even better than that at the 11th concert. The work is very impressive for several reasons. The orchestration is a masterpiece of elaboration, the contrasted instrumentations of different themes are frequent and at times startlingly bold, and each contingent of the band is given complex work which only an organisation like our grand orchestra could ever hope to smoothly interpret.

In the second movement a tripping melody has a curious accompaniment in a theme of a sober character, and in the third two figures are developed, one of a scherzo nature and the other martial in tone, with accentuations by the kettle-drum. Both of these movements were played with wonderful precision. In the last part of the work, which is strongly funereal in character, the muted horns were notably well played, and in fact the horns, muted and open, admirably preserved the pitch throughout the performance.

Mr Marsick played Bruch's D minor concerto for violin at the rehearsal, and a Vieuxtemp concerto at the concert Saturday evening. The praise given the artist in these columns last Sunday needs no modification in speaking of his work last week. Lacking somewhat in the emotional qualities, his technique and skill specially appeal to his auditors, and the modesty and intelligence with which his tasks are performed impress an audience more favorably and deeply than would the sensational artist, who covers his shortcomings by a dash and impetuosity in which a close observer will find many faults of omission and commission at variance with the composer's ideas.

Mme Kate Rolla, who came here with no advance heralding worth mentioning, is a soprano with a voice of uncommon sweetness and sympathetic timbre. She was allotted one solo, the Dalilah aria, "Mon cœur s'ouvre a ta voix," from Saint-Saens' "Samson and Dalilah," and the manner in which the singer interpreted the aria was very beautiful. Mme Rolla's voice evidently is excellently suited to expressing the tenderer emotions in song, for it is possessed of that pure, soulful quality which touches the heart, and the tones are as true and vibrant as one could wish to hear. She sings with ease, there is plenty of power, and her runs are smooth and without deflection from the pitch. The artist certainly deserves high encomiums for her solo, for her interpretation was far superior to that of some more famous singers who have been heard here in the same number.

The suite from "Jocelyn" was not specially interesting. The peasant dance movement in the first part has some quaint orchestral conceits well worked out. There is a dainty intermezzo for the third movement, in which the string part of the orchestra were conspicuously good. The processional, the finale, is of a florid and descriptive nature and the various figures were well set forth by the instrumentation. There is an air of simplicity to the suite as a whole. The suite was played commendably by Mr Paur's men.

Mr Emil Sauret, violinist, will be the soloist at the symphony this week. The program will be as follows: Beethoven, "Pastoral," symphony; Moszkowski, concerto for violin; Zollner, "Midnight at Sedan," (first time); Brahms, academic overture.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 16.

The Symphony Concert.

The fifteenth concert of the Symphony orchestra was in Music Hall, last night. The following is the programme:

Symphony No 6,..... .....Tschaikowsky.
Aria from "Samson and Delila".....Saint-Saens.
Miss Kate Rolla.
Concerto for violin, D.minor.....Vieuxtemps.
Mr. M. Marsick.
Orchestral Suite "Jorcelyn,".....Godard.

Mr. Marsick's appearance was greeted with the heartiest applause, and he speedily demonstrated that he was worthy of the approbation of all who love pure high art. His presence alone is reassuring; he is quiet unassumieg self-possessed, and yet with a suggestion of suppressed emotion that is plainly revealed when his bow touches the violin strings. His style is large and of the finest finish, and his tones beautifully clear, liquid and of haunting sweetness. His interpretation of the second movement of the concerto—the adagio religioso—at once stamped him as an artist of the highest worth We have heard and marvelled at wonderful displays of difficulties conquered with ease; but here was a simple beautiful, theme, that depended on higher art qualities for its adequate presentation, and the demand was fully and frankly answered. It was pure legato playing of the very highest kind; the melody poured out in a full, rich and uninterrupted stream. It was the simplicty, the perfect adaptation of means to end that idicate art in its highest perfection. The effect produced cannot be expressed in words, although it was partly revealed in the enthusiasm aroused in the audience by this display of pure, warm, classic violin playing. The fourth movement was given with fire and spirit, and allowed one to judge Mr. Marsick's talents from a new viewpoint that only added to the conviction that there is no living man who is Mr. Marsick's superior in his art. Of his technical skill it is needless to speak, for it goes without saying that he is amply equipped in this direction. Difficulties melt away under his skilled fingers and magic bow, and become merged in an art that is above praise, and before which criticism is silent. And let it be added, the art is virile and without a trace of the sugary sentimentalism over which youth weeps and adult age yawns.

Mme. Kate Rolla sang the selection from "Samson and Delila" with care and earnestness.

BOSTON, FEBRUARY 16, 1896.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Symphony concert of last evening was somewhat out of the usual order, in that there were two soloists, a violinist and a soprano, one number which had never before been played at these concerts, and the repetition, by request, of the Tschaikowsky symphony No. 6, which was first heard in the present series some weeks ago.

The latter composition opened the evening's programme, and the manner in which it was received amply justified its repetition. It is a composition which one likes the more it is heard, for there are many hidden beauties of harmony and true color which are not apparent to the ordinary listener on a first hearing. The first number presents several sharp contrasts, and is prodigal in rich orchestration, which is dramatically developed. The second and third movements with their bizarre effects quite caught the audience as before, and with the funereal last movement, which sharply contrasted in general character with the preceding movements, were most beautifully played.

Mme. Kate Rolla, soloist, followed, singing the familiar air "Mon ceur s'ouvre a ta voix," from Saint-Saens's "Samson and Dalila." Her voice apparently has several qualities, and as she was somewhat nervous, she was not heard to especially good advantage. Neither did she have a proper conception of the aria in which she was heard, and once or twice she strayed from the key. Her intonation was fair, and under more favorable conditions she would probably make a better impression.

M. Marsick, whose appearance was announced for last week, then made his appearance, and was cordially received, even before he commenced to play, the excellence of his work at the rehearsal the day before having been well heralded. His selection on this occasion was the Vieuxtemps vellin concerto No. 4, in three movements. Mr. Marsick plays with the reatest ease and confidence, and impresses his hearers as a man in perfect sympathy with his work, and one, too, who quite lacks all the petty tricks of the average violinist. He plays with spirit, is wonderfully true in intonation, and has a style which is thoroughly artistic. His phrasing is musicianly, and his tones are remarkably warm and clear cut. His work is of that convincing order that commands attention, and the rather lengthy cadenza at the end of the first movement served to show him off to good advantage. His whole work was brilliant throughout, and the audience gave him four recalls at the conclusion of the concerto.

The orchestral suite from "Jocelyn," by Godard, is a particularly interesting composition in several places. It begins weirdly, but is daintily worked out, the gem of the suite being the brief gavotte which constitutes the third movement. In the fourth movement a quartet of bells are introduced with pleasing results.

At next week's concert Mr. Emil Sauret will be the soloist, playing the Moszkowski violin concerto.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 16, 1896.

Those of us who frequently hear the Symphony programmes at the rehearsals can congratulate ourselves upon having had two tastes of Mr. Marsick's quality—first in the Vieuxtemps concerto, which only got round to the Saturday people last night, and second in the third concerto of Bruch, which was put into the Friday afternoon programme to avoid a repetition. This is a composition requiring somewhat other qualities than those which would suffice amply for the light and almost superficial style of the Vieuxtemps. It has a more nervous force in its opening allegro, a deeper sentiment in its adagio and a bolder if less scintillant brilliancy in its finale. Mr. Marsick was ready and adequate at all points, supplying energy, tenderness and vivacity as they were in turn desired, and obtaining his recognition in the generous applause of a crowded audience.

There was another soloist—Mme. Kate Rolla, an American mezzo soprano, who has had her successes in Europe, even including some made upon the Covent Garden stage. She chose that air from "Samson and Delilah," which is becoming now so common that it will soon be hackneyed and wearisome, "Mon coeur s' ouvre a ta voix." Mme. Rolla has a pretty and rather penetrating voice, not sonorous or voluminous and somewhat pinched in the delivery of close vowels. It has not natural richness and she added to it no dramatic sensuousness, so that the winning, languorous, enthralling melody was tame, inert and unaffectual.

The symphony was Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic," repeated by request, and in a rendering which at times grew up to real passion and fervor, besides gaining in freedom and decision of technical treatment.

The programme ended with a novelty, which was one of the orchestral suites made by Benjamin Godard from the material of his own opera "Jocelyn." It consisted of a slow prelude, passing into a vigorous and almost rudely martial peasant scene; an interlude called "In the Mountains," based on a characteristic theme; a gavotte and a carillon. It is all interesting music, with original fancies and high polish of art, and the orchestra rendered the several movements justice.

There will be no concert this week, but for the ensuing week, this programme is announced: Beethoven, Symphany No. 6 (Pastoral); Moszkowski, Concerto for violin; Zollner, "Midnight at Sedan," (first time); Brahms, Academic Overture. Soloist, Mr. Emil Sauret.

HOWARD MALCOM TOWNE.

---

[91]

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 16, 1896.

Fifteenth Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall—Appearance of Kate Rolla, Soprano, and Martin Marsick, Violinist.

The program of the Symphony concert last night, Mr. Paur conductor, was as follows:

Symphony No. 6, in B minor, "Pathetique," op. 74, Tschaikowsky. (By request.) Air, "Mon coeur s'ouvre a ta voix," from "Samson et Dalila.", Saint Saens. Concerto for Violin, No. 4, in D minor, op. 31. Vieuxtemps. Orchestral Suite from "Jocelyn," No. 1. I. Prelude; Adagio. II. Entr'acte, "Dans les Montagnes;" Moderato quasi Allegretto. III. Entr'acte Gavotte: Andante. IV. Carillon: Moderato. Godard. (First time at these concerts.)

A third hearing of Tschaikowsky's last symphony only strengthens the deep impression made by this work when it was first produced here. The third movement, which formerly seemed incongruous, is now revealed as full of purport. The noisy triumph, the shouts of the populace, all awards for personal prowess or mental discovery, the hurrahs, the drums, the trumpets, the rockets—these amuse the Gaunt Man with the Scythe.

"The glories of our blood and state
Are shadows, not substantial things;
There is no armour against fate;
Death lays his icy hands on Kings."

Truly a marvelous work, this symphony; and as for the requiem, I know of nothing sublimer in the history of absolute music.

* * *

Godard's suite from his opera "Jocelyn" recalls the melancholy life and the sad death of a man who had reason to regard himself as misunderstood. This music was written for the theatre; heard in a concert room, it naturally loses in effectiveness, and to the musician it is chiefly interesting on account of its instrumentation. The second movement is pretty, and the little gavotte is charming. As for the carillon, Bizet used the same idea to greater advantage in "L'Arlésienne." Brilliant music, with true melody and rich vocabulary of expression, but it should be heard in its proper place. By the way, there is a delightful "Village suite" by Godard, and the "Oriental" and the "Gothic" symphonies are by no means to be despised. Two movements from the "Oriental" were played here under Mr. Nikisch. "The Elephants" were not then brought on the stage, and yet that movement is a masterpiece.

Miss Rolla is a singer of certain experience, but she gave last evening no good reason for her appearance at a Symphony concert. Her voice is neither sensuous nor strong; her sense of rhythm is defective; and for once the great air of Delilah was tame and ordinary.

Mr. Marsick is a most accomplished violinist. In these days to speak at length concerning a player's technique is faint praise even when loud words are used. For this is an age of technique, except, alas, in song. It is enough to say that he surmounts all difficulties with graceful ease. His accuracy would, indeed, be annoying, were it not in a measure put into the background by fine artistry. Mr. Marsick is not merely a master of technique; he is not controlled by it, nor does he worship it. He uses it in the service of the composer.

While you cannot help admiring the delivery of this or that phrase, you do not in recollection forget the performance of the composition as a whole. To him the concerto of Vieuxtemps—now 46 years old—the one so praised by Berlioz, is an organic whole; he does not regard it as an occasion for playing pet passages, and then filling in the gaps almost carelessly; the beauty of the whole is brought into the clearest light, and yet when you examine each detail how perfect it seems. Now the man that succeeds in this task is not only an accomplished virtuoso, he is a thorough musician. Mr. Marsick's cantabile in the Adagio was incomparably sustained and noble; and the trying scherzo was capitally performed. All in all, Mr. Marsick is one of the most satisfying violinists that has been heard here of late years. His personality is dignified and winning. There is no attempt to catch applause by forcing of tone sentimentalism, or physical display.

An admirable musician plays admirably the violin. And in Mr. Marsick's case praise halts between the musician and the virtuoso. Now, this is rare. No wonder that he enchanted musician and layman alike. Such violinists are very welcome to Boston, and it is to be hoped that there will be occasions of hearing him again.

* * *

It is also a great pleasure to find the compiler of the program book forsaking for a moment his deep study of Greek and mediaeval music and indulging himself publicly in entertaining personal reminiscences. Thus, from the program book of last night we learn this valuable information: (1) That the compiler is an "educated musician;" (2) that he went "every night for a fortnight to Offenbach's 'La Perichole' in London;" (3, and most important of all) "he hadn't lost his heart to Schneider, either!" Of course, by Schneider he refers to the giddy and celebrated opéra bouffe singer—and not to Rip's dog.

PHILIP HALE.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCIX., NO. 47.

SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 16, 1896.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mme. Kate Rollo and Mr. M. Marsick the Soloists.

The programme for last night's concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall was:

Symphony No. 6, "Pathetique"..Tschaikowsky
Air, "Mon coeur s'ouvre a ta voix"..... Saint-Saens
Concerto for violin, No. 4, D-minor..... Vieuxtemps
Suite from "Jocelyn," No. 1.....B. Godard

There were two soloists, Mme. Kate Rollo and Mr. M. Marsick. The imposing symphony was heard at these concerts only a few weeks ago, and was repeated thus soon after in compliance with many requests. It was well worth the hearing again before the impression it made earlier had time to fade. Every successive performance of the work discovers new beauties, and intensifies the belief that it is the largest and most impressive symphony of modern date, not only for its splendor of color, its wealth of refined and flowing melody and the lofty dignity that pervades it, but also for the nobility of its inspiration and the purity of its sentiment. The broad and graceful swing of the lovely second subject of the opening movement; the piquant vivacity that characterizes the whole of the second movement, and the smoothness with which the rarely-used 5-4 rythm floats along on an indescribably charming theme; the spirited march theme of the third movement—which, by the way, always recalls the march in Raff's "Lenore" symphony—and the grand melancholy and moving pathos of the finale, enraptured and delighted, as before.

Mr. Paur again read the work in a profoundly deep sympathy, with its varying moods, and obtained from his orchestra one of its most brilliant efforts of the season. The Godard suite was made by the composer from themes in his opera, "Jocelyn." Godard, who died a little over a year ago, at the early age of 46, after a dispiriting career, and a life passed in trial and disappointment, was a prominent figure in the modern French school. He wrote much music of a high order for both the stage and the concert room, but is only known in this country by his songs, and chiefly by the soprano prayer from "Jocelyn." This suite does his genius scant justice. It was played last night for the first time at these concerts. The four movements of which it consists are brief, and charm by their true color, rather than by any clearly defined themes that they contain. The opening movement, a slow prelude, is vague in meaning, but the instrumentation has a strong element of originality in its rapidly contrasted effects. The second movement, entitled "Dans les Montagnes," is the merest sketch, which is scarcely begun before it comes to a close.

The programme book, by the way, describes this movement as a quaint sort of peasant dance, whereas its opening theme, which is thus misinterpreted, is a few bars of the revolutionary tune, "Ca ira," that became so brutally prominent with the mob during the reign of terror. It is curious that the compiler of the book could have gone thus far astray on a point with which every well informed student of folk tunes with a history should be familiar. The third movement is one of the prettiest gavottes imaginable, but is as fragile as a cobweb and flutters for a few brief moments only. The finale is the most brilliant portion of the suite, and a succession of florid and charming flights of orchestration is built over a pedal formed of the notes of a simple chiming of bells, which is obstinately continued without cessation from the beginning to the end of the movement. Here, also, the orchestra was heard at its very best.

Of Mrs. Rollo's singing there is not much to be said that is pleasing in the saying. She has a mezzo-soprano voice of ample volume, but its quality is dry, cold and acid. Her style is commonplace, and her sense of rhythm imperfect. She sang the warm and sensuous Saint-Saens aria in an unimpassioned and inartistic style, and with such fickleness in regard to time that she changed it in nearly every bar, and made it almost impossible for the conductor to follow her. She was applauded, and received two recalls that were not earned by the worth of her singing. There may have been good and sufficient reasons why she did not acquit herself better, but, as judged by what she did, she was wholly out of place in a symphony concert.

It was quite another story with Mr. Marsick, whose performance of the Vieuxtemps concerto made known an artist of the finest powers. He has a beautiful tone, a perfect technique, the purest of intonation and the highest finish of style. His bowing is large and free, his cantabile playing is exquisite, and a noble artistic feeling dignifies all that he does. Above all, he is sincere and convincing, and though eminently classical in spirit, is never lacking in warmth of sentiment. There is not the remotest suggestion of affectation in him, nor of playing for the mere reward of applause. He had scarcely made his way well into the opening movement when it became clear that an artist of the first rank was before the audience.

The whole concerto was read and performed with unsurpassable purity of taste and dignity of style, but it was in the slow movement that his worth was fully revealed, and at its close the concerto was interrupted for some moments until the audience had exhausted itself in paying applausive tribute to him. At the end of the work, there was a still greater outburst of admiration, and he was recalled some three or four times with as great enthusiasm as has ever gone out to an artist in Music Hall. Not since Ysaye has a violinist met with so spontaneous, so just and so stormy a recognition of his merits.

The programme for the next concert is announced as follows: Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony; a concerto for violin, by Moszkowski; "Midnight at Sedan," by Zollner (first time), and Brahm's "Academic" overture. Another violinist, Mr. Emil Sauret, is to be the soloist.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, FEB. 16, 1896.

Fifteenth Symphony Program.

Two soloists appeared at the symphony last week, Mme Kate Rolla, soprano, and Mr Marsick, violinist. The orchestral numbers were Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony, which was performed at the concert Jan 11, and Godard's suite from "Jocelyn," the latter for the first time here. The Tschaikowsky symphony was given with grand effect by Mr Paur's men, the performance being even better than that at the 11th concert. The work is very impressive for several reasons. The orchestration is a masterpiece of elaboration, the contrasted instrumentations of different themes are frequent and at times startlingly bold, and each contingent of the band is given complex work which only an organization like our grand orchestra could ever hope to smoothly interpret.

In the second movement a tripping melody has a curious accompaniment in a theme of a sober character, and in the third two figures are developed, one of a scherzo nature and the other martial in tone, with accentuations by the kettle-drum. Both of these movements were played with wonderful precision. In the last part of the work, which is strongly funereal in character, the muted horns were notably well played, and in fact the horns, muted and open, admirably preserved the pitch throughout the performance.

Mr Marsick played Bruch's D minor concerto for violin at the rehearsal, and a Vieuxtemp concerto at the concert Saturday evening. The praise given the artist in these columns last Sunday needs no modification in speaking of his work last week. Lacking somewhat in the emotional qualities, his technique and skill specially appeal to his auditors, and the modesty and intelligence with which his tasks are performed impress an audience more favorably and deeply than would the sensational artist, who covers his shortcomings by a dash and impetuosity in which a close observer will find many faults of omission and commission at variance with the composer's ideas.

Mme Kate Rolla, who came here with no advance heralding worth mentioning, is a soprano with a voice of uncommon sweetness and sympathetic timbre. She was allotted one solo, the Dalilah aria, "Mon cœur s'ouvre a ta voix," from Saint-Saens' "Samson and Dalilah," and the manner in which the singer interpreted the aria was very beautiful. Mme Rolla's voice evidently is excellently suited to expressing the tenderer emotions in song, for it is possessed of that pure, soulful quality which touches the heart, and the tones are as true and vibrant as one could wish to hear. She sings with ease, there is plenty of power, and her runs are smooth and without deflection from the pitch. The artist certainly deserves high encomiums for her solo, for her interpretation was far superior to that of some more famous singers who have been heard here in the same number.

The suite from "Jocelyn" was not specially interesting. The peasant dance movement in the first part has some quaint orchestral conceits well worked out. There is a dainty intermezzo for the third movement, in which the string part of the orchestra were conspicuously good. The processional, the finale, is of a florid and descriptive nature and the various figures were well set forth by the instrumentation. There is an air of simplicity to the suite, as a whole. The suite was played commendably by Mr Paur's men.

Mr Emil Sauret, violinist, will be the soloist at the symphony this week. The program will be as follows: Beethoven, "Pastoral," symphony; Moszkowski, concerto for violin; Zollner, "Midnight at Sedan," (first time); Brahms, academic overture.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 16.

The Symphony Concert.

The fifteenth concert of the Symphony orchestra was in Music Hall, last night. The following is the programme:

Symphony No 6,..... .....Tschaikowsky.
Aria from "Samson and Delila".....Saint-Saens.
Miss Kate Rolla.
Concerto for violin, D.minor.....Vieuxtemps.
Mr. M. Marsick.
Orchestral Suite "Jorcelyn,".....Godard.

Mr. Marsick's appearance was greeted with the heartiest applause, and he speedily demonstrated that he was worthy of the approbation of all who love pure high art. His presence alone is reassuring; he is quiet unassumieg self-possessed, and yet with a suggestion of suppressed emotion that is plainly revealed when his bow touches the violin strings. His style is large and of the finest finish, and his tones beautifully clear, liquid and of haunting sweetness. His interpretation of the second movement of the concerto—the adagio religioso—at once stamped him as an artist of the highest worth We have heard and marvelled at wonderful displays of difficulties conquered with ease; but here was a simple beautiful, theme, that depended on higher art qualities for its adequate presentation, and the demand was fully and frankly answered. It was pure legato playing of the very highest kind; the melody poured out in a full, rich and uninterrupted stream. It was the simplicty, the perfect adaptation of means to end that idicate art in its highest perfection. The effect produced cannot be expressed in words, although it was partly revealed in the enthusiasm aroused in the audience by this display of pure, warm, classic violin playing. The fourth movement was given with fire and spirit, and allowed one to judge Mr. Marsick's talents from a new viewpoint that only added to the conviction that there is no living man who is Mr. Marsick's superior in his art. Of his technical skill it is needless to speak, for it goes without saying that he is amply equipped in this direction. Difficulties melt away under his skilled fingers and magic bow, and become merged in an art that is above praise, and before which criticism is silent. And let it be added, the art is virile and without a trace of the sugary sentimentalism over which youth weeps and adult age yawns.

Mme. Kate Rolla sang the selection from "Samson and Delila" with care and earnestness.

BOSTON POST,

FEBRUARY 16, 1896.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Symphony concert of last evening was somewhat out of the usual order, in that there were two soloists, a violinist and a soprano, one number which had never before been played at these concerts, and the repetition, by request, of the Tschaikowsky symphony No. 6, which was first heard in the present series some weeks ago.

The latter composition opened the evening's programme, and the manner in which it was received amply justified its repetition. It is a composition which one likes the more it is heard, for there are many hidden beauties of harmony and true color which are not apparent to the ordinary listener on a first hearing. The first number presents several sharp contrasts, and is prodigal in rich orchestration, which is dramatically developed. The second and third movements with their bizarre effects quite caught the audience as before, and with the funereal last movement, which sharply contrasted in general character with the preceding movements, were most beautifully played.

Mme. Kate Rolla, soloist, followed, singing the familiar air "Mon ceur s'ouvre a ta voix," from Saint-Saens's "Samson and Dalila." Her voice apparently has several qualities, and as she was somewhat nervous, she was not heard to especially good advantage. Neither did she have a proper conception of the aria in which she was heard, and once or twice she strayed from the key. Her intonation was fair, and under more favorable conditions she would probably make a better impression.

M. Marsick, whose appearance was announced for last week, then made his appearance, and was cordially received, even before he commenced to play, the excellence of his work at the rehearsal the day before having been well heralded. His selection on this occasion was the Vieuxtemps veilin concerto No. 4, in three movements. Mr. Marsick plays with the reatest ease and confidence, and impresses his hearers as a man in perfect sympathy with his work, and one, too, who quite lacks all the petty tricks of the average violinist. He plays with spirit, is wonderfully true in intonation, and has a style which is thoroughly artistic. His phrasing is musicianly, and his tones are remarkably warm and clear cut. His work is of that convincing order that commands attention, and the rather lengthy cadenza at the end of the first movemeat served to show him off to good advantage. His whole work was brilliant throughout, and the audience gave him four recalls at the conclusion of the concerto.

The orchestral suite from "Jocelyn," by Godard, is a particularly interesting composition in several places. It begins weirdly, but is daintily worked out, the gem of the suite being the brief gavotte which constitutes the third movement. In the fourth movement a quartet of bells are introduced with pleasing results.

At next week's concert Mr. Emil Sauret will be the soloist, playing the Moszkowski violin concerto.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 16, 1896.

Those of us who frequently hear the Symphony programmes at the rehearsals can congratulate ourselves upon having had two tastes of Mr. Marsick's quality—first in the Vieuxtemps concerto, which only got round to the Saturday people last night, and second in the third concerto of Bruch, which was put into the Friday afternoon programme to avoid a repetition. This is a composition requiring somewhat other qualities than those which would suffice amply for the light and almost superficial style of the Vieuxtemps. It has a more nervous force in its opening allegro, a deeper sentiment in its adagio and a bolder if less scintillant brilliancy in its finale. Mr. Marsick was ready and adequate at all points, supplying energy, tenderness and vivacity as they were in turn desired, and obtaining his recognition in the generous applause of a crowded audience.

There was another soloist—Mme. Kate Rolla, an American mezzo soprano, who has had her successes in Europe, even including some made upon the Covent Garden stage. She chose that air from "Samson and Delilah," which is becoming now so common that it will soon be hackneyed and wearisome, "Mon coeur s' ouvre a ta voix." Mme. Rolla has a pretty and rather penetrating voice, not sonorous or voluminous and somewhat pinched in the delivery of close vowels. It has not natural richness and she added to it no dramatic sensuousness, so that the winning, languorous, enthralling melody was tame, inert and unaffectual.

The symphony was Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic," repeated by request, and in a rendering which at times grew up to real passion and fervor, besides gaining in freedom and decision of technical treatment.

The programme ended with a novelty, which was one of the orchestral suites made by Benjamin Godard from the material of his own opera "Jocelyn." It consisted of a slow prelude, passing into a vigorous and almost rudely martial peasant scene; an interlude called "In the Mountains," based on a characteristic theme; a gavotte and a carillon. It is all interesting music, with original fancies and high polish of art, and the orchestra rendered the several movements justice.

There will be no concert this week, but for the ensuing week, this programme is announced: Beethoven, Symphany No. 6 (Pastoral); Moszkowski, Concerto for violin; Zollner, "Midnight at Sedan," (first time); Brahms, Academic Overture. Soloist, Mr. Emil Sauret.

HOWARD MALCOM TOWNSHEND.

---

[91]

Established 1845.
The Official Paper of the State.

The Official Paper of the City.

SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 17, 1896.

"Pathetic Symphony" of Tschaikowsky Receives Its Second Hearing.

The opportunities of repeatedly hearing the New York Symphony Orchestra during the past two weeks have only accentuated the appreciation of the merits of our own Symphony Orchestra. Comparisons are perhaps unnecessary, but the superior calibre of the Boston organization has been made very evident.

In the programme of Saturday the "Pathetic Symphony" of Tschaikowsky received its second hearing this season. This second performance only made it more evident that the work is one of the greatest of modern masterpieces in symphonic form. It is a great pity therefore, to find that one of the silly "stories" which build up the musical history of the boarding-school miss, is beginning to attach itself to this noble work. It is the peculiar failing of the sentimental amateur to desire some definite tale to be attached to every expressive composition, and in response to this demand a whole repertoire of untrue anecdotes has sprung into existence. One hears of Beethoven wandering off into the forest and discovering an impossible blind girl, of his finding an opportune piano, also in the woods, of his improvising the "Moonlight" sonata with the summer moonlight streaming down upon himself and the blind girl! ! And all this stuff built around a bogus title, for even the name "moonlight sonata" is but a publisher's device to help sell the work.

One hears of the disconsolate Schumann in absence sending one page of musical manuscript to his beloved Clara, of her comprehending the message and weeping over it, and then giving it to her stern father who also wept over it (it must have been rather damp by that time) and sent for the pining Schumann and said "Bless you, my children!" as every stern parent always does in fiction. And this in spite of the fact that 100,000 pages of manuscript would not have melted the obstinate old Friedrich Wieck, (he finally gave Clara to Schumann as the result of a lawsuit) and that "Warum" was not even dedicated to Clara Wieck but to Anna Robena Laidlaw!

The anecdote-monger is now at work upon this great orchestral composition; it is a work full of emotion, therefore it must needs have a story! Hence we are told that Tschaikowsky wrote this work as his own requiem; that, after finishing it, he committed suicide, and some critics already apply the name of "The Suicide Symphony" to the work. But that the details of the sick room are out of place in any but a medical journal, one could give every phase of the cholera attack which carried off the great composer. The symphony is great enough to thrill the auditor without any "musical story" adjuncts.

And it was a good plan to give the work a second time before its first impression had passed away. Bulow sometimes repeated a symphony in the same programme so that the auditors might have a double chance of catching its meaning, but this might have been too sombre a matter in the case of so sad a subject, as this brooding and sorrowing composition. The performance was all that could have been desired, and Mr. Paur and the orchestra deserve great praise and thanks.

There were two soloists at this concert, but they were by no means upon one level. Mme. Kate Rolla was not in the best voice, and seemed not to be a sufficiently passionate singer to do full justice to St. Saens' very saccharine song of Dalilah. The song itself, beautiful as it is in some of its measures, is a glaring example of false musical treatment from a dramatic point of view; if Dalilah had been dying of love for Samson she could not have expressed herself more devotedly than in the final part of this song. Mme. Rolla was recalled twice by the audience.

M. Marsick made a most excellent impression in Vieuxtemp's fourth violin concerto. He has a most sympathetic tone, and it is broad and manly as well as tender. His G string work never gets raspy or rough, as he does not overforce the tone. He gives the impression of reserve force, even in the most difficult passages; his double-stopping is clear and purely intoned, and his harmonics are always sure. His most rapid passages are never blurred, and he seems absolutely secure in the high positions; altogether a great artist who should be heard in Boston again, a man who, even in this violin year, will take a very prominent position.

Godard's Suite No. 1, from "Jocelyn" was interesting and graceful, even while not an ambitious affair. At times its curtness and simplicity might have led one to challenge its right to a place upon a symphonic programme, but we are glad that our conductor is catholic enough to give a hearing to all the various expressions of modern music.

The use of a theme of the French revolution in this work was made necessary by the dramatic situation, but the melody itself is scarcely worth the trouble expended upon it.

Being a French work there is naturally a great deal of oboe-playing in its measures, and the oboists deserve especial mention. The mountaineer music of the second movement is not very original, yet always graceful, and its drone-bass was effectively strong.

The gavotte appeared to be without a definite trio and the muted strings played the brief movement most daintily.

The ending with a Carillon at once recalls Bizet's Suite Arlesienne No. 1, and this is not to the advantage of the work, for neither Massenet nor Godard nor St. Saens can compare with Bizet in the domain of the orchestral suite. This Carillon is heavily scored and its recurring figure is treated with the same skill that the older composers used to display in writing to a "Ground-bass."

If the modern French school has not brought forth any great symphonies (if the organ were in condition one would like to hear St. Saens' great third symphony for once), it is certainly rich in graceful and attractive suites, and we hope that the "Suite Algerienne," the "Dimanche au Village," or a few other of the large suite repertoire, and possibly an example of that most prolific of suite composers, the German Franz Lachner, may soon have a hearing at these concerts.

Louis C. Elson.

SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 17, 1896.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The programme of the fifteenth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Tschaikowsky: Symphony No. 6, in B minor, "Pathetique," opus 74. (By request.)
Saint-Saens: Air, "Mon coeur s'ouvre à ta voix," from "Samson et Dalila."
Vieuxtemps: Concerto for violin, No. 4, in D minor, opus 31.
Godard: Orchestral Suite from "Jocelyn," No. 1.

Mme. Kate Rolla was the singer, and Mr. M. Marsick, the violinist.

In repeating Tschaikowsky's B minor symphony—first given in this city at the tenth concert last season, and again at the eleventh concert of the present one—Mr. Paur has done an excellent thing. It is something of a new departure for the Symphony Orchestra to give the same work twice in the same season; excepting a case or two of some famous pianist, violinist or singer repeating a concerto or aria, already played or sung by a local artist, the only previous instance of this we can remember was when Mr. Henschel gave the prelude to Wagner's "Parsifal" twice at the same concert. We have long advocated the plan of giving important new works twice, and in pretty rapid succession; the season's repertory gains, rather than loses, in interest thereby. A single hearing of a new symphony by Brahms or Tschaikowsky is little better than none at all; one wants to hear the work again, and soon at that, to make better acquaintance with it while one's first impressions are still fresh. Two rapidly successive hearings of a long and complex new work are worth four more widely separated ones; just as two rehearsals on successive days of the same week are worth four, held once a week for four weeks. Indeed, one may say that, in the present instance, where a work has made such an immensely strong impression upon both musicians and public as this symphony of Tschaikowsky's has, there was hardly a valid excuse for not repeating it.

Of the composition itself we need say nothing more new than that it still makes good and increases its first impression of being a really great work. The performance was admirable at every point.

Benjamin Godard's suite, made up of excerpts from his opera "Jocelyn," is a pretty plaything. It is full of Gallic charm, light and sparkling as champagne froth—and about as nutritious. There is room in music for such things; only one should not take them too seriously. It was excellently played.

Mme. Rolla showed that she has a fairly good soprano voice, her use of which seems to improve as the music she sings grows in intensity of expression. If her singing of the opening phrases of both verses of Dalila's familiar song was a trifle colorless and lacking in definiteness of vocal pose, she warmed up well to the great phrase beginning "Ah! réponds a ma tendresse," and sang it really exquisitely. Her ending with the few phrases, stolen from the part of Samson—for the thing is really part of a long duet—and adapted to her own, was amply justified by the beauty of her delivery of them.

Mr. Marsick has had a peculiar experience here. Last week he played the Vieuxtemps D minor concerto at the Friday afternoon rehearsal; but inflammation, resulting from an insect-bite on his left wrist, set in almost immediately after the performance, and disabled him completely for the Saturday-evening concert. But, so as not to cheat the Saturday-evening audience out of hearing him, he was forthwith re-engaged for this week—the trouble with his wrist being evidently merely temporary. Not to play the same thing twice before the same audience, he substituted Max Bruch's third concerto, in D minor, opus 58, for the one by Vieuxtemps at last Friday's rehearsal, playing the Vieuxtemps concerto, as announced, at Saturday-evening's concert. We heard him on both occasions.

Neither the Bruch nor the Vieuxtemps concerto is a particular favorite of ours. The former is by no means up to the composer's second, in G minor, in freshness and vigor of musical invention, and the latter is a work which is all too plainly drawing near the end of its day. How bright and sparkling that scherzo of Vieuxtemps's must have sounded once; and how dull and feeble it sounds now! Only the trio retains something of its former charm. The slow movement still has beauty; but what a tame and uninspiring "Finale marziale!" It is, as it were, "martial" in civilian's dress.

Mr. Marsick impresses one immediately as a true master; and this impression goes on deepening and strengthening to the end. His technique, both in bowing and in left-hand work, is exceedingly brilliant and apparently unassailable; his tone smooth, warm and telling; his phrasing unusually pure and graceful—even for a master—and his whole attitude toward what he plays that of a consummate musician. He plays both solidly and charmingly. After hearing him in two totally different concertos, we should say that he shows both distinct individuality and uncommon versatility. He was plainly Marsick in both; but not the same Marsick. You felt that he took Max Bruch in a different way and spirit from Vieuxtemps. In his playing of the Vieuxtemps Adagio, for instance, there was something of old-time "grand style" expansiveness that accurately fitted the music; his expression in the Bruch Adagio was less outspoken, but profounder. Upon the whole, Mr. Marsick is to be ranked with the really great violinists we have heard here of late. He is a true artist.

The next programme is: Beethoven, symphony No. 6, in F major, "Pastoral," opus 68; Moszkowski, concerto for violin; Zellner, "Midnight at Sedan" (first time); Brahms, Academic overture, opus 80. Mr. Emile Sauret will be the violinist.

[illegible]AY, FEBRUARY 17, 1896.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Marsick and Miss Kate Rolla Were the Soloists—Tschaikowsky Again.

Fifteenth season Boston Symphony Orchestra; fifteenth concert. Soloists: M. Marsick and Miss Kate Rolla. The programme:

Symphony No. 6, "Pathetique"...Tschaikowsky
Air, "Mon coeur s'ouvre a ta voix"..Saint-Saens
Concerto for violin, No. 4, D minor..Vieuxtemps
Suite from "Jocelyn," No. 1. (First time.) B. Godard

In the appearance of M. Marsick, the distinguished Belgian violinist, whom an accident prevented from appearing last week, was the chief interest of the concert. This man proved himself to be an artist of high attainments before he had played half a dozen bars of the concerto. He has a warm and pure tone, a keen sense of rhythm, a brilliant and accurate technique and a perfect poise of style that is refreshingly free from any trace of bidding for favor by any means not strictly artistic. On the other hand, he has not great breadth, and never thrills by any special "soul force" in his playing. Talent in plenty is his; genius he does not possess in any marked degree. The Vieuxtemps concerto is not a particularly impressive or fascinating work, but M. Marsick lent much of his skill to it, and made it very acceptable, at least.

The engagement of Miss Kate Rolla for such a concert is inexplicable. To be sure, she has a certain reputation as a singer, but if Mr. Paur had heard her once—and he must have—he should have seen that she was not up to the standard of excellence demanded by his patrons. Her voice is hard and dry, lacks carrying power, and, in its high register, is absolutely unmusical. She sang the "Delilah" aria without distinction, either in manner or tone.

The Godard suite is of small proportions, but is delicate and poetic throughout. It was beautifully played.

Another hearing fo the "Pathetique" convinces us that this work of Tschaikowsky's is the most perfect, impressive and beautiful symphony of our times. It has the elements of greatness, and that it will live is no matter of doubt. It received the most sympathetic and brilliant treatment from the orchestra.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 19, 1896.

* * *

The program of the fifteenth Symphony concert, given last night in Music Hall, was as follows:

Symphony No. 6, in B minor, Pathétique.....Tschaikowsky
(By request.)
Air, Mon cœur s'ouvre à ta voix, from Samson et Dalila.....Saint-Saëns
Concerto for violin, No. 4, in D minor.....Vieuxtemps
Orchestral suite, from Jocelyn, No. 1.....Godard
Prélude, Adagio.
Entracte, Dans les Montagnes, Moderato quasi Allegretto.
Entracte Gavotte, Andante.
Carillon, Moderato.
(First time at these concerts.)

That a symphony should be repeated at one of these concerts after a comparatively short interval (Tschaikowsky's sixth was last performed here January 10), though unusual, is not unprecedented. Call this noble work a symphony or a suite; the name is immaterial. Repeated hearings only enlarge the first and deep impressions. The third movement, which once seemed incongruous, if not vulgar, now seems full of meaning. The shouts of the populace, the hurrahs, the beating of drums, the blowing of trumpets, wreaths and rockets, manned yards, mean salutations of cannon—all these amuse the gaunt man with the scythe. And there is the thought of Shirley's lines beginning "The glories of our blood and state," which used to chill the marrow of the careless king.

Miss Rolla showed experience rather than beauty of voice or wealth of temperament.

Mr. Marsick appeared at the public rehearsal the 14th, and played Bruch's concerto No. 3. Last night he played the concerto of Vieuxtemps that was so praised by Berlioz in 1851, and he won immediately the heart of the audience. Mr. Marsick is an admirable musician who plays admirably the violin. He is not merely a man of a pet phrase or pet phrases. To him a concerto is an organic whole; and you are apt to forget beauty of detail in warm admiration of the whole performance. It is idle in these days to wonder at a man's technic. The real question is, What does he do with it? Mr. Marsick employs his great proficiency in the service of the composer. He is a master of technic; technic is not his master. And so by purity of phrasing, by setting the composition in a clear light, as one exhibits a favorite picture—by elegance, refinement and true artistry he charmed last evening musician as well as layman. His success was great and indisputable.

The music from Godard's opera contains delightful instrumental effects. Written for the theatre, it would be easier to judge of its value if it were heard under the necessary conditions. The second movement is pastorally entertaining, and the gavot is an exquisite trifle.

The Cecilia gave a concert in Music Hall the 13th. The program included part songs by Sullivan, Saint-Saëns, Chadwick, Nevin, Marchetti, de Pearsall, Dvorák, and Mendelssohn's Judge Me, O God. Mr. C. L. Capen praised the singing of the part songs, with an exception in the case of Marchetti: "The Cecilia did not sing his music well, and each department of the club seemed to have a special pitch, but the music itself, which is neither fish, flesh not fowl, may never be sung tunefully, and the musical world will certainly survive if it is never sung again." Miss Olive Mead, violinist, and Mrs. Crocker-Follet, soprano, were heartily appreciated by the audience.

PHILIP HALE.

---

[92]

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 17, 1896.

"Pathetic Symphony" of Tschaikowsky Receives Its Second Hearing.

The opportunities of repeatedly hearing the New York Symphony Orchestra during the past two weeks have only accentuated the appreciation of the merits of our own Symphony Orchestra. Comparisons are perhaps unnecessary, but the superior calibre of the Boston organization has been made very evident.

In the programme of Saturday the "Pathetic Symphony" of Tschaikowsky received its second hearing this season. This second performance only made it more evident that the work is one of the greatest of modern masterpieces in symphonic form. It is a great pity therefore, to find that one of the silly "stories" which build up the musical history of the boarding-school miss, is beginning to attach itself to this noble work. It is the peculiar failing of the sentimental amateur to desire some definite tale to be attached to every expressive composition, and in response to this demand a whole repertoire of untrue anecdotes has sprung into existence. One hears of Beethoven wandering off into the forest and discovering an impossible blind girl, of his finding an opportune piano, also in the woods, of his improvising the "Moonlight" sonata with the summer moonlight streaming down upon himself and the blind girl! ! And all this stuff built around a bogus title, for even the name "moonlight sonata" is but a publisher's device to help sell the work.

One hears of the disconsolate Schumann in absence sending one page of musical manuscript to his beloved Clara, of her comprehending the message and weeping over it, and then giving it to her stern father who also wept over it (it must have been rather damp by that time) and sent for the pining Schumann and said "Bless you, my children!" as every stern parent always does in fiction. And this in spite of the fact that 100,000 pages of manuscript would not have melted the obstinate old Friedrich Wieck, (he finally gave Clara to Schumann as the result of a lawsuit) and that "Warum" was not even dedicated to Clara Wieck but to Anna Robena Laidlaw!

The anecdote-monger is now at work upon this great orchestral composition; it is a work full of emotion, therefore it must needs have a story! Hence we are told that Tschaikowsky wrote this work as his own requiem; that, after finishing it, he committed suicide, and some critics already apply the name of "The Suicide Symphony" to the work. But that the details of the sick room are out of place in any but a medical journal, one could give every phase of the cholera attack which carried off the great composer. The symphony is great enough to thrill the auditor without any "musical story" adjuncts.

And it was a good plan to give the work a second time before its first impression had passed away. Bulow sometimes repeated a symphony in the same programme so that the auditors might have a double chance of catching its meaning, but this might have been too sombre a matter in the case of so sad a subject, as this brooding and sorrowing composition. The performance was all that could have been desired, and Mr. Paur and the orchestra deserve great praise and thanks.

There were two soloists at this concert, but they were by no means upon one level. Mme. Kate Rolla was not in the best voice, and seemed not to be a sufficiently passionate singer to do full justice to St. Saens' very saccharine song of Dalilah. The song itself, beautiful as it is in some of its measures, is a glaring example of false musical treatment from a dramatic point of view; if Dalilah had been dying of love for Samson she could not have expressed herself more devotedly than in the final part of this song. Mme. Rolla was recalled twice by the audience.

M. Marsick made a most excellent impression in Vieuxtemp's fourth violin concerto. He has a most sympathetic tone, and it is broad and manly as well as tender. His G string work never gets raspy or rough, as he does not overforce the tone. He gives the impression of reserve force, even in the most difficult passages; his double-stopping is clear and purely intoned, and his harmonics are always sure. His most rapid passages are never blurred, and he seems absolutely secure in the high positions; altogether a great artist who should be heard in Boston again; a man who, even in this violin year, will take a very prominent position.

Godard's Suite No. 1, from "Jocelyn" was interesting and graceful, even while not an ambitious affair. At times its curtness and simplicity might have led one to challenge its right to a place upon a symphonic programme, but we are glad that our conductor is catholic enough to give a hearing to all the various expressions of modern music.

The use of a theme of the French revolution in this work was made necessary by the dramatic situation, but the melody itself is scarcely worth the trouble expended upon it.

Being a French work there is naturally a great deal of oboe-playing in its measures, and the oboists deserve especial mention. The mountaineer music of the second movement is not very original, yet always graceful, and its drone-bass was effectively strong.

The gavotte appeared to be without a definite trio and the muted strings played the brief movement most daintily.

The ending with a Carillon at once recalls Bizet's Suite Arlesienne No. 1, and this is not to the advantage of the work, for neither Massenet nor Godard nor St. Saens can compare with Bizet in the domain of the orchestral suite. This Carillon is heavily scored and its recurring figure is reated with the same skill that the older composers used to display in writing to a "Ground-bass."

If the modern French school has not brought forth any great symphonies (if the organ were in condition one would like to hear St. Saens' great third symphony for once), it is certainly rich in graceful and attractive suites, and we hope that the "Suite Algerienne," the "Dimanche au Village," or a few other of the large Gallic repertoire, and possibly an example of that most prolific of suite composers, the German Franz Lachner, may soon have a hearing at these concerts.

Louis C. Elson.

Boston Transcript
MONDAY, FEBRUARY 17, 1896.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The programme of the fifteenth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Tschaikowsky: Symphony No. 6, in B minor, "Pathétique," opus 74. (By request.)
Saint-Saëns: Air, "Mon coeur s'ouvre à ta voix," from "Samson et Dalila."
Vieuxtemps: Concerto for violin, No. 4, in D minor, opus 31.
Godard: Orchestral Suite from "Jocelyn," No. 1.

Mme. Kate Rolla was the singer, and Mr. M. Marsick, the violinist.

In repeating Tschaikowsky's B minor symphony—first given in this city at the tenth concert last season, and again at the eleventh concert of the present one—Mr. Paur has done an excellent thing. It is something of a new departure for the Symphony Orchestra to give the same work twice in the same season; excepting a case or two of some famous pianist, violinist or singer repeating a concerto or aria, already played or sung by a local artist, the only previous instance of this we can remember was when Mr. Henschel gave the prelude to Wagner's "Parsifal" twice at the same concert. We have long advocated the plan of giving important new works twice, and in pretty rapid succession; the season's repertory gains, rather than loses, in interest thereby. A single hearing of a new symphony by Brahms or Tschaikowsky is little better than none at all; one wants to hear the work again, and soon at that, to make better acquaintance with it while one's first impressions are still fresh. Two rapidly successive hearings of a long and complex new work are worth four more widely separated ones; just as two rehearsals on successive days of the same week are worth four, held once a week for four weeks. Indeed, one may say that, in the present instance, where a work has made such an immensely strong impression upon both musicians and public as this symphony of Tschaikowsky's has, there was hardly a valid excuse for not repeating it.

Of the composition itself we need say nothing more now than that it still makes good and increases its first impression of being a really great work. The performance was admirable at every point.

Benjamin Godard's suite, made up of excerpts from his opera "Jocelyn," is a pretty plaything. It is full of Gallic charm, light and sparkling as champagne froth—and about as nutritious. There is room in music for such things; only one should not take them too seriously. It was excellently played.

Mme. Rolla showed that she has a fairly good soprano voice, her use of which seems to improve as the music she sings grows in intensity of expression. If her singing of the opening phrases of both verses of Dalila's familiar song was a trifle colorless and lacking in definiteness of vocal pose, she warmed up well to the great phrase beginning "Ah! réponds a ma tendresse," and sang it really exquisitely. Her ending with the few phrases, stolen from the part of Samson—for the thing is really part of a long duet—and adapted to her own, was amply justified by the beauty of her delivery of them.

Mr. Marsick has had a peculiar experience here. Last week he played the Vieuxtemps D minor concerto at the Friday afternoon rehearsal; but inflammation, resulting from an insect-bite on his left wrist, set in almost immediately after the performance, and disabled him completely for the Saturday-evening concert. But, so as not to cheat the Saturday-evening audience out of hearing him, he was forthwith re-engaged for this week—the trouble with his wrist being evidently merely temporary. Not to play the same thing twice before the same audience, he substituted Max Bruch's third concerto, in D minor, opus 58, for the one by Vieuxtemps at last Friday's rehearsal, playing the Vieuxtemps concerto, as announced, at Saturday-evening's concert. We heard him on both occasions.

Neither the Bruch nor the Vieuxtemps concerto is a particular favorite of ours. The former is by no means up to the composer's second, in G minor, in freshness and vigor of musical invention, and the latter is a work which is all too plainly drawing near the end of its day. How bright and sparkling that scherzo of Vieuxtemps's must have sounded once; and how dull and feeble it sounds now! Only the trio retains something of its former charm. The slow movement still has beauty; but what a tame and uninspiring "Finale marziale!" It is, as it were, "martial" in civilian's dress.

Mr. Marsick impresses one immediately as a true master; and this impression goes on deepening and strengthening to the end. His technique, both in bowing and in left-hand work, is exceedingly brilliant and apparently unassailable; his tone smooth, warm and telling; his phrasing unusually pure and graceful—even for a master—and his whole attitude toward what he plays that of a consummate musician. He plays both solidly and charmingly. After hearing him in two totally different concertos, we should say that he shows both distinct individuality and uncommon versatility. He was plainly Marsick in both; but not the same Marsick. You felt that he took Max Bruch in a different way and spirit from Vieuxtemps. In his playing of the Vieuxtemps Adagio, for instance, there was something of old-time "grand style" expansiveness that accurately fitted the music; his expression in the Bruch Adagio was less outspoken, but profounder. Upon the whole, Mr. Marsick is to be ranked with the really great violinists we have heard here of late. He is a true artist.

The next programme is: Beethoven, symphony No. 6, in F major, "Pastoral," opus 68; Moszkowski, concerto for violin; Zöllner, "Midnight at Sedan" (first time); Brahms, Academic overture, opus 80. Mr. Emile Sauret will be the violinist.

The Boston Traveler
MONDAY, FEBRUARY 17, 1896.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Marsick and Miss Kate Rolla Were the Soloists—Tschaikowsky Again.

Fifteenth season Boston Symphony Orchestra; fifteenth concert. Soloists: M. Marsick and Miss Kate Rolla. The programme:

Symphony No. 6, "Pathetique"...Tschaikowsky
Air, "Mon coeur s'ouvre a ta voix"..Saint-Saens
Concerto for violin, No. 4, D minor..Vieuxtemps
Suite from "Jocelyn," No. 1. (First time.) B. Godard

In the appearance of M. Marsick, the distinguished Belgian violinist, whom an accident prevented from appearing last week, was the chief interest of the concert. This man proved himself to be an artist of high attainments before he had played half a dozen bars of the concerto. He has a warm and pure tone, a keen sense of rhythm, a brilliant and accurate technique and a perfect poise of style that is refreshingly free from any trace of bidding for favor by any means not strictly artistic. On the other hand, he has not great breadth, and never thrills by any special "soul force" in his playing. Talent in plenty is his; genius he does not possess in any marked degree. The Vieuxtemps concerto is not a particularly impressive or fascinating work, but M. Marsick lent much of his skill to it, and made it very acceptable, at least.

The engagement of Miss Kate Rolla for such a concert is inexplicable. To be sure, she has a certain reputation as a singer, but if Mr. Paur had heard her once—and he must have—he should have seen that she was not up to the standard of excellence demanded by his patrons. Her voice is hard and dry, lacks carrying power, and, in its high register, is absolutely unmusical. She sang the "Delilah" aria without distinction, either in manner or tone.

The Godard suite is of small proportions, but is delicate and poetic throughout. It was beautifully played.

Another hearing fo the "Pathetique" convinces us that this work of Tschaikowsky's is the most perfect, impressive and beautiful symphony of our times. It has the elements of greatness, and that it will live is no matter of doubt. It received the most sympathetic and brilliant treatment from the orchestra.

The Musical Courier.
NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 19, 1896.

* *

The program of the fifteenth Symphony concert, given last night in Music Hall, was as follows:

Symphony No. 6, in B minor, Pathétique.....Tschaikowsky
(By request.)
Air, Mon cœur s'ouvre à ta voix, from Samson et Dalila.....Saint-Saëns
Concerto for violin, No. 4, in D minor.....Vieuxtemps
Orchestral suite, from Jocelyn, No. 1.....Godard
Prélude, Adagio.
Entracte, Dans les Montagnes, Moderato quasi Allegretto.
Entracte Gavotte, Andante.
Carillon, Moderato.
(First time at these concerts.)

That a symphony should be repeated at one of these concerts after a comparatively short interval (Tschaikowsky's sixth was last performed here January 10), though unusual, is not unprecedented. Call this noble work a symphony or a suite; the name is immaterial. Repeated hearings only enlarge the first and deep impressions. The third movement, which once seemed incongruous, if not vulgar, now seems full of meaning. The shouts of the populace, the hurrahs, the beating of drums, the blowing of trumpets, wreaths and rockets, manned yards, mea[illegible], salutations of cannon—all these amuse the gaunt man with the scythe. And there is the thought of Shirley's lines beginning "The glories of our blood and state," which used to chill the marrow of the careless king.

Miss Rolla showed experience rather than beauty of voice or wealth of temperament.

Mr. Marsick appeared at the public rehearsal the 14th, and played Bruch's concerto No. 3. Last night he played the concerto of Vieuxtemps that was so praised by Berlioz in 1851, and he won immediately the heart of the audience. Mr. Marsick is an admirable musician who plays admirably the violin. He is not merely a man of a pet phrase or pet phrases. To him a concerto is an organic whole; and you are apt to forget beauty of detail in warm admiration of the whole performance. It is idle in these days to wonder at a man's technic. The real question is, What does he do with it? Mr. Marsick employs his great proficiency in the service of the composer. He is a master of technic; technic is not his master. And so by purity of phrasing, by setting the composition in a clear light, as one exhibits a favorite picture—by elegance, refinement and true artistry he charmed last evening musician as well as layman. His success was great and indisputable.

The music from Godard's opera contains delightful instrumental effects. Written for the theatre, it would be easier to judge of its value if it were heard under the necessary conditions. The second movement is pastorally entertaining, and the gavot is an exquisite trifle.

The Cecilia gave a concert in Music Hall the 13th. The program included part songs by Sullivan, Saint-Saëns Chadwick, Nevin, Marchetti, de Pearsall, Dvorák, and Mendelssohn's Judge Me, O God. Mr. C. L. Capen praised the singing of the part songs, with an exception in the case of Marchetti: "The Cecilia did not sing his music well, and each department of the club seemed to have a special pitch, but the music itself, which is neither fish, flesh not fowl, may never be sung tunefully, and the musical world will certainly survive if it is never sung again." Miss Olive Mead, violinist, and Mrs. Crocker-Follet, soprano, were heartily appreciated by the audience.

PHILIP HALE.

Gazette

and business and circulation are responding accordingly.

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 23.

The Symphony Concert.

The sixteenth rehearsal of the Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall, on Friday afternoon. The programme was:

Orchestral Fantasia.....Zöllner
Concerto for Violin, C-major.....Moszkowski
"Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks".....R. Strauss
Symphony No. 6, F-major.....Beethoven
Soloist, Mr. Emile Sauret.

The Zöllner work is the orchestral interlude between acts 1 and 2 of an opera, "Bei Sedan," and, in its proper place, may be full of the rarest meaning; judged as an orchestral work, it has little to commend it to the attention or win for it human interest. The composer has tagged a descriptive programme to it, and those who yawn may read. The Richard Strauss work does not possess much greater value. Given the ordinary orchestra, with the addition of three bassoons, one double bassoon, four horns, with four additional horns ad libitum; three trumpets with three additional trumpets ad libitum, a watchman's rattle and a liberal variety and number of drums, and a very great amount of noise may be made—how much, Richard Strauss demonstrates. We are told that the work is a "joke," a German joke; that is a metaphysical scientifico-analytical and synthetic joke, a powerful weapon of offence, that surprises and dazes and stuns. The large audience assembled accepted the joke with troubled instead of smiling faces, and wondered when they were expected to laugh. A noisy, nerve-destroying, heavy piece of work, weak in ideas and strong in energy; a sketch by Beardsley set to music, crude in color, confusing in design and utterly unlovable. It will be pleasantly treasured in memory, however, because after hearing it Beethoven's symphony was doubly dear.

The soloist, Mr. Sauret, is a marvel; equally wonderful as an artist and as a master of technique. His tone is full, warm and beautifully clear; his style dignified, large, imposing and of the utmost finish, as to technique. As an encore, he played an arrangement of the sextet from "Lucia," a work abundantly supplied with octaves, tenths, harmonics and all difficulties of which a violinist dreamed or had the nightmare, and the difficulties were conquered with an ease that was startling, and with a grace that was delightful. Technique has no perplexities for Mr. Sauret; but what is better is that he is an artist in the highest meaning of the word; his work is marked by purity of style, exquisite taste, by thought and by feeling. That he should deliberately show at a Symphony concert what he can do in the way of bow and finger gymnastics does not detract from his higher merits, for before entering the temple of fame, an artist is frequently compelled to demonstrate to the people that he has the right to pass beyond and above them and sit with his equals, and when he speaks to the people, he must use their language, and astonish before he can be understood.

BOSTON POST,
FEBRUARY 23, 1896.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The sixteenth symphony concert last night was one of both novelty and interest, interesting especially because of the altogether delightful playing of Mr. Emile Sauret, whose performance of the Moszkowski violin concerto was so acceptable to the large audience that it for the time forgot the unwritten law regarding encores and applauded until the soloist returned to the centre of the stage and played an unaccompanied solo.

The present symphony series has been remarkable for the number of violinists who have been heard. Up to last night the most artistic performer in this line has been Marsick, whose performance a week ago quite electrified the audience; but here comes another in the person of Sauret, whose work is quite the equal of Marsick in almost every way.

The Moszkowski concerto, which, by the way, is dedicated to Sauret, is a most difficult composition, and one that greatly taxes the physical ability of a performer. The first movement is not especially interesting, and while the solo part was well played, there was nothing especial to bring out the performer's ability. With the second movement, however, the case was different, for it had not progressed very far before plenty of opportunity was offered the player, and it was evident that it was equal to any tax put upon him by an artist of the finest powers. His technique is nearly perfect, his intonation is pure and sweet, and he plays with much style and breadth. His tones are always warm, and he plays with the greatest sweetness and intensity. This movement, as well as the third, was played with much purity and refinement, and it was not surprising that the audience should rise to the occasion and reward him as he eminently deserved to be. In response to the applause, he played in masterly style a selection from "Lucia," arranged for a violin concerto by himself, and this graceful bit on his part immediately made him popular with the audience.

The opening number on the programme was an orchestral fantasie, "Midnight at Sedan," by Heinrich Zoller, heard here for the first time. It is thoroughly descriptive and weird in the extreme. Its opening measures are a quaint bit of orchestral writing, but the themes are deftly worked one into the other, and as an example of development the composition is perfect.

The other novelty was a trifle from Strauss called "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." It is a nerve-distracting work in which much prominence is given to the brasses and drums. Midway a pretty melody is introduced, which reappears at intervals, which atones in a measure for the general heaviness of the work. It was not a pleasing work, however, because of its lack of melody. The "Pastoral" symphony of Beethoven finished the programme, which was longer than usual. It was rendered in a splendid manner, Mr. Paur putting much feeling, obtaining from the orchestra all that it was capable of.

The concert next week, but one, will be a new

BOSTON HERALD,
SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 23, 1896.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Good, bad and indifferent music, in fact almost every conceivable kind of music, was performed at the 16th Symphony Concert in Music Hall last evening, and the program read as follows:

Orchestra Fantasia, "Midnight at Sedan," Zollner; concerto for violin, C major, op. 30, Moszkowski; "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," Strauss; symphony No. 6, "Pastoral," Beethoven.

The selection, of all others, that should not have been heard at this concert, neither at any respectable concert, was that by Richard Strauss. From first to last it was musical obscenity of the most unique and remarkable description; in form a crazy-quilt, in orchestral color much the same. The editor of the program-book describes, or rather translates it as "after an old rogue's tune by Richard Strauss." Call it after an old roué's tune, and imagine this old roué on a spree and you hit the nail nearer on the head.

According to the erratic Richard Strauss this latest and most inexplicable hodge-podge from his pen is Eulenspiegel, "Merry Pranks Set to Orchestra." Now Eulenspiegel is one of the most famous characters of the Deutchen Volksbücher. His daily beverage was doubtless beer, and the music of Strauss is unmistakably beerish. In his stupidly unsuccessful attempts to produce a mirth-provoking, sprightly and grotesque setting to a very funny tale, he simply presents a grotesquely uninteresting tone-picture, and the mythical Eulenspiegel and his merry pranks are most inanely colored by the medium through which they are seen.

The tone-picture, with all its abnormal and hideously grotesque proportions, is that of a heavy, dull and witless Teuton. The orchestration of the work is sound and fury, signifying nothing, and the piccolo-flute, three flutes, three oboes, the four clarinets, bassoons, trombones, drums and rattles are made to indulge in a shrieking, piercing, noisy breakdown most of the time.

The very worthiest novelty of the concert was the concerto by Moskowski. This great work is far from being the mere show-piece that its title would imply. Its first movement is charmingly clear and spirited in character. It is distinguished also for a large melodic outline, such as one is not apt to find in the average modern violin or pianoforte concerto. The virtuoso's part in the work is throughout characteristically violin-like, and one can easily believe that as was Ferdinand David to Mendelssohn when the latter composed his violin concerto, so has Sauret been to Moszkowski.

Even a single experience with the work is sufficient to make it clear that it affords a well night unrivaled opportunity for bringing out at a single stroke all the great technical qualities of the maestro violinist. The andante is, perhaps, the most thoroughly musical movement of the work and is imbued with all the poetic feeling that even the most captious music lover could desire. With the finale comes a veritable perpetuum mobile in which the performer's technique is severely tested.

Mr. Sauret produced the work with wonderful clearness, delightful firmness of execution and with great beauty of tone. Mr. Sauret has several times been heard in Boston, notably in 1872, again at a concert given by Ilma de Murska Sept. 28, 1874, and he also played in various parts of the United States in 1876 and '77. He is now a mature and highly cultivated artist.

It does not appear to be at all to his liking to perform like Sivori, who was never so thoroughly in his element as when he imagined he saw the devil's tail protruding from the S shaped apertures of his instrument. Sauret is first, last and always the artist. His technical command of the violin is none the less conspicuous, and no other violinist, since Thompson was here, has played octaves so marvelously well.

At the conclusion of his performance the orchestra and audience seemed to vie with each other in applause and shouts of bravo. He was again and again recalled, and finally yielding to an irrepressible and long-prolonged demand he responded by performing with masterly effect an arrangement of the well-known sextet from "Lucia."

The orchestral performance of the program music by Zöllner was excellent, and the accompaniment afforded Mr. Sauret seemed even more praiseworthy.

C. L. CAPEN.

SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 23, 1896.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The appetite of Boston for music seems to be insatiable, for notwithstanding the excess of it that the past three weeks have provided, the desire for more was forcibly accented by the large audience in attendance last night in Music Hall at the 16th of this season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, the programme for which was:

Fantasy, "Midnight at Sedan".....H. Zollner
Concerto for violin in C, op. 80.....Moszkowski
"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks"..R. Strauss
"Pastoral" symphony.....Beethoven

M. Emile Sauret was the soloist. The Zoellner and the Strauss selections were heard at these concerts for the first time on this occasion. The first of these has little, if any, musical value. It is programme music pure and simple, and what it says and what it means are wholly incomprehensible in the absence of an elaborate description. The programme book gave a general idea of the composer's intentions, but the difficulty of applying it to the details of the score was wholly baffling. It is an interlude between the first and second act of Zollner's opera, "At Sedan," and may have been effective enough in its original place as a means of preparing the hearer for what comes after, but in the concert room it is dry, dull and groping in effect, and has not a little of vulgar commonplace. The orchestration is rich and massive, after the modern fashion, but it does not atone for the irritating vagueness and the readiness of invention that characterizes the score. The Strauss work is an attempt to put into music the comical aspect in which the mythical practical joker Eulenspiegel appears to his German admirers who have laughed at his tricks, not always distinguished for their freedom from naughtiness, for nearly four centuries. In order to depict the mirthfulness of this rough fun-maker, Strauss has increased the wind instruments of the conventional concert orchestra to a piccolo, three flutes, three oboes, an English horn, four clarinets, three bassoons, a double bassoon, eight horns, six trumpets, and a watchman's rattle, to say nothing of every variety of drum, from all which may be derived the fact that there is no lack of noise in this delectable musical joke. The orchestration in point of ingenious elaboration, novelty in effect and general originality, casts into the deepest shade the wildest efforts of the wildest follower of the modern school. As a bit of tone color laid on with a whitewash brush it is a masterpiece, but otherwise it is a blood-curdling nightmare. Never before was an orchestra subjected to such an ordeal in technique as it is in this work. Strauss has treated all his instruments in a way that would almost indicate that he expected their performers to be virtuosos of the first rank, the exception being in favor of the player of the watchman's rattle; but even here he demands from that classic instrument all of which it is capable. To the wood wind he is remorseless in the exactions he makes on both breath and fingers, and he sets no end of pitfalls for the performer who ventures to trifle with the frolicsome task he has imposed on the shrill and lip-tingling D clarinet. What the music is all about cannot possibly be divined on a first hearing, unless, perhaps, by some one thoroughly conversant with the resources of German fun and, as a consequence, fully in sympathy with it. It is not unlikely that the work may give a picturesque and faithful tone picture of the facetious Eulenspiegel of Braunschweig, and if it does, it may be freely conceded that he was an exceedingly cacophonous person who was not felicitous in imparting lucidity to his sense of humor. The splendid virtuosity of the orchestra was never as brilliantly vindicated as it was in the performance of this surpassingly difficult work; but the game was not worth the candle, unless it was to cast a strong light on the mastery of Strauss over the complicated combinations which is possible in modern orchestration.

What a relief it was when the first bars of the Beethoven symphony were heard after all this bizarre noise and straining after-effect. The difference between the mere dauber and the true artist could not have been shown in a more valuable object lesson. On the one hand was a palette overloaded with color in every variety and splashed on the canvas in thick masses to no end save confusion; on the other was the skill which knew how to use a simple palette and to produce, with the instinct of genius, a beautiful and a perfect work of art. Before the first movement of the symphony, which was finely read and played from beginning to end, was over, the ears were cleansed of the brutalities of Strauss.

M. Sauret had been heard several times in Boston before his performances of last night, but it was years ago, and to the greater part of the public he was a newcomer. In the time that has passed since he played on the same stage, he has won and merited the right to rank among the representative great violinists of the day. In the matter of technique he is unsurpassed. Nothing is impossible to him that is possible on his instrument. He has a beautiful tone, not large, but firm and pure, and his bowing is broad, free and graceful. The Moszkowski concerto is tiresomely long and not especially interesting. It is not lacking in charming movements of melodiousness, but it is spun out inordinately, especially the first movement, with whose themes the composer seems to have been so enamored that he was loth to part with them until he could no longer present them in a changed aspect. M. Sauret played it with exquisite clearness, brilliancy and delicacy of style; but it was in the andante that his full powers of expression were illustrated. A slow movement is always the test of an artist's real work. Flourishing over an instrument, be it never so skilfully, excites no more than astonishment; but Cantabile puts his gifts to a far severer test, and decides whether he is an artist entitled to the name, or only an industrious and clever exhibitor of musical fireworks. M. Sauret played this movement with every refined grace of style and beauty of phrasing. The violin sang under his hands with noble pathos and faultless purity of taste. The finale, which is mere finger and bow work, save for a lovely bit of cantilena, which appears now and then, enabled the artist to show his mastery of the finger board, and with results that gained for him at the end of his performance one of those spontaneous outbursts of applause that are the most cherished triumphs of an artist. After recalling him five times, M. Sauret gave as an encore a transcription of the famous sextette in Lucia, the playing of which was so masterly that he again aroused the wildest enthusiasm. The audience clapped and cried "Bravo! bravo!" in a fashion that was unusual for it even in its most tumultuous moods; in fact, no more emphatic success has been made at the Symphony concerts this season.

There will be no concert until that of March 6, when the programme will be: Suite, A. Foote, first time; concerto for violoncello, Schumann; symphony in G minor, Mozart. Soloist, Mr. Leo Schulz.

[93]

SUNDAY [illegible]

[illegible] FEBRUARY 23, 1896.

The soloist at the [illegible] concert was Mr Sauret, violinist, whose last visit to America was made in 1875. The orchestral numbers were Heinrich Zollner's orchestral fantasia, "Midnight at Sedan," given for the first time here; Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," op 28, also given for the first time, and Beethoven's symphony, No. 6, in F major, "Pastoral," op 68.

Mr Sauret is new to the younger generation of concert goers. He was given a warm reception when he appeared, however, and after he had played the Moszkowski concerto for violin, in C major, op 30, bowed three times his appreciation of the "Bravos" which were hurled at him, and finally responded to the hearty encore with a number which he played without accompaniment. The score of the concerto was dedicated to Mr Sauret by the author.

Mr Sauret is unlike many artists who have appeared here, inasmuch as he does not possess any of those freakish elements in his makeup which have characterized them. He impresses one as a manly man, and yet produces an emotional effect in his playing to an extent which is remarkable. He has an excellent stage presence, and yet does not pose for the benefit of his auditors.

Mr Sauret is certainly a master of the mechanics of violin playing, and his phrasing in the Moszkowski concerto was all that could be desired. His execution was brilliant and his playing was marred only by an occasional rasping or scratchy tone on the G string. His encore number, a show piece, was excellently rendered, and he was compelled to bow his acknowledgments several times.

The orchestra fantasia, "Midnight at Sedan," is somewhat Wagnerian in character. It is a descriptive composition from Zollner's opera, "Bei Sedan." It begins with a dreamy movement suggesting the peace and quiet of midnight. Then comes the tolling of midnight, followed by the flutes and piccolo shrieking out the weird cries of the affrighted night birds. Then the crash and din of battle, the blare of trumpets, and the boom of brass and drums lending their aid to carry to a successful termination the vivid tone picture. The composition ends with a mournful melody. The work was given with remarkable effect by the orchestra.

Mr Paur read the score of Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" with rare judgment, and his players followed his every motion with admirable precision and accuracy.

The Beethoven symphony in F major tells in its first movement of the awakeninig of cheerful feelings on arriving in the country. This movement is in 2-4 time, and was excellently played, as was the second movement in 12-8, portraying the scene by the brookside.

The third, fourth and fifth movements portrayed, respectively, the meeting of the country folk, a thunder storm and a shepherd's song. They were well worked out and Mr Paur's efforts deserved the recognition which followed.

There will be no rehearsal and concert this week. The program for March 6 and 7 will be: Suite, A. Foote, first time; concerto for violoncello, Schumann; symphony in G minor, Mozart. Soloist, Mr Leo Schulz.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 26, 1896

The program of the sixteenth Symphony concert was as follows: Orchestra fantasia, Midnight at Sedan, Zöllner; concerto for violin, C major, op. 30, Moszkowski; Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks, Strauss; Symphony No. 6, Pastoral, Beethoven.

I was at Falstaff. Mr. C. L. Capen wrote as follows in the Boston Journal of the work of Strauss:

The selection, of all others, that should not have been heard at this concert, neither at any respectable concert, was that by Richard Strauss. From first to last it was musical obscenity of the most unique and remarkable description; in form a crazy quilt, in orchestral color much the same. The editor of the program book describes or rather translates it as "after an old rogue's tune by Richard Strauss." Call it after an old roué's tune, and imagine this old roué on a spree and you hit the nail nearer on the head. According to the erratic Richard Strauss this latest and most inexplicable hodge-podge from his pen is Eulenspiegel, Merry Pranks Set to Orchestra. Now Eulenspiegel is one of the most famous characters of the Deutschen Volksbücher. His daily beverage was doubtless beer, and the music of Strauss is unmistakably beerish. In his stupidly unsuccessful attempts to produce a mirth provoking, sprightly and grotesque setting to a very funny tale he simply presents a grotesquely uninteresting tone picture, and the mythical Eulenspiegel and his merry pranks are most inanely colored by the medium through which they are seen.

The tone picture, with all its abnormal and hideously grotesque proportions, is that of a heavy, dull and witless Teuton. The orchestration of the work is sound and fury, signifying nothing, and the piccolo-flute, three flutes, three oboes, the four clarinets, bassoons, trombones, drums and rattles are made to indulge in a shrieking, piercing, noisy breakdown most of the time.

Mr. B. E. Woolf, in the Boston Herald, paid this glowing tribute to Sauret, whose playing excited the wildest applause of musicians and laymen:

M. Sauret had been heard several times in Boston before his performance of last night, but it was years ago, and to the greater part of the public he was a newcomer. In the time that has passed since he played on the same stage he has won and merited the right to rank among the representative great violinists of the day. In the matter of technic he is unsurpassed. Nothing is impossible to him that is possible on his instrument. He has a beautiful tone, not large, but firm and pure, and his bowing is broad, free and graceful. The Moszkowski concerto is tiresomely long and not especially interesting. It is not lacking in charming movements of melodiousness, but it is spun out inordinately, especially the first movement; with these themes the composer seems to have been so enamored that he was loath to part with them until he could no longer present them in a changed aspect. M. Sauret played it with exquisite clearness, brilliancy and delicacy of style; but it was in the andante that his full powers of expression were illustrated. A slow movement is always the test of an artist's real work. Flourishing over an instrument, be it never so skillfully, excites no more than astonishment; but cantibile puts his gifts to a far severer test, and decides whether he is an artist entitled to the name or only an industrious and clever exhibitor of musical fireworks. M. Sauret played this movement with every refined grace of style and beauty of phrasing. The violin sang under his hands with noble pathos and faultless purity of taste. The finale, which is mere finger and bow work, save for a lovely bit of cantilena, which appears now and then, enabled the artist to show his mastery of the finger board, and with results that gained for him at the end of his performance one of those spontaneous outbursts of applause that are the most cherished triumphs of an artist. After recalling him five times M. Sauret gave as an encore a transcription of the famous sextet in Lucia, the playing of which was so masterly that he again aroused the wildest enthusiasm. The audience clapped and cried "Bravo! bravo!" in a fashion that was unusual for it even in its most tumultuous moods; in fact, no more emphatic success has been made at the Symphony concerts this season.

PHILIP HALE.

Gazette

and business and circulation are responding accordingly.

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 23.

The Symphony Concert.

The sixteenth rehearsal of the Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall, on Friday afternoon. The programme was:

Orchestral Fantasia.....Zöllner
Concerto for Violin, C-major.....Moszkowski
"Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks".....R. Strauss
Symphony No. 6, F-major.....Beethoven
Soloist, Mr. Emile Sauret.

The Zöllner work is the orchestral interlude between acts 1 and 2 of an opera, "Bei Sedan," and, in its proper place, may be full of the rarest meaning; judged as an orchestral work, it has little to commend it to the attention or win for it human interest. The composer has tagged a descriptive programme to it, and those who yawn may read. The Richard Strauss work does not possess much greater value. Given the ordinary orchestra, with the addition of three bassoons, one double bassoon, four horns, with four additional horns ad libitum; three trumpets with three additional trumpets ad libitum, a watchman's rattle and a liberal variety and number of drums, and a very great amount of noise may be made—how much, Richard Strauss demonstrates. We are told that the work is a "joke," a German joke; that is a metaphysical scientifico-analytical and synthetic joke, a powerful weapon of offance, that surprises and dazes and stuns. The large audience assembled accepted the joke with troubled instead of smiling faces, and wondered when they were expected to laugh. A noisy, nerve-destroying, heavy piece of work, weak in ideas and strong in energy; a sketch by Beardsley set to music, crude in color, confusing in design and utterly unlovable. It will be pleasantly treasured in memory, however, because after hearing it Beethoven's symphony was doubly dear.

The soloist, Mr. Sauret, is a marvel; equally wonderful as an artist and as a master of technique. His tone is full, warm and beautifully clear; his style dignified, large, inposing and of the utmost finish, as to technique. As an encore, he played an arrangement of the sextet from "Lucia," a work abundantly supplied with octaves, tenths, harmonics and all difficulties of which a violinist dreamed or had the nightmare, and the difficulties were conquered with an ease that was startling, and with a grace that was delightful. Technique has no perplexities for Mr. Sauret; but what is better is that he is an artist in the highest meaning of the word; his work is marked by purity of style, exquisite taste, by thought and by feeling. That he should deliberately show at a Symphony concert what he can do in the way of bow and finger gymnastics does not detract from his higher merits, for before entering the temple of Fame, an artist is frequently compelled to demonstrate to the people that he has the right to pass beyond and above them and sit with his equals,and when he speaks to the people, he must use their language, and astonish before he can be understood.

BOSTON POST,

FEBRUARY 23, 1896.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The sixteenth symphony concert last night was one of both novelty and interest, interesting especially because of the altogether delightful playing of Mr. Emile Sauret, whose performance of the Moszkowski violin concerto was so acceptable to the large audience that it for the time forgot the unwritten law regarding encores and applauded until the soloist returned to the centre of the stage and played an unaccompanied solo.

The present symphony series has been remarkable for the number of violinists who have been heard. Up to last night the most artistic performer in this line has been Marsick, whose performance a week ago quite electrified the audience; but here comes another in the person of Sauret, whose work is quite the equal of Marsick in almost every way.

The Moszkowski concerto, which, by the way, is dedicated to Sauret, is a most difficult composition, and one that greatly taxes the physical ability of a performer. Its first movement is not especially interesting, and while the solo part was well played, there was nothing especial to bring out the performer's ability. With the second movement, however, the case was different, for it had not progressed very far before plenty of opportunity was offered the player, and it was evident that he was equal to any tax put upon him and an artist of the finest powers. His technique is nearly perfect, his intonation is pure and sweet, and he plays with much style and breadth. His tones are always warm, and he plays with the greatest earnestness and intensity. This movement, as well as the third, was played with much purity and refinement, and it was not surprising that the audience should rise to the occasion and reward him as he eminently deserved to be. In response to the applause, he played in masterly style the sextet from "Lucia," arranged for a violin concerto by himself, and this graceful act on his part immediately made him a favorite with the audience.

The opening number on the programme was an orchestral fantasie, "Midnight at Sedan," by Heinrich Zoller, heard here for the first time. It is thoroughly descriptive and weird in the extreme. Its opening measures are a quaint bit of musical writing, but the themes are deftly woven one into the other, and as an example of development the composition is interesting.

The other novelty was a trifle from [illegible] called "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." It is a nerve-distracting work in which much prominence is given to brasses and drums. Midway a pretty melody is introduced, which reappears at the end, which atones in a measure for the general heaviness of the work. It was given a hearing, however, because of its composer. The "Pastoral" symphony of Beethoven finished the programme, which was much longer than usual. It was played in a splendid manner, Mr. Paur bringing the work with much feeling, obtaining from the orchestra all that it was capable of producing.

There will be no concert next week, but on the following week a new suite by Arthur Foote will be played, and Leo Schultz of the orchestra will play the Schumann concerto for violoncello.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 23, 1896.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Good, bad and indifferent music, in fact almost every conceivable kind of music, was performed at the 16th Symphony Concert in Music Hall last evening, and the program read as follows:

Orchestra Fantasia, "Midnight at Sedan," Zollner; concerto for violin, C major, op. 30, Moszkowski; "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," Strauss; symphony No. 6, "Pastoral," Beethoven.

The selection, of all others, that should not have been heard at this concert, neither at any respectable concert, was that by Richard Strauss. From first to last it was musical obscenity of the most unique and remarkable description; in form a crazy-quilt, in orchestral color much the same. The editor of the program-book describes, or rather translates it as "after an old rogue's tune by Richard Strauss." Call it after an old roué's tune, and imagine this old roué on a spree and you hit the nail nearer on the head.

According to the erratic Richard Strauss this latest and most inexplicable hodge-podge from his pen is Eulenspiegel, "Merry Pranks Set to Orchestra." Now Eulenspiegel is one of the most famous characters of the Deutchen Volksbücher. His daily beverage was doubtless beer, and the music of Strauss is unmistakably beerish. In his stupidly unsuccessful attempts to produce a mirth-provoking, sprightiy and grotesque setting to a very funny tale, he simply presents a grotesquely uninteresting tone-picture, and the mythical Eulenspiegel and his merry pranks are most inanely colored by the medium through which they are seen.

The tone-picture, with all its abnormal and hideously grotesque proportions, is that of a heavy, dull and witless Teuton. The orchestration of the work is sound and fury, signifying nothing, and the piccolo-flute, three flutes, three oboes, the four clarinets, bassoons, trombones, drums and rattles are made to indulge in a shrieking, piercing, noisy breakdown most of the time.

The very worthiest novelty of the concert was the concerto by Moskowski. This great work is far from being the mere show-piece that its title would imply. Its first movement is charmingly clear and spirited in character. It is distinguished also for a large melodic outline, such as one is not apt to find in the average modern violin or pianoforte concerto. The virtuoso's part in the work is throughout characteristically violin-like, and one can easily believe that as was Ferdinand David to Mendelssohn when the latter composed his violin concerto, so has Sauret been to Moszkowski.

Even a single experience with the work is sufficient to make it clear that it affords a well night unrivaled opportunity for bringing out at a single stroke all the great technical qualities of the maestro violinist. The andante is, perhaps, the most thoroughly musical movement of the work and is imbued with all the poetic feeling that even the most captious music lover could desire. With the finale comes a veritable perpetuum mobile in which the performer's technique is severely tested.

Mr. Sauret produced the work with wonderful clearness, delightful firmness of execution and with great beauty of tone. Mr. Sauret has several times been heard in Boston, notably in 1872, again at a concert given by Ilma de Murska Sept. 28, 1874, and he also played in various parts of the United States in 1876 and '77. He is now a mature and highly cultivated artist.

It does not appear to be at all to his liking to perform like Sivori, who was never so thoroughly in his element as when he imagined he saw the devil's tail protruding from the S shaped apertures of his instrument. Sauret is first, last and always the artist. His technical command of the violin is none the less conspicuous, and no other violinist, since Thompson was here, has played octaves so marvelously well.

At the conclusion of his performance the orchestra and audience seemed to vie with each other in applause and shouts of bravo. He was again and again recalled, and finally yielding to an irrepressible and long-prolonged demand he responded by performing with masterly effect an arrangement of the well-known sextet from "Lucia."

The orchestral performance of the program music by Zöllner was excellent, and the accompaniment afforded Mr. Sauret seemed even more praiseworthy.

C. L. CAPEN.

[93]

HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCIX., NO. 54.

SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 23, 1896.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The appetite of Boston for music seems to be insatiable, for notwithstanding the excess of it that the past three weeks have provided, the desire for more was forcibly accented by the large audience in attendance last night in Music Hall at the 16th of this season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, the programme for which was:

Fantasy, "Midnight at Sedan".....H. Zollner
Concerto for violin in C, op. 30....Moszkowski
"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks"..R. Strauss
"Pastoral" symphony.....Beethoven

M. Emile Sauret was the soloist. The Zoellner and the Strauss selections were heard at these concerts for the first time on this occasion. The first of these has little, if any, musical value. It is programme music pure and simple, and what it says and what it means are wholly incomprehensible in the absence of an elaborate description. The programme book gave a general idea of the composer's intentions, but the difficulty of applying it to the details of the score was wholly baffling. It is an interlude between the first and second act of Zollner's opera, "At Sedan," and may have been effective enough in its original place as a means of preparing the hearer for what comes after, but in the concert room it is dry, dull and groping in effect, and has not a little of vulgar commonplace. The orchestration is rich and massive, after the modern fashion, but it does not atone for the irritating vagueness and the readiness of invention that characterizes the score. The Strauss work is an attempt to put into music the comical aspect in which the mythical practical joker Eulenspiegel appears to his German admirers who have laughed at his tricks, not always distinguished for their freedom from naughtiness, for nearly four centuries. In order to depict the mirthfulness of this rough fun-maker, Strauss has increased the wind instruments of the conventional concert orchestra to a piccolo, three flutes, three oboes, an English horn, four clarinets, three bassoons, a double bassoon, eight horns, six trumpets, and a watchman's rattle, to say nothing of every variety of drum, from all which may be derived the fact that there is no lack of noise in this delectable musical joke. The orchestration in point of ingenious elaboration, novelty in effect and general originality, casts into the deepest shade the wildest efforts of the wildest follower of the modern school. As a bit of tone color laid on with a whitewash brush it is a masterpiece, but otherwise it is a blood-curdling nightmare. Never before was an orchestra subjected to such an ordeal in technique as it is in this work. Strauss has treated all his instruments in a way that would almost indicate that he expected their performers to be virtuosos of the first rank, the exception being in favor of the player on the watchman's rattle; but even here he demands from that classic instrument all of which it is capable. To the wood wind he is remorseless in the exactions he makes on both breath and fingers, and he sets no end of pitfalls for the performer who ventures to trifle with the frolicsome task he has imposed on the shrill and lip-tingling D clarinet. What the music is all about cannot possibly be divined on a first hearing, unless, perhaps, by some one thoroughly conversant with the resources of German fun and, as a consequence, fully in sympathy with it. It is not unlikely that the work may give a picturesque and faithful tone picture of the facetious Eulenspiegel of Braunschweig, and if it does, it may be freely conceded that he was an exceedingly cacophonous person who was not felicitous in imparting lucidity to his sense of humor. The splendid virtuosity of the orchestra was never as brilliantly vindicated as it was in the performance of this surpassingly difficult work; but the game was not worth the candle, unless it was to cast a strong light on the mastery of Strauss over the complicated combinations which is possible in modern orchestration.

What a relief it was when the first bars of the Beethoven symphony were heard after all this bizarre noise and straining after-effect. The difference between the mere dauber and the true artist could not have been shown in a more valuable object lesson. On the one hand was a palette overloaded with color in every variety and splashed on the canvas in thick masses to no end save confusion; on the other was the skill which knew how to use a simple palette and to produce, with the instinct of genius, a beautiful and a perfect work of art. Before the first movement of the symphony, which was finely read and played from beginning to end, was over, the ears were cleansed of the brutalities of Strauss.

M. Sauret had been heard several times in Boston before his performances of last night, but it was years ago, and to the greater part of the public he was a newcomer. In the time that has passed since he played on the same stage, he has won and merited the right to rank among the representative great violinists of the day. In the matter of technique he is unsurpassed. Nothing is impossible to him that is possible on his instrument. He has a beautiful tone, not large, but firm and pure, and his bowing is broad, free and graceful. The Moszkowski concerto is tiresomely long and not especially interesting. It is not lacking in charming movements of melodiousness, but it is spun out inordinately, especially the first movement, with whose themes the composer seems to have been so enamored that he was loth to part with them until he could no longer present them in a changed aspect. M. Sauret played it with exquisite clearness, brilliancy and delicacy of style; but it was in the andante that his full powers of expression were illustrated. A slow movement is always the test of an artist's real work. Flourishing over an instrument, be it never so skilfully, excites no more than astonishment; but Cantabile puts his gifts to a far severer test, and decides whether he is an artist entitled to the name, or only an industrious and clever exhibitor of musical fireworks. M. Sauret played this movement with every refined grace of style and beauty of phrasing. The violin sang under his hands with noble pathos and faultless purity of taste. The finale, which is mere finger and bow work, save for a lovely bit of cantilena, which appears now and then, enabled the artist to show his mastery of the finger board, and with results that gained for him at the end of his performance one of those spontaneous outbursts of applause that are the most cherished triumphs of an artist. After recalling him five times, M. Sauret gave as an encore a transcription of the famous sextette in Lucia, the playing of which was so masterly that he again aroused the wildest enthusiasm. The audience clapped and cried "Bravo! bravo!" in a fashion that was unusual for it even in its most tumultuous moods; in fact, no more emphatic success has been made at the Symphony concerts this season.

There will be no concert until that of March 6, when the programme will be: Suite, by A. Foote, first time; concerto for 'cello, Schumann; symphony, G minor, Mozart. Mr. Leo Schulz is to be soloist.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, FEB. 23, 1896.

Symphony Concert.

The soloist at the 16th Symphony concert was Mr Sauret, violinist, whose last visit to America was made in 1877. The orchestral numbers were Heinrich Zollner's orchestral fantasia, "Midnight at Sedan," given for the first time here; Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," op 28, also given for the first time, and Beethoven's symphony, No. 6, in F major, "Pastoral," op 68.

Mr Sauret is new to the younger generation of concert goers. He was given a warm reception when he appeared, however, and after he had played the Moszkowski concerto for violin, in C major, op 30, bowed three times his appreciation of the "Bravos" which were hurled at him, and finally responded to the hearty encore with a number which he played without accompaniment. The score of the concerto was dedicated to Mr Sauret by the author.

Mr Sauret is unlike many artists who have appeared here, inasmuch as he does not possess any of those freakish elements in his makeup which have characterized them. He impresses one as a manly man, and yet produces an emotional effect in his playing to an extent which is remarkable. He has an excellent stage presence, and yet does not pose for the benefit of his auditors.

Mr Sauret is certainly a master of the mechanics of violin playing, and his phrasing in the Moszkowski concerto was all that could be desired. His execution was brilliant and his playing was marred only by an occasional rasping or scratchy tone on the G string. His encore number, a show piece, was excellently rendered, and he was compelled to bow his acknowledgments several times.

The orchestra fantasia, "Midnight at Sedan," is somewhat Wagnerian in character. It is a descriptive composition from Zollner's opera, "Bei Sedan." It begins with a dreamy movement suggesting the peace and quiet of midnight. Then comes the tolling of midnight, followed by the flutes and piccolo shrieking out the weird cries of the affrighted night birds. Then the crash and din of battle, the blare of trumpets, and the boom of brass and drums lending their aid to carry to a successful termination the vivid tone picture. The composition ends with a mournful melody. The work was given with remarkable effect by the orchestra.

Mr Paur read the score of Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" with rare judgment, and his players followed his every motion with admirable precision and accuracy.

The Beethoven symphony in F major tells in its first movement of the awakeninig of cheerful feelings on arriving in the country. This movement is in 2-4 time, and was excellently played, as was the second movement in 12-8, portraying the scene by the brookside.

The third, fourth and fifth movements portrayed, respectively, the meeting of the country folk, a thunder storm and a shepherd's song. They were well worked out and Mr Paur's efforts deserved the recognition which followed.

There will be no rehearsal and concert this week. The program for March 6 and 7 will be: Suite, A. Foote, first time; concerto for violoncello, Schumann; symphony in G minor, Mozart. Soloist, Mr Leo Schulz.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 26, 1896

The program of the sixteenth Symphony concert was as follows: Orchestra fantasia, Midnight at Sedan, Zöllner; concerto for violin, C major, op. 30, Moszkowski; Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks, Strauss; Symphony No. 6, Pastoral, Beethoven.

I was at Falstaff. Mr. C. L. Capen wrote as follows in the Boston Journal of the work of Strauss:

The selection, of all others, that should not have been heard at this concert, neither at any respectable concert, was that by Richard Strauss. From first to last it was musical obscenity of the most unique and remarkable description; in form a crazy quilt, in orchestral color much the same. The editor of the program book describes or rather translates it as "after an old rogue's tune by Richard Strauss." Call it after an old roué's tune, and imagine this old roué on a spree and you hit the nail nearer on the head. According to the erratic Richard Strauss this latest and most inexplicable hodge-podge from his pen is Eulenspiegel, Merry Pranks Set to Orchestra. Now Eulenspiegel is one of the most famous characters of the Deutschen Volksbücher. His daily beverage was doubtless beer, and the music of Strauss is unmistakably beerish. In his stupidly unsuccessful attempts to produce a mirth provoking, sprightly and grotesque setting to a very funny tale he simply presents a grotesquely uninteresting tone picture, and the mythical Eulenspiegel and his merry pranks are most inanely colored by the medium through which they are seen.

The tone picture, with all its abnormal and hideously grotesque proportions, is that of a heavy, dull and witless Teuton. The orchestration of the work is sound and fury, signifying nothing, and the piccolo-flute, three flutes, three oboes, the four clarinets, bassoons, trombones, drums and rattles are made to indulge in a shrieking, piercing, noisy breakdown most of the time.

Mr. B. E. Woolf, in the Boston Herald, paid this glowing tribute to Sauret, whose playing excited the wildest applause of musicians and laymen:

M. Sauret had been heard several times in Boston before his performance of last night, but it was years ago, and to the greater part of the public he was a newcomer. In the time that has passed since he played on the same stage he has won and merited the right to rank among the representative great violinists of the day. In the matter of technic he is unsurpassed. Nothing is impossible to him that is possible on his instrument. He has a beautiful tone, not large, but firm and pure, and his bowing is broad, free and graceful. The Moszkowski concerto is tiresomely long and not especially interesting. It is not lacking in charming movements of melodiousness, but it is spun out inordinately, especially the first movement; with these themes the composer seems to have been so enamored that he was loath to part with them until he could no longer present them in a changed aspect. M. Sauret played it with exquisite clearness, brilliancy and delicacy of style; but it was in the andante that his full powers of expression were illustrated. A slow movement is always the test of an artist's real work. Flourishing over an instrument, be it never so skillfully, excites no more than astonishment; but cantibile puts his gifts to a far severer test, and decides whether he is an artist entitled to the name or only an industrious and clever exhibitor of musical fireworks. M. Sauret played this movement with every refined grace of style and beauty of phrasing. The violin sang under his hands with noble pathos and faultless purity of taste. The finale, which is mere finger and bow work, save for a lovely bit of cantilena, which appears now and then, enabled the artist to show his mastery of the finger board, and with results that gained for him at the end of his performance one of those spontaneous outbursts of applause that are the most cherished triumphs of an artist. After recalling him five times M. Sauret gave as an encore a transcription of the famous sextet in Lucia, the playing of which was so masterly that he again aroused the wildest enthusiasm. The audience clapped and cried "Bravo! bravo!" in a fashion that was unusual for it even in its most tumultuous moods; in fact, no more emphatic success has been made at the Symphony concerts this season.

PHILIP HALE.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 24, 1896.

Symphony Concert Programme Full of Novelties.

If ever the critic longed for ubiquity it was on Saturday night when the best comic opera of the Italian school was represented at Mechanics' Hall, and a programme full of novelties and a great violinist formed the attraction at Music Hall. It was an intense illustration of the lines:—

How happy could I be with either,
Were t'other dear charmer away.

But believing that reviewing, like charity, should begin at home, the present writer turned to the alliterative combination of Symphony, Sauret and Strauss, although by no means a convert to Rubinstein's sour-grape statement that Symphony is a higher musical form than opera. It was an evening of "programme music." This school of composition can be briefly defined as objective music, instrumental music which tells a definite story, and, while the cultured musician holds such tonal story-telling as less high than "pure music" (subjective music) the general public almost always prefers a tone-picture, a composition in which the emotions and events are labelled.

Zollner's "Midnight at Sedan" is a species of "Danse Macabre" at wholesale; instead of a few individual spectres a few regiments of ghosts turn up. As in St. Saen's work, the clock strikes midnight, and then up come the skeletons, not, as in the "Macabre" for a soire dansante, but for a regimental drill, and ghostly battle. Naturally they arise in chromatics and with piccolo phrases, but they can no more make our flesh creep than could the fat boy in "Pickwick;" the fact is, that the modern concert-goer has become inured to this kind of diablerie, and even the muted horn which gives its nasal blast at regular intervals in all such music, no longer causes fear to any one but the horn-player.

It was a piccolo night; in almost every number this imp of the orchestra had its shrieking duties to perform, and one must pay cordial tribute to the player of this instrument for his steadiness and incisive style. In the first number the oboe did some excellent work also. The picture was essentially military, and tambour militaire was as often to the front as kettle-drums, although the latter instrument had a double organ-point of considerable power to execute. Altogether "Midnight at Sedan" was interesting but not thrilling. We fancied that we caught just a reminder of "Die Wacht am Rhein" at one part, but it was so brief that it might have been merely accidental resemblance.

Now came Emile Sauret, the great violinist. It was not an advantageous thing to follow Ondricek and Marsick, for both of these had made an impression and, besides, the public might possibly be sated with violin music. Spite of such a handicap, M. Sauret won the greatest kind of a triumph, a triumph both as musician and as virtuoso. He chose Moszkowski's Concerto in C, which is dedicated to him, for his re-entree to a Boston concert-room. It is a work of great beauty and romance, and it combines technique with expression in a most satisfactory manner. The first movement had sufficient dash and brilliancy, but was scarcely calculated to bring out the individuality of the soloist, being rather an orchestral picture; the second movement, however, brings the violin into the foreground in a masterly manner, and here M. Sauret displayed a breadth and a sympathetic tone that was glorious. The octave work was most powerful, and the ending in highest harmonics was as purely intoned as if it possessed no difficulties whatever. A thoroughly chaste and classical style of playing was here displayed.

The finale contained some very strong contrasts. The chief theme in this was of utmost rapidity, while the subordinate theme was of dignified and noble character. In both veins M. Sauret fulfilled all the demands of the composer. His broad bowing in the second theme was a delight to every auditor. Then came an outburst of enthusiasm such as is seldom heard in Boston; such as Melba achieved after her mad scene, or Paderewski after a Liszt concerto. The rule was broken, an encore was allowed, a proceeding which is not at all to be commended at these dignified concerts, and which opens the door to much that is inartistic in the future. The encore was, however, very welcome per se, and was the most astounding display of virtuosity since Thomson stood on the same platform. It was Sauret's own transcription of the sextette from "Lucia," played as a violin solo!! After this we may look for anything, up to the "Mastersingers of Nuremburg" played on one string!! In this transcription there was every technical difficulty that is known to the instrument except double stopping in harmonics. M. Sauret gave his single harmonics with a piping flageolet quality that reminded of Wieniawski, and in simultaneous bowing and pizzicato, in the most accurate double-stopping, in runs, skips, high positions, in everything belonging to violin fireworks, showed himself a giant in his technique, as in the concerto he had shown himself a thorough musician. Another outburst of frantic applause followed and it was certainly well-deserved, although the "Lucia" sextette scarcely deserves a place in the symphony concerts.

As the present writer may seem too furious against the Donizetti muse, it may be permitted that he rise, at this point, to a personal explanation. Donizetti was a genius in the making of tunes, just as Mozart was, but he stood to his combination of poetry and music. He considered music paramount, and therefore never sought to express the full meaning of his text by means of music. When the two arts thoroughly unite in his works it is rather by accident than by design. The wedding of poetry and music is by no means a matter of fashion. Gluck is of an epoch anterior to Donizetti, and even though his operas are not often given his theories are followed at the present time, while no one will ever again follow the inartistic lead of Donizetti or Rossini. Wagner's works may go "out of fashion" (although the present writer cannot bring himself to believe it), but his theory of the combination of poetry and music will last forever, because it is a philosophic truth. In Herbert Spencer's essay "On Education" he voices exactly the Wagnerian theory, in his arraignment of the drawing room songs of the day, and Gluck voiced something very similar over a century ago. The sextette of "Lucia" is one of the best points in the opera, yet observe what untruths it tells; note what a tender and melodious phrase tells of the thought of vengeance an combat on the part of Edgardo and Enrico! In the sweetest intervals known to music, a succession of thirds and sixths, the one sings of his misery, the other of remorse and revenge! Try the experiment of changing the words; place the music on the piano-rack and sing—

Now in Peace and Joy abiding
Pass the hours in gladness gliding, to the first two lines in which Donizetti has pictured agony and anger, and the reader will find that the sense of the music is not disturbed, but actually enhanced thereby.

Nor is it the Italian school which is here attacked; Verdi followed the true dramatic sense when he wrote the absolutely great quartette in "Rigoletto" (equally popular with this sextette), for the duke sings "Bella Figlia dell' amore" to a light melody, Maddelena laughs out in light staccato, "Ah, ah! rido ben di core," her coquettish merriment, Gilda is sobbing her heart out in broken phrases on "Ah! Cosi—parlar—d'amore," and Rigoletto has a stern and terrific mood in his "Taci! il piangere non vale." Here is genius if you will, here is the predecessor of the "Meistersinger" quintette (if it must needs have a predecessor), here is the dramatic instinct which led Verdi finally to "Aida" and to "Otello," but this spirit of dramatic unity (which is not a matter of fashion) did not exist in Donizetti; if he had lived a thousand years he would have brought forth nothing but beautiful and singable melodies, laudable in their proper place, reprehensible when thrust forward as interpreters of a poetic idea.

Revenons a nos Moutons! After this great display of solo virtuosity came a display of orchestral virtuosity equally remarkable. Richard Strauss made a musical joke! When a follower of Wagner makes a jest in orchestral guise he requires trombones, piccolo, bass tuba, English horn, bass drum, double bassoon, half-a-dozen trumpets, a double quartette of horns, and all the percussive instruments that can be gathered. By this time the humor grows rather Johnsonian. There were progressions in this work that would have made Mozart's teeth rattle. The clarinette in D screamed out its humor until one imagined the player black in the face. This clarinette, by the way, has no business in the orchestra; its only place is in the military band. Once before the military clarinette has been heard in our concert-room, when Berlioz, in the scene in Hades, in the "Symphonie Fantastique," used an E flat clarinette, but nothing short of Sheol would seem to demand the little squealer.

Strauss' chief amusement, in his "Till Eulenspiegel" seemed to be to scamper from the cellar to the garret of the orchestra and back again. From contra-bassoon to piccolo and high clarinette the solo phrases followed each other, and then would come an outburst that caused the timid auditor to cling to his seat. But it was a great exhibition of skill in scoring, and this thing of shreds and patches showed that nothing can be written that our orchestra cannot conquer. The reading was something that should forever prove the great ability of Mr. Paur and the overwhelming technique of our orchestra. Till Eulenspiegel, the beau ideal of a happy-go-lucky, by turns charlatan, servant, artist, cheating everybody, and as full of pranks as an egg is full of meat, deserves a less pompous treatment in music. Carlyle himself has spoken of "Till Eulenspiegel" with great respect.

Beethoven's thunder-storm ("Pastoral Symphony") seemed a very light rain storm after Strauss' earthquakes. Everything seemed tame after such a furious spicing. The first movement of the symphony was very well executed, but was read rather too sedately, and the repeat of the exposition was cut out as the programme was exceptionally long.

The symphony is perhaps the weakest of the nine, and its display of ornithology at the end of the second movement seems the reductio ad absurdam of programme-music. The joke of the third movement, however, the tipsy bassoonist who has but three notes on his instrument and cannot even count those straight, was a good deal better than any of the humor displayed by that Wagnerian chromo,—Richard Strauss.

Louis C. Elson.

Boston Transcript
MONDAY, FEBRUARY 24, 1896.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the sixteenth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Heinrich Zöllner: Orchestral Fantasia, "Midnight at Sedan." (First time.)
Moszkowski: Concerto for Violin, in C major, opus 30.
Richard Strauss: "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," opus 28. (First time.)
Beethoven: Symphony No. 6, in F major, "Pastoral," opus 68.

Mr. Emile Sauret was the violinist.

On the fly-leaf of the score of "Midnight at Sedan" Zöllner has had printed an elaborate programme-analysis of the composition. An English version of this was reproduced in the programme-books. Whether in German or English, it may be set down as one of the most ingenuous bits of thoosy-moosy, would-be-poetic fustian ever couched in schoolboy prose. We think it worth while to say this here, because it fits the composition—and the composition it—to a T. So you may imagine what the composition is like! This was its first performance in Boston; had it been a Requiem, one might say of it, as Berlioz once said of a certain Requiem he heard: "Appropriately brought out at its own funeral!"

The other first-timer on the programme was Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel." This purports to be a humorous composition; a sort of musical joke. Eulenspiegel was a great hand at practical jokes, of the giuoco di mano sort—also known as giuoco di villano, by the way—and Strauss seems to have thought he could imitate him by playing a practical joke upon the general public. He has scored it for a portentous orchestra, as big as that of the "Nibelungen." For beauty of form and coloring, for refined delicacy of humor, this jocular composition is about on a par with the ordinary one-cent valentine of commerce.

Why should such things be given at a Symphony concert? If the late John S. Dwight ever said a true word, it was that a Symphony concert should be a place where one can seek refuge from "was uns Alle bändigt, das Gemeine;" and here we find the Zöllner piece to be the sorriest trash, and the Strauss thing even worse than that! It has been rumored at times that the Symphony Orchestra would feel it infra dig. to play (Johann) Strauss waltzes or light Italian overtures; we wonder how they feel under the indignity of being made to play this last monstrosity by Richard Strauss! Of course, it may be urged that novelties are desirable; indeed, they are, and the crop does not look very promising just now. But tout vient a qui sait attendre, and it is ill forcing luck with such bluff hands as these.

Beethoven's "Pastoral" was, as it seemed to us, rather listlessly played; we doubt if the average orchestral player of today cares much for the "Pastoral;" together with the D major symphony, No. 2, this sixth, in F major, seems to be rather falling out of favor. It has too much of the "young Beethoven" in it for men who would play Wagner for pleasure, and Tschaikowsky's "Pathétique" on their knees—if that posture were favorable to instrumental performance. At all events, the "Pastoral" did not seem to be just the work the players would have chosen to take the flavor of Strauss's "Eulenspiegel" out of their mouths. We have heard it better played before, and far more effectively.

Mr. Sauret has not been here since he made his first bow before our public, as a young aspirant for fame, in 1877. Nineteen years have brought about a growth in him in more ways than one. And yet he is still the Sauret we remember—only more so, in all good respects. When first he played here, his most striking characteristics as a violinist were great purity of technique, and an appealing personal charm; to these may be added an almost total absence of self-consciousness, and of the florid outward manner that goes with the same. His purity of technique has now grown to consummate and astounding virtuosity; his personal charm and modest, concentrated manner remain. We are no violin expert; but it certainly seems to us that, of all the astonishing virtuosi who have played the violin here of late, Mr. Sauret has the most impeccably sure technique. It is brilliant as that of any of his confrères and rivals; but in, the matter of clearness and pure intonation—even in face of some terrific and apparently "copyrighted" difficulties—it is the most infallible we have yet seen. His tone is pure, warm, and searching, if not over-large; his phrasing artistic as possible. The Moszkowski concerto did not give him the opportunity for showing great depth of sentiment; but sensibility, brilliancy, and vital force were all conspicuously there. In short, he played like a master. The work itself is genial, pleasing, and naturally written, rather than great. In response to the plaudits of the audience, he played—what do you think? That very self-same solo transcription of the sextet in "Lucia," with which he turned all heads nineteen years ago! A little titivated and brought up to date, to be sure, but the same thing. He played it as only he can play it, and we can assure him that it sounds even better with six voices, chorus, and orchestra!

The next programme (for March 6 and 7) is: Arthur Foote, suite (new); Schumann, concerto for violoncello; Mozart, symphony in G minor. Mr. Leo Schulz will be the 'cellist. There will be no rehearsal nor concert this week.

YORK HERALD
FEBRUARY 23, 1896.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, always welcome here, will give its fourth concert for this season at the Metropolitan Opera House on Thursday evening. The soloists on this occasion will be Mme. Lillian Blauvelt and Mr. Franz Kneisel, both of whom are well known to the music lovers of this city.

The programme will comprise Mr. Heinrich Zoellner's orchestral fantasia, "Midnight at Sedan," which will be played by this orchestra for the first time; the aria "With Verdure Clad," from "The Creation;" Viotti's concerto for violin, in A minor, in rendering which Mr. Kneisel reverses the order of the movements, playing the adagio first with a cadenza by himself; Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," and Brahms' symphony, No. 4, in E minor.

THE NEW-YORK TIMES,
FEBRUARY 23, 1896.—1

—BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its fourth concert at the Metropolitan Opera House on Thursday evening. Lillian Blauvelt will sing Haydn's "With Verdure Clad," and Franz Kneisel will play Viotti's twenty-second violin concerto. The orchestral numbers will be Heinrich Zöllner's fantasia, "Midnight at Sedan," a novelty; Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," and Brahms's Fourth Symphony. The Strauss composition is a musical reflection of an old German tale supposed to have been written by Dr. Thomas Murner (1475-1530). Till is a wandering mechanic who plays tricks upon all he meets. He is one of the mythical heroes of the German masses.

The Sun.
SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 23, 1896.

NOTES OF MUSIC EVENTS.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its fourth concert of this season next Thursday evening in the Metropolitan Opera House. Mme. Lillian Blauvelt and Mr. Franz Kneisel are to be the soloists, and Mr. Emil Paur will, of course, conduct. The programme is of great interest and excellence, and includes two novelties. It opens with Heinrich Zöllner's orchestral fantasia "Midnight at Sedan," which is the orchestral interlude between the first and second acts of Zöllner's opera "Bei Sedan." Blauvelt is to sing the aria "With Verdure Clad," from Haydn's "Creation," and Mr. Kneisel will play Viotti's "Concerto for violin, No. 22, in A minor." Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" should prove very interesting. It depicts some of the pranks of the popular German folklore hero, and is described as "a musical joke," with characteristics varying from the sprightly, grotesque, and violent to the tender and passionate. The programme closes with the Brahms "Symphony No. 4, in E minor, Op. 98."

THE PRESS: SUNDAY
G, FEBRUARY 23, 1896.

Here is the programme for the fourth concert here this season of the Boston Symphony, which will be given on Thursday evening at the Metropolitan Opera House:

Orchestral Fantasia, "Midnight at Sedan," Heinrich Zollner.
"With Verdure Clad," from "The Creation," Haydn
(Mme. Lillian Blauvelt.)
Concerto for violin, in A minor.....Viotti
(Franz Kneisel.)
"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks".Richard Strauss Symphony in E minor.....Brahms

The novelties will be Zollner's fantasia and Strauss's composition. The fantasia is the orchestral interlude between acts I. and II. of the opera, "Bie Sedan." The full title of the other work may be translated thus: "Till Eulenspiegel's merry pranks, set to grand orchestra—in rondo form—after an old rogue's tune." Till Eulenspiegel is the hero of an old German tale, who plays all kinds of tricks on everybody. The composition is a musical joke, and the music often reaches the point of broad burlesque and farce.

THE WORLD:
FEBRUARY 23, 1896.

There will be two important orchestral concerts during the week. The first of these is that of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Metropolitan Opera-House, on Thursday evening, Feb. 27. The programme will consist of Heinrich Zoellner's orchestral fantasia "Midnight at Sedan;" Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Justige Streche," a musical humoresque based on the old popular German folk-tale, and Brahms's Fourth Symphony. The soloists are Mme. Lillian Blauvelt, who will sing "With Verdure Clad" from "The Creation," and Mr. Franz Kneisel, who will play Viotti's A minor violin concerto in a rearranged form.

TRIBUNE, SUNDAY,
FEBRUARY 23, 1896.

Mme. Lillian Blauvelt and Franz Kneisel will be the solo performers at the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will take place in the Metropolitan Opera House next Thursday evening. There will be two novelties on the programme, Heinrich Zoellner's "Midnight at Sedan" (given last season at a private concert of the Liederkranz), and a rondo by Richard Strauss entitled "Till Eulenspiegel's lustige Streiche," which is also promised by Mr. Thomas. Mme. Blauvelt will sing "With Verdure Clad," from Haydn's "Creation," and Mr. Kneisel will play two movements from a violin concerto in A minor by Viotte. The symphony will be Brahms's in E minor.

The New York Record.
BY GEORGE W. TURNER.
SUNDAY, FEB. 23, 1896.

Quite an interesting number of musical events are set forth for the present week.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gives its fourth concert at the Metropolitan on Thursday evening next.

One of the selections is Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," op. 28.

The name Eulenspiegel means literally owl's mirror.

For a clearer idea as to the nature of the composition I quote this note:

The full title of this composition is: Till Eulenspiegels lustige Streiche, nach alter Schelmenweise — in Rondeauform — fur grosses Orchester gesetzt von Richard Strauss. I am somewhat in doubt as to the correct translation of this; "nach alter Schelmenweise" may mean "after an old rogue's-tune" (Rogues' March?), but may equally well mean "after old-time rogue's fashion." Let me venture to English it: Till Euplenspiegel's Merry Pranks, set to grand orchestra—in Rondo-form—after an old rogue's-tune, by Richard Strauss.

Till (or Tyll) Eulenspiegel is the hero of an old German tale, supposed by some to have been written by Dr. Thomas Murner (1475-1530). The story gives him out as a wandering Braunschweig mechanic, who plays all sorts of tricks on everybody, and always comes out ahead. The book has long been a popular classic in Germany, and has become almost identified with the folk-lore of the nation. For centuries Eulenspiegel has been as popular and familair a mythical character in Germany as any hero in the Deutschen Volksbucher—as Santa Claus, Slovenly Peter, or Baron Munchausen is with us. The story was first published in an English translation (I imagine, with frequent expurgations in usum Delphini) as Tyll Owiglass.*

Of Richard Strauss' composition the analyst can say that it is in F major, and shows evident traces of the rondo-form. But it is a musical joke, very free in development, and its humorous side is plainly intended to be its most prominent one. Its character changes from the lively and sprightly to the grotesque, the violent, the tender and passionate—for Eulenspiegel could make love on occasion and the simply jovial. Often the music reaches the point of broad burlesque and farce.

This composition is scored for 1 piccolo-flute, 3 flutes, 3 oboes, 1 English horn, 1 small clarionet in D, 2 ordinary clarionets, 1 bass-clarionet, 3 bassoons, 1 double-bassoon, 4 horns (with 4 additional horns ad libitum), 3 trumpets (with three additional trumpets ad libitum), 3 trombones, 1 bass-tuba, kettle-drums, triangle, cymbals, bass-drum, snare-drum, 1 watchman's rattle, and the usual strings. The score is dedicated to Dr. Arthur Seidl.

* * *

The programme also includes Heinrich Zoellner's orchestral fantasia, "Midnight at Sedan," which will be given for the first time; Haydn's aria, "With Verdure Clad," from "The Creation;" Viotti's concerto for violin, No. 22, in A minor, and Johannes Brahms' Symphony No. 4 in E minor, op. 28.

* * *

Zoellner's "Midnight at Sedan" is the orchestral interlude between acts I. and II. of that composer's opera, "Bei Sedan." On the flyleaf of the score is printed the following description:

"Night rests upon the fields of Sedan. The mists of the Meuse have risen; valley and mountain lie enveloped in a white, spectral mantle. The strokes of the midnight hour sound from the tower of Sedan Cathedral. But, hark! Does it not sound like a soft rapping in the bowels of the earth? What sound is this that breaks the silence, uncannily and muffled, and affrights the night-birds? What arises, tired and heavy, from the opening earth? Crowds and crowds push their way upward—by hundreds and thousands they rise from their graves, the gray features of the dead revive, their bony hands once more grasp their arms, the ranks form again. The sabres and breast-plates flash in the moonlight, the plumes wave on the helmets, the Imperial Eagle gleams. The masses crowd close together; dark resolution, dull hatred, inspire the bloodless ghosts to fight—to fight, that is their lot! To fight the ghostly battle at midnight!

"But what soft plaint sounds over the field of death? Does it not sound like the sorrowful sobbing of mourning mothers and orphan children? Like the wail of all Humanity?

"Crowd them back again, all thoughts of peace, home, wife, and child! To the attack! The horns sound, the drums roll! See the frightfully careering masses of cavalry! They fly onward on their spectral horses, they surround the shock of the opposing armies with inextricable knots, they fight man to man, body to body. But it does not last long, the proud masses are dispersed and annihilated; the heaps of slain lie mountain high, they are buried by thousands beneath their own steeds. Proud and metallic sound the fanfares of victory—mightier and mightier grows the attack—one thought alone lives in them: the foe must be thrown down—wholly—at once!

"But yonder—to one side, near the skirt of the forest—who is there? Lies not there a German soldier, a French soldier by his side? The hands of both are clasped, as in brotherly harmony. They slumber on together to eternal rest—and their hands [illegible] last moments; both of [illegible] children of the same earth [illegible] weeps for us both afar off! [illegible] as foes—death is a great reconciliator!

And the night wind bears the distant sounds of a solemn melody over the battle-field—is it the last song of a dying hero? Or is it a warning call from superearthly fields; O, be reconciled, ye hostile nations—look upon the dead of Sedan!

The above is a sufficient analysis of the composition, which is perfectly free in form and development. It is in C major, and is scored for one piccolo-flute, two flutes, two oboes, three clarionets, two bassoons, four horns, three trumpets, three trombones, one bass-tuba, triangle, cymbals, snare-drum, kettle-drums, harp, and the usual strings.

THE PHILADELPHIA RECORD,
FEBRUARY 25.

Fourth Boston Symphony Concert.

It is almost a musical heresy to find fault with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has become such an idol of fashion; and yet patience has ceased to be a virtue—especially after such a concert programme as that of last evening at the Academy of Music. A superb organization, indeed, is the orchestra itself; but far from satisfactory is its latest conductor, Herr Emil Paur. He has signally distinguished himself throughout his career as a composer of distressingly ill-balanced programmes, and the climax was reached last night in the juxtaposition of such a Midway Plaisance of sounds as Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegels' Merry Pranks," with Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony. This whimsical work is described as "a musical joke," but the joke was upon the audience, and a cruel one, too. The devil-may-care young Rossini did not perpetrate a more atrocious jest upon the feelings of the auditors of his mock opera, and they nearly arose and drove him from the theatre. Strauss' half-tipsy opus would be a capital piece of nonsense to listen to, as one sat in Alt Wien and smoked a cigarette and quaffed a mug of Muenchener beside the Blue Danube, but upon a sober concert programme, preceded by one of Beethoven's "Immortal Nine," it certainly gave one the impression of an unexpected case of musical delirium tremens. Its watchman's rattle would have frightened off even the intrepid Sousa. Herr Paur runs altogether too much to the fantastic, to harmonic oddities and extravagant colors. Introduced judiciously and not too abundantly, these caprices of the instrumental and contrapuntal fancy would be relishes and hors d'œuvres in the concert menus; but the Boston Symphony programmes now bewilder one with their eccentric and Puck-like aspect. To add to last evening's grievance the Beethoven symphony was rather listlessly played, and the first violinist was missed. Fraulein Milka Ternina, the German opera prima donna, attempted to sing Weber's "Ocean" aria and Agathe's prayer and aria from "Der Freischuetz" against a considerable week's performance of "Die Walkure" revealed a delightful soprano, but her hoarseness. Her Bruennhilde in last voice was decidedly under the weather last night, and her attack was uncertain, particularly in the opening of the severe "Ocean" aria. Her voice is, however, too reliable in its upper register and too expressive in its middle notes not to demonstrate its power, even under such an unfortunate condition, and she was roundly applauded. The performance of Benjamin Godard's orchestral suite (No. 1), from "Jocelyn," afforded Philadelphians practically their first opportunity to judge of the operatic music of this still lamented composer of the younger French school. His posthumous opera, "La Vivandiere," was to have been given its premier American production in New York this season, but was not put on. This suite, with its peculiar adagio prelude, its florid mountain melody, its dainty gavotte, and its almost dramatic carillon, revealed the decided individuality of this prolific minor maestro and testified to that exquisite touch which has lent such a charm to his smaller effects.

PUBLIC LEDGER—PHILADELPHIA,
FEBRUARY 25. 189

Academy of Music—Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music, last evening, was in fine keeping with the high standard for which these performances are noted. The house was large and the efforts of the Orchestra and the very capable soloist, Fraulein Milka Ternina, were sincerely appreciated and heartily applauded. The programme opened with Beethoven's Symphony No. 6, in F major ("Pastoral"), and under the skillful direction of Mr. Paur it was admirably interpreted by his corps of musicians. The bewitching harmonies of this exquisite work are an unfailing source of delight, and act upon the spirit with all the balm which the theme suggests. Two compositions were given which were new to these concerts. The first was Richard Strauss's Till Eulenspiegel's lustige Streiche, which is rendered in English as "Till Eulenspiegel's merry pranks." Eulenspiegel was the hero of an old German tale and was noted for his capital jokes. Strauss's work (last evening's performance was its second in America) "shows evident traces of the rondo form," and is itself a musical joke, being full of odd twists and capers, and making unexpected demands upon the various instruments. If applause be a test of its merits it must be voted a success. The other novelty was the No. 1 Orchestral Suite from Godard's "Jocelyn," which was a clever production, full of melody, and marked by a particularly dainty gavotte and a rich and sensuously fluent finale. Frl. Ternina sang two selections from Von Weber's works, a recitative and aria from "Oberon" and the prayer and aria from "Der Freischuetz." She made an excellent impression. As has been said with respect to her appearance with the German Opera Company, her voice is naturally of good quality and well suited to lyric efforts. It is of serviceable range, is clear and full and is a distinct acquisition to the operatic stage. Her high notes were the subject of warm commendation.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a matinée concert at the Academy of Music next Saturday, beginning at 2.30, when the following programme will be rendered:

Beethoven, Overture to "Leonore," No. 3; Haydn, Variations on the Austrian National Hymn; Solos for Violoncello—a. Dvorak, "Waldesruhe;" b. Klengel, Capriccio, Op. 8, Mr. Alwin Schroeder; a. Wagner, Prelude to "Lohengrin;" b. Weber, Overture, "Oberon;" Liszt, Symphonic Poem, "Tasso;" Thomas, Overture, "Mignon." Miss Caroline Gardner Clark, soprano, and Mr. Alwin Schroeder, 'cello, will be the soloists upon this occasion.

NORTH AMERICAN
PHILADELPHIA,
FEBRUARY 25, 1896.

MUSIC AT THE ACADEMY.

The Fourth Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The fourth concert for the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place under the direction of Mr. Emil Paur, at the Academy of Music last evening, and achieved the usual generous measure of success. There was a great crowd present, and as the programme was less exacting and more varied than that of last month, the enjoyment of the music was hearty and general. The symphony was Beethoven's familiar work in F major, the so-called "Pastoral," and it is difficult to conceive of a more lucid, refined, sympathetic, and in all respects beautiful performance of this lovely music than was given upon this occasion. Every detail was brought out with a smoothness and finish that were quite exquisite, while the delightful balance, the perfect symmetry of the whole, bespoke Mr. Paur's intelligently apprehensive conception of the composition in its entirety.

The programme included two novelties, a fantasia with an impracticable name by Richard Strauss, and a suite by Benjamin Godard. There is probably no very eager desire on the part of any one who was present to hear either of these numbers again. The Godard suite is pretty enough, but lacks strength and originality, and makes no deep or distinct impression, while the Strauss fantasia is a nightmare of eccentricity and cacophony, which might fittingly be described as the ravings of a musical maniac. It makes enormous demands both upon the scope and the virtuosity of the orchestra attempting it, and that is probably why it finds a place in Mr. Paur's repertory. It serves to display the incomparable quality of his organization.

Frl. Milka Ternina was the soloist. She was scarcely judicious in selecting two arias so similar in character as "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster," from "Oberon," and the prayer scene "Leise, leise," from "Der Freischutz;" but the splendid breadth and power of her delivery and the intelligence of her phrasing enabled her, although not in very good voice, to discharge a difficult task with complete success. She was much applauded, and refused a persistent but not very considerate encore.

The orchestra will give a matinee concert next Saturday, when the following will be the programme: Beethoven, overture to "Leonore," No. 3; songs with piano, Miss Caroline Gardner Clarke; Haydn, variations on the Austrian National Hymn; solos for violoncello, a. Dvorak, "Waldersruhe;" b. Klengel, Capriccio, op. 8; Mr. Alwin Schroeder; a. Wagner, prelude to "Lohengrin;" b. Weber, "overture, "Oberon;" songs with piano, Miss Caroline Gardner Clarke; Liszt, symphonic poem, "Tasso;" Thomas, overture, "Mignon;" soloists, Miss Caroline Gardner Clarke, soprano; Mr. Alwin Schroeder, 'cello.

E PHILADELPHIA INQUIRER—
FEBRUARY 25,

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

A Delightful Concert With Frl. Ternina as Soloist.

The fourth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night was one of the most delightful of the season. The symphony was Beethoven's No. 6 in F major, the well-beloved "Pastoral." Director Paur and his musicians gave it a most delightful rendering. The wealth of musical beauty in this work is inestimable, albeit the range of themes is so limited. It is a work well suited to the orchestra's present arrangement and in delicacy and tone shading reminded one forcibly of the days when Mr. Nickish refined the volume of sound to such a remarkable degree, while in the storm scene there was all the volume possible with the instruments at hand.

The other numbers were new. Strauss' fanciful composition, "Till Eulenspiegel's lustige Streiche," is probably less appreciated by an American audience than a Teutonic one, where the pranks of the fabled Eulenspiegel are well known in every nursery. In scope the music is simply a continuous string of surprising comicalities in which many methods are employed to develop humor at a sacrifice of harmony. There is an occasional reminder of Peer Gynt, although the latter composition is a much more finished one and more musical.

The "Jocelyn" suite No. 1, by Godard, is one of the groupings of music by that composer from his opera. It is characteristic of the modern school of French orchestration, of which Godard was such an excellent example. The suite is simply four pretty compositions without more than a suggestion of connection with each other.

Fraulein Ternina sang two Von Weber numbers, the Ocean aria from "Oberon" and Agathe's prayer and aria from "Der Freischuetz." Her artistic powers were adequately discussed last week, when she sang here in opera. It must be confessed that in concert she does not shine so conspicuous, though this may be in part owing to hoarseness, from which she apparently suffered last evening. Her voice sounded cold last night, though she certainly sang admirably in all other respects.

There will be a fourth popular concert Saturday afternoon.

PHILADELPHIA TIMES.
FEBRUARY 25.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

A Great Classic and Two Modern Bits and a Great Dramatic Singer.

In every performance of a musical work, the mental attitude of the hearer differs according to the familiarity of the music. If the work is new, he takes the interpretation for granted and thinks only of the ideas expressed in the composition. If it is familiar, he takes the music for granted and is interested in the interpretation. Thus, in speaking of the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night, we have to speak of some new music by Richard Strauss and Benjamin Godard, but it would seem absurd to discuss the character of Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony. Yet if we try to imagine ourselves hearing this for the first time, what a revelation of clarity and beauty it would be, and how trivial the turgid striving of most of the modern symphonies would seem beside its wealth of musical ideas and the strength and sincerity of their expression. No two men feel every part of a work like this in exactly the same way, but Mr. Paur reads it clearly, firmly and impersonally, and the performance was one of the most satisfying that he or his orchestra has ever given us.

The new works were mere makeweights. The wild medley of Strauss, which he calls "Till Eulenspiegel's Jolly Pranks," recalled Simon Hassler's justly celebrated "Christmas Eve in Philadelphia," or one of Pat Gilmore's Coney Island rhapsodies, developed a la Berlioz to the limit of the resources of the modern orchestra, and was interesting chiefly as an example of orchestral virtuosity. Full of instrumental tricks, it is no doubt great fun to play it, but it is not necessary to hear it a second time. The Godard music was simply the prelude and entr'actes from his "Jocelyn," very bright in their place in opera comique, but cheap as an orchestral selection.

The soloist was Fraulein Ternina. She declaimed "Ocean, thou mighty monster," with an exaggeration of the German method of forcing the voice that was the more unexpected recalling the unusual lyric character she had given to Brunhilde's music in "Die Walkuere." There was much less of this Wagnerian manner in the "Freischuetz" aria, which she sang with admirable clearness and sentiment and musical effect, and with an ample power and dignity of style that even more than in the other Weber piece proclaimed her an artist of high distinction. In both she made a great impression on the audience, who apparently expected that she would return and sing "Old Folks at Home."

PHILADELPHIA PRESS.
FEBRUARY 25.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Conductor Paur Mixes Classics with German Jokes and French Bon-Bons.

Whether the pale cough that was heard during what might be called the "sotto voce" passage in Richard Strauss' musical joke at the Academy of Music last night was intended as a part of the eccentric scoring or not, Mr. Paur did not say, but it certainly was in harmony with the other effects of this ridiculous composition. Surely a consumptive orchestral cough is as good as a watchman's rattle and in giving us the playful pranks of a certain Till Eulenspiegel, Strauss used all the gentle arts of cacophony that he knew—drums, triangles, cymbals, bells, rattle and all. The only thing he didn't do was to include the sound of shuffling feet—Till could certainly do a double shuffle—and the crackle of rustling paper. This oversight is due doubtless to the fact that the orchestratonic method of Sousa's Band is unknown to Germany. Why Conductor Paur bored a Boston Symphony Orchestra audience by lugging in his Strauss he alone knows. We take our musical jokes with beer and pretzels at the seashore in August. In February we are differently minded.

However, Beethoven's exquisitely beautiful pastoral symphony atoned for much and was a delight, being the classical feature of the evening, which was also given an old-time flavor by Weber's heavy recitative and aria, "Ocean," from "Oberon" and "Agatha's" prayer and aria from "Der Frieschuetz." Fraulein Melka Fernina, the superb "Brunnhilde" of last Friday evening, was the soloist and received quite an ovation. The solos were unequally sung, that from "Oberon" having the explosive and screechy qualities of the forced German method of singing dramatic music. The "Freischuetz" music, however, was rendered in a more delightful manner, and the Fraulein displayed her beautiful voice to full effect. She is indeed a capable artist and would have made a fine "Elizabeth," as her voice is far more sympathetic than Klafsky's, as long as she does not force it. The finale of the programme was Godard's "Jocelyn Suite No. 1," a characteristic French confection, which was handled well, but seemed a trifle overdone. It is an agreeable musical sweetmeat, as it were. Taking it all in all, Mr. Paur as a programme maker is not a howling success.

The Washington Post.
WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 26, 1896.

FOURTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

An Artistic Programme Ably Rendered by Emil Paur and His Orchestra.

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening at Metzerott Hall attracted a large audience of music lovers. It was the fourth in the series of the present season, and the programme was in some respects one of the most artistic ever rendered here by Mr. Emil Paur. A novelty, very well received, was Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Lustige Streiche," which was the first performance for these concerts, and the third time in America.

Beethoven's symphony No. 6, in F major, was the initial number, and was probably the favorite of the evening. This was given with an artistic finish that really idealizes the conception of the great composer. The descriptions of the scenes, for which he obtained his inspiration in the summer walks through the meadows of Heiligenstadt, near Vienna, were graphically rendered. The clear and perfect movement was well maintained through the rather extended development of the first part. The rustic character of the music was preserved, and the strings did excellent work in their imitations, truly suggestive of the shepherd's pipe. In the second part, more emotional than the first, the rhythm, true to the idea of the composition, was lively, and the harmonic changes in their magical effects were splendidly made.

The joyous peasants' dance, interrupted by the thunderstorm, was, of course, the portion of this symphony that was looked forward to with the most pleasure, and the orchestra was in no wise disappointing. The appeals to the picturesque fancy by purely musical means, rather than imitations of natural sounds and sights, were forcibly done by the musicians, and the dying away of the storm in the form of a rondo was very cleverly suggested.

Fraulein Milka Terkina, the soloist of the evening, followed with Weber's recitative and aria, "Ocean! Thou Mighty Monster," from "Oberon." She rendered this romantic but difficult selection with great ease, her vigorous voice showing to good advantage in the changes from the upper to the lower register. A subsequent selection, "Agathe's Prayer and Aria," from Weber's "Der Freischuetz," was better adapted to show the sweetness and sympathy of her voice. At both her appearances she was frequently recalled.

The selection from Strauss, with its evident traces of the rondo form, was truthfully rendered like the musical joke that it is with its changes from the lively and sprightly to the grotesque, the violent, the tender, and passionate and the simply jovial. Franz Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 2, with its stern recitative phrases, strong chords, and more graceful and tender versions of the same theme was as popular as ever. The violins were especially noticeable in their repetition of the tremulous notes, and the whole orchestra worked up the two dashing subsidiaries with immense energy.

THE BALTIMORE NEWS.
Y, FEBRUARY 26, 1896.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Frl. Ternina to Make Her First Appearance in Baltimore.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is in town today, ready for its monthly concert at Music Hall tonight. Frl. Ternina will be the soprano soloist, and Assistant Manager Frederic R. Comee says she is the most noted artist the Damrosch Opera Company brought over from Europe. She was not with the company in its Baltimore season, and her appearance tonight will be her first in this city. The programme will be made up of the usual high-class selections, two of which will be musical novelties from Tschaikowsky and Strauss. Mr. Emil Paur will conduct.

The Press
DAILY EDITION.
NEW YORK FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 28, 1896.

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Mme. Blauvelt in Excellent Voice at the Fourth Concert.

Mme. Lillian Blauvelt and Franz Kneisel were the soloists at the fourth concert here this season of the Boston Symphony Society last night at the Metropolitan Opera House, and were cordially received. The merits of these two artists are so well known that it seems almost useless to do more than record what they did.

Mme. Blauvelt sang "With Verdure Clad," from "The Creation," and Mr. Kneisel played Viotti's violin concerto in A minor. The soprano has a particularly engaging voice, if one may so term it. It is clear and pure, and she sings with excellent taste. Mr. Kneisel is another entirely satisfactory performer. What else need be said?

It must be admitted, however, that on the whole the evening's programme was not as interesting as some we have heard the Boston players give. The orchestral pieces were Zollner's fantasia, "Midnight at Sedan"; the remarkable, but not very popular, symphony in E minor, by Brahms, and Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," a kind of musical nondescript. The Press on Sunday said something about this last.

The playing of the band was excellent, as usual, and a good-sized audience listened with evident pleasure.

The Morning Advertiser.
FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 28, 1896.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLAYS.

Lillian Blauvelt Distinguishes Herself Moderately—Richard Strauss' Brilliant Composition.

There was a short and varied programme of music played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Metropolitan Opera House last night. It was the fourth concert of the series, and the solo singer was Lillian Blauvelt. Franz Kneisel was announced to play two movements of a Viotti concerto in A minor, but he was too sick to attempt the work, although he sat as usual at his desk. He has tonsilitis, and Boston climate did the rest. We missed him.

Miss Blauvelt sang, but cautiously, "With Verdure Clad," by Haydn, and "Voi Che Sapete," by Mozart, this latter as a substitute for Mr. Kneisel's number. She was in good voice, but sang without much color or intensity. Nor was that diminuendo on the G in the Haydn absolutely true. It is only just to say that the pretty little lady has been sick this season, so is not in her usual dainty form.

The symphony was Brahms' fourth, the one in E minor, beloved of mathematicians and musicians for its strenuous idealism, grim logic and superb form. Crabbed it is, I admit, but we can't always feed on flame and sounding lasciviousness. Brahms is the composer for musicians. He has the courage of his simplicity, and he is feared by amateurs. Two terrible angels, with forbidding chill swords, guard the gateway of his land. They are respectively named Logic and Heart. The latter angel has a clouded gauze, but is always potent; the former is ever the ruler of the country wherein much sour underwood obscures the vision, but the stately oaks are there, and beyond are the mountains, implacable, remote, but kissing the zenith.

The second movement, lyrical to the core in its austere mode and mood, claims one's suffrage, although the first movement, built in two notes on a descending inflection, is strong, smelling of Beethoven and powerful in development. It reminds me in its obstinate grappling with the theme of a psychological bulldog shaking a slim victim to the death.

The concert opened with Heinrich Zoellner's orchestral fantasia called "Midnight at Sedan." It is a large diffuse canvas full of fleeting shapes, ghosts of the dead on the field of battle. It is without originality as to idea and without individual manner. Tschaikowsky's manner is difficult to assimilate. The form is free and the oboe says some things in the modulation known to Chopin. The allegro is of the Russian. We hear the brass and it is the brass of Esau although the band is Zoellner's, while the climax is full of fury. Frankly, I didn't care for the work, although it indubitably proved the composer's excellent musicianship.

The novelty was novel, to use a Celticism. It was by Richard Strauss, a young German Berlioz who is more fantastic than Saint-Saens and whose feeling for orchestral color is almost abnormal. Abnormal, too, is voicing of the instruments and his theme of conversation was the pranks of a middle age Merry Andrew known to literature as "Till Eulenspiegel," or, if you wish it in English, "Til Owl Glass." The form of the work is rondo, but the spirit is scherzoso. It is hell itself let loose in the way of an orchestral frolic.

The burly humor, the bizarre treatment and the stupendous audacity that is able to pull down from the clouds a theme and spin music—crazy music—out of it are characteristic of Strauss. A man of enormous talent who says nothing in an unparalleled manner. This caprice is capital fun—for a musician—and stuffed with tricky effects. It is Puck in Teutonic boots and the orchestra played the work wonderfully. The house was small and Mr. Paur conducted with great care and energy.

JAMES HUNEKER.

NEW YORK HERALD.

NEW YORK, FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 28, 1896.

MUSICAL INVASION FROM BOSTON.

The Symphony Orchestra Carry All Before Them at the Metropolitan.

As Mr. Franz Kneisel, the violinist, has been ill for the last week, the programme at the Boston Symphony Orchestral concert, given last evening at the Metropolitan Opera House, was somewhat changed, and Giovanni Battista Viotti's concerto, which was to have been played by him, was omitted. Mr. Kneisel, although still suffering from a severe attack of tonsilitis, occupied his seat as concertmeister of the orchestra, but it was announced that he had not recovered his strength sufficiently to play the number.

Miss Lillian Blauvelt, who was the soloist of the evening, sang her programme number, "With Verdure Clad," from Haydn's "Creation," magnificently, receiving at its conclusion six recalls, but Mr. Paur would not allow a repetition. In place of Mr. Kneisel's solo she gave "Voi Che Sapete," from "Don Giovanni."

The orchestra was superb in all work. It gave a brilliant interpretation of Richard Strauss' new work "Till Eulenspiegels Merry Pranks," opus 28, and of Zöllner's masterly orchestral fantasie, "Midnight at Sedan," which latter number, the programme erroneously stated, was given for the first time. It has been made familiar at the concerts of the Liederkranz Society last year, and was played recently under the composer's direction at Carnegie Hall.

Johannes Brahm's fourth symphony in E minor, opus 98, concluded in admirable fashion the excellent programme.

The Sun.
FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 28, 1896.

The Boston Symphony Concert.

Four numbers of real interest and importance were offered upon the programme of the Boston Symphony concert last evening. They covered a wide range chronologically as well as geographically, stretching from Italy and Viotti in the time 1753 to 1824, and coming down by the way of Germany, Haydn, Brahms, and Richard Strauss to our own contemporary and fellow citizen, Herr Heinrich Zöllner, whose orchestral fantasia, "Midnight at Sedan," was the first thing played. This composition stood well in dignity and ableness compared even with the masterwork of Brahms, with the conventional beauty and excellence of Haydn's "Creation" excerpt, or Strauss's clever sketch, which is so full of shifting variety in its instrumentation. Zöllner's writing is remarkable for picturesqueness—he is a true tone painter. There was darkness that could be felt in his "Midnight," and the thrilling horrors of battle and bloodshed lowered over and through it. In all that Herr Zöllner composes is felt a strong, sure hand and a broad intelligence. He uses the various combinations of instruments not only with modern daring and most bizarre effects, but also easily and frequently with the methods of the old masters. The fantasia given last night is worthy to take its place among concert overtures of the highest rank.

A great disappointment was destined suddenly to fall upon the audience last evening. It came from the announcement that Herr Kneisel, being convalescent from "a bad cold," did not "feel able" to play the Viotti concerto. As Viotti wrote twenty-five concertos and not one of them has ever yet been performed in New York, connoisseurs naturally felt aggrieved at having a novelty first offered and then so ruthlessly snatched away. It is to be hoped that another opportunity may arrive when our public shall hear what this poetic dreamy old violinist has to say to us. We must believe that Mr. Kneisel was actually feeble and suffering—otherwise his declining to perform would be absolutely unpardonable.

There are few persons so keen and gifted as to recognize the humor that often lies in musical phrases, but to the sharp observer there is much of it to be found. The old masters are very prone to slip a sly joke in where it would least be suspected, not alone in their scherzos, allegros, and rondos, but here and there outside of these. Richard Strauss, in his illustration of the German folk lore story "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," is perfectly frank, and shows us at once what he means to do. The fun of the story is patent, though its musical picturing, even to those who have not read of the tricks of the Braunschweig mechanic who gets into many scrapes, but always comes out best in the end. Strauss has made an elaborate and intricate piece of work, very unique and very charming to listen to, though it is often painfully noisy and its interjectional, spasmodic, jerky character makes it trying to follow in certain portions. Still, it is so frisky, so mischievous, so clownish and absurd, and so often beautiful and melodious that it must be rated as a work of tremendous talent, a welcome addition to orchestral repertories.

The Brahms symphony No. 4 in E minor closed the concert like a benediction. Its first movement is pure continuous melody, uninterrupted in its sweet flow from beginning to end. The second is as calm as nature itself and as majestic. The third and fourth are more elaborate and perhaps less easily inspired, but by no means so convoluted and involved as most of his music, especially his later music, is apt to be.

Mr. Paur was very energetic and capable last evening, and the orchestra, which probably is the best drilled and the finest in the world, did its work upon the level of its own high standard in all except the accompaniment to "Verdure Clad," which was heavy and bungling.

Miss Lillian Blauvelt sang two selections; one of them in order to heal those wounds made in the programme and the hearts of the audidience by cruel Mr. Kneisel, the other for her own glorification.

New-York Daily Tribune.
FOUNDED BY HORACE GREELEY.
FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 28, 1896.

YESTERDAY'S MUSIC.

Yesterday was full of music—a little too full for those who are anxious to hear all that is made which belongs to the better class. In the afternoon there was a concert of chamber music in the hall of the Mendelssohn Glee Club, at which Mlle. Szumowska, Mr. Timothee Adamowski and his brother Josef, violoncello, took part in the concerted pieces. In the evening the Boston Orchestra gave its fourth concert in the Metropolitan Opera House, and Louis Schmidt, jr., gave the first of a projected series of concerts in the room set apart for chamber music in Carnegie Hall.

At the afternoon recital, which was attended by a fashionable audience, Mlle. Szumowska and Mr. Adamowski played Grieg's "Sonata," op. 8, F major, and the three participants joined in Brahm's trio in C minor. Mr. Adamowski also played two solo numbers—Beethoven's "Romanza," in F major, and Wieniawski's "Valse Caprice," in which he was accompanied by Mr. Zach, also of the Boston Orchestra, on the pianoforte.

Miss Lillian Blauvelt and Franz Kneisel were to have been the solo performers, but Mr. Kneisel was indisposed and Miss Blauvelt (who had already sung the air "With Verdure Clad," from Haydn's "Creation,") gave instead of the two movements from an archaic concerto which he was to play, Mozart's air, "Voi Che Sapete," from "Le Nozze di Figaro." The orchestral novelty of the concert was a humorous rondo by Richard Strauss called "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks"—a most ingenious and highly colored piece of music which is rapidly making the rounds of the European concert-rooms. The symphony was Brahms's in E minor.

At the Chamber Music Hall, Mr. Schmidt provided for his hearers Grieg's sonata in G minor for pianoforte and violin, and Lalo's "Symphonie Espagnole." In both Miss Lotta Mills played the pianoforte part. The choice of the latter composition was not, under the circumstances, an altogether happy one, for even Miss Mills's skilful playing could not make the transcription of the orchestra accompaniment take the place of the highly colored and richly elaborated original, which has so important a bearing upon the effect of the whole. In both works Mr. Schmidt showed his substantial qualities as a musician to good advantage. He was further assisted by Miss Marguerite Hall, who sang several songs acceptably. Miss Mills was also heard in a group of minor pianoforte pieces. She is a newcomer in New-York, a pupil of Leschetizky, and shows unmistakable evidences of good training, and possessing a sincere musical feeling and right understanding—qualities that are of good omen for her further development as a factor in the musical life of New-York.

The New-York Times.
NEW-YORK, FRIDAY, FEB. 28, 1896.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

An Evening of Music in Which Pure Beauty Had to Struggle Against Fate.

If Mr. Emil Paur, formerly of Leipsic and now of Boston, will continue to give New-York audiences such programmes as that of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's fourth concert at the Metropolitan Opera House last night, he will not again be accused of being an antidote for insomnia. On the contrary, he will keep his public wide awake and sitting up to wonder what is going to happen next. No one has yet seen the head of a kettledrum shattered at a symphony concert, but even that may yet come to pass. When the need for such shattering arises, it will be well to recall the pertinent suggestion of Mr. Daniel Bryant to the ambitious bass drummer: "Young man, yo' could break dat bettah wid an axe." As for Mr. Pourtau, the admirable clarionet player, he may be justified in resigning and returning to the peaceful seclusion of Lyons, where nothing more powerful than Berlioz's "Dies Irae" is attempted.

Richard Strauss, composer, is the immediate cause of these comments. He is the Maaterlinck of music, and hitherto he has reviled in the more or less harmonious exploitation of the charnel house, the grave, and the gnawing worm. But in "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," produced under Mr. Paur's direction last night, Mr. Strauss set out to be humorous. It appears that Till Eulenspiegel is the hero of an old mediaeval German tale. Till was a wandering mechanic who played tricks on every one. He never played any such trick on any one as Strauss played on orchestral music in his attempt to illustrate the story. Flutes chased one another all over the leger lines; oboes squeaked convulsively; clarionets cougher cracked staccati in their highest register; stopped cornets wailed in nasal tones; trombones bellowed; triangles and tambours rattled; and the tympani player lost his patience and several pounds of flesh in his desperate attempts to thump his three kettledrums as often and as hard as the score demanded. There was no doubt about the humor of it all; it would have made even a doctor of music laugh. But it was a vast and coruscating jumble of instrumental cackles for all that. Here and there Strauss permitted the sacred form of music to rear its lovely front. That was when Till was making love. And immediately a stinging thump on one of those kettledrums seemed to indicate that the maid had properly boxed his ear. At any rate, the ears of the hearers were boxed by Strauss. "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" is a horrible example of what can be done with an orchestra by a determined and deadly decadent.

A companion picture to the impressionist nightmare of Strauss was the orchestral fantasia "Midnight at Sedan," by Heinrich Zöllner, conductor of the Liederkranz of this city. The composer seems to have slept upon the battlefield and to have had a dream in which he saw the embattled hosts once more marshaled on the plain. When the contest is over, according to the inscription on the score, "the heaps of slain lie mountain high; they are buried by thousands beneath their own steeds." After that the French and the German soldiers sleep together the dreamless sleep, and a hymn of reconciliation is heard. Mr. Zöllner has followed some of the methods adopted by Strauss in constructing his battle picture; but he has treated the orchestra much more idiomatically. There is a tremendous amount of noise and a good deal of it is empty buncombe; but it is at least honestly orchestral. The finale of the composition is excellently conceived and solidly written. It does not transcend the modesty of art; and for this Mr. Zöllner deserves praise which cannot be awarded to the more famous Mr. Strauss. Both of these compositions were performed magnificently by the orchestra and were conducted with zeal and understanding by Mr. Paur. We have at times found grounds for censuring the work of this conductor, but in the playing of the two compositions mentioned it was not possible to detect any diminution of the splendid power and precision of the band, nor any falling off in its remarkable virtuosity.

The remaining orchestral number was Brahms's fourth symphony. After the previous works it came like the balmy breath of a Spring morning. By force of contrast Brahms became simple and lucid in form, graceful and fluent in melody, and suave in harmony. "Ubinam gentium sumus." There was a time when Brahms was regarded as the Browning of music, beside whom even the profound Bach was a Wordsworth. But even as the mystic symbolism of Maaterlinck has made Browning clubs appear to be a waste of time, so Richard Strauss has made the symphonies of Brahms sound like volkslieder. The Boweries of the world will yet whistle Wagner.

Mr. Franz Kneisel, who was to have played Viotti's twenty-second violin concerto, was indisposed, and Miss Lillian Blauvelt, who was down on the programme for Haydn's "With Verdure Clad," sang also Mozart's "Voi che sapete." Her delivery of the latter aria was lacking in polish, and in both numbers she was occasionally guilty of uncertain attack—the result, apparently, of spasmodic breathing. But, on the whole, she sang the Haydn aria well, with a full and beautiful quality of strong tone, with some charming messa da voce effects, and with appreciation of its content. The concert was a stimulating entertainment, and it is well worth while to produce even such novelties as the Strauss composition, because they give the hearer food for thought.

[96]

The New York Recorder.
BY GEORGE W. TURNER.
FRIDAY, FEB. 28, 1896.

PAUR WEAK IN TASTE.

His Selections for the Fourth Symphony Were Not Appropriate.

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was, if possible, even more depressing than its predecessor. It was given at the Metropolitan Opera House last evening before a half-filled house, that took but small enjoyment in the selections presented.

Decidedly, Mr. Paur is not felicitous at getting up an entertaining programme. He gave us, as novelties, Heinrich Zollner's orchestral fantasia, "Midnight at Sedan," and Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

The former work is diffuse in form, lacking melodic invention and but thinly orchestrated. Its poverty of expression makes one wonder that a musician of Mr. Paur's standing should place it as the opening piece of a classical concert.

But the selection, of all others, that should not have been heard at this concert was that by Richard Strauss. In his stupidly unsuccessful attempt to produce a mirth-provoking, sprightly and grotesque setting to a very funny tale, he simply presents a grotesque, uninteresting tone picture, and the mythical Eulenspiegel and his merry pranks are most inanely colored by the medium through which they are seen. The orchestration of the work is sound and fury, signifying nothing.

Mr. Paur also managed to give a respectable rendition of Brahms' Symphony No. 4, in E minor. His readings are always correct and metronomic to a degree, but convey nothing of the author's inner meaning.

The soloists were Lillian Blauvelt and Franz Kneisel. Mme. Blauvelt sang charmingly, but with no great breadth, "With Verdure Clad," from Haydn's "The Creation." She was more at home in Mozart's familiar "Voi Che Sapete," which she gave with much daintiness and correct expression. She was several times recalled. The latter piece was given in place of Viotti's concerto in A minor, which Mr. Kneisel could not play on account of illness.

Truly, these are degenerate days, when the best orchestra in this country, and second only to the Vienna Philharmonic, is allowed to fall into desuetude for lack of a proper conductor and a better programme-maker. It is only now that we fully appreciate Nikisch, one of the few great conductors of the world, and it is doubtful if his place will ever be filled, at least as far as the Boston Symphony Orchestra is concerned. Those who attended the concert last evening spent a profitless evening.

The World
Published by the Press Publishing Company, 53 to 63 Park Row, New York.
FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 28, 1896.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mme. Blauvelt the Soloist in a Fine but Poorly Attended Concert.

I can hardly believe that the New York musical public cares anything for really first-class orchestral music, for if they did the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Metropolitan last night would have been better attended. It is the part of intelligence to appreciate when you have a good thing, musical or otherwise. Where, then, is the intelligence and appreciation of the New York public?

The concert was certainly an admirable and interesting one. The number on the programme quoted as new—Heinrich zoliner's orchestral fantasia "Midnight at Sedan," an orchestral interlude from the composer's opera "Bei Sedan," had already been heard at a recent concert of the Liederkranz Society. It is an imaginative bit of programme music, entirely free in form and development, which, while in a certain way pictorial and of excellent technical workmanship, is neither very interesting thematically nor very convincing in emotional force or suggestion. The powers of music as a purely descriptive agent are far more limited than modern composers would have us think.

Another number, the full title of which runs "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks, set to grand orchestra—in rondo form—after an old rogue's tune (Rogue's March?) by Richard Strauss," while not set down as new, was heard for the first time. Eulenspiegel is a hero of German folk-lore who plays all sorts of pranks on everbody and always comes out ahead.

The opportunity thus given of playing all sorts of tricks and pranks with the orchestra was one which Strauss, with his itching desire for originality usually ending in more or less painful and tragic eccentricity, could not neglect, and he has certainly taken every advantage of it.

Traces of the rondo form there in the work, but the general development is free to license. It is a quaint musical conceit, interesting and often genuinely and humorously descriptive, so fanciful as to be fantastic, with orchestral color laid on as it were with a trowel, and so little melodic sequence or continuity as to make the composition appear disjointed and fragmentary.

Yet it is certainly highly original, scored with consummate art and mastery of orchestral resource, and does not offend or irritate the ear with really unwholesome noise like most of Strauss's lucubration. So, on the whole, considering its source, I like it vastly. So did the audience. It was read and played with great aplomb and incisiveness by Mr. Paur and the orchestra.

Mr. Franz Kneisel, who was announced as one of the soloists of the evening, excused himself on the ground of a severe cold, so that the entire soloistic honors devolved on Mme. Blauvelt, who sang the aria from Haydn's "Creation"—"With Verdue Clad"—and, in place of Mr. Kneisel's tenth concerto, Mozart's "Voi du Sapete" in charming fashion and with much finish and elegance of style and diction, if without much force.

Brahms's Fourth Symphony—E minor—closed the programme.

I must say I prefer a symphony first; one is more in the humor for it then, as miscellaneous selections upset one's classic mood, the proper one to appreciate a symphony.

And yet Brahms is not so classic and strictly symphonic in this as in his other symphonies. I love those insistent, persistent cross-relations in the romanza; they are so like Bach and yet so modern.

Mr. Paur, I think, is not unlike Brahms in his somewhat unbending classic sympathics and sometimes lack of emotional appreciation and romantic feeling; so I was not surprised to find that he read this symphony almost, as it were, intuitively and to me exceedingly well, especially the andante.

The orchestra throughout the concert played as well as always. I can say no more in the way of praise.

REGINALD DE KOVEN.

Boston Transcript
SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 29, 1896.

A Chat with Conductor Paur.

The past few weeks have been of intense interest to all lovers of music. We have had with us the German opera, have had the pleasure of listening to Klafsky, Ternina Grüning and others, and we have still with us the Italian opera, with its imposing cast, including such stars as Melba, Nordica, Calvé, and Jean de Reszke. But the end is already here, and next Monday all will have ceased; "Lohengrin," "Sigfried," "Fidelio," "Carmen," all will be a thing of the past, and henceforth will only live in the memory of the happy few who could afford such a luxury, until another year. The Bostonian will once more be content to turn to his own fireside and remember that there still remains with him his symphony—the Boston Symphony, although these faithful desert us not infrequently, if only for a week.

Mr. Paur has recently spoken quite freely and at length, giving his opinion on musical matters of great interest to our readers. In reply to a few questions he said:

"Boston audiences are intelligent; they appreciate and understand purely orchestral music, as is shown by the fact that the concerts where no soloist appears are attended fully as well as those at which an eminent artist is announced to take part.

"The public in other cities is not quite so far advanced, as is easily understood when the fact is borne in mind that they rarely have a chance to hear classical music, with the exception of New York, and also of Chicago, where Thomas has broken ground. A movement is on foot in other large cities to establish corresponding organizations, as in Cincinnati, where Van der Stucken appears to have been quite successful; but on the whole it seems hardly possible that many of our large cities could sustain an orchestra of so high a standing as the Boston Symphony, for the existence of which and its high standing Boston owes thanks only to Mr. Higginson.

"The monthly trips are absolutely necessary for the fame of the orchestra, although it cannot be denied that they are a great strain on the musicians. It is a serious matter to present a different programme every evening and to travel besides, but I must give the orchestra credit for the high standard of excellence which is maintained in every concert, and for their industry and zeal, and I know that the musicians themselves are ambitious and, notwithstanding the hard work, like these trips on account of the prestige they give the orchestra.

"If it were not for these trips, the smaller cities like Springfield and Providence would have absolutely no chance of hearing classical music, and the thought to be the means of thus educating the American public is certainly inspiring and makes such seemingly hard work a pleasure."

To maintain a high standard of excellence it is absolutely necessary that the leader and the orchestra constantly work together; a frequent change of leaders means a lessening of the possibility of producing the best results. An orchestra must understand its leader in the smallest details, and in order to achieve this a long acquaintance with each other is necessary. Of late years there has been a tendency in Europe to make much of the leader, and the result is the "Gastdirigent," some orchestras having no permanent leader, but one of these "stars" being invited to perform this duty from time to time. It will easily be seen that under such circumstances a leader cannot get the best work out of an orchestra, and, to use Mr. Paur's own words, "if a leader should fall from Heaven itself" and undertake to direct an orchestra, he could not obtain the high standard which is the fruit only of continuous and conscientious labor of orchestra and leader who thoroughly understand each other. A movement is now on foot in Europe to do away with this evil and the best artists and the most earnest musicians partake in this movement. I have recently received a circular letter which has apparently been sent to all musical organizations and leaders and which I would like to have translated and published in the Transcript. It is written by one of Europe's most prominent artists.

"I much prefer a competent and practical leader who understands the score and honestly endeavors to give it its full value, to those 'prima-donna leaders' who make themselves the centre of the musical production, and whose gestures will soon be of more importance to the audience than the work itself, by whomsoever it may have been written.

"In no branch of art is such a swindle more easily executed than in music. Hardly was it thought that the 'starring' was done away with forever when the 'dirigir' and the 'pult-virtuos' makes his appearance, and public and critic bow down before this most abominable of all virtuoso caricatures, and go wild with admiration about the one or the other who at this late day has shown the real worth of this or that symphony of Beethoven. Nobody cares to notice that the effect is not due to their musical abilities, but to their display, to which the tailor and outfitter contribute their share."

Mr. Paur says that he is highly pleased with the artistic success of this season, the hearty sympathy of the public and the willing co-operation of the musicians themselves. He says that the season has been a satisfactory one in every respect; the audiences have been larger than in the two previous years and the enthusiasm seems to have increased. The work of the orchestra also shows an improvement. The members are doing their best to satisfy the demands made on them, and the addition of new members has strengthened the orchestra. Of course, here as everywhere, there are a few discordant elements, but on the whole everything seems to favor a steady growth. The numerous letters received daily from total strangers, commenting upon the work, asking for the production of certain symphonies or the repetition of others go to show that the general public take an active interest in the work of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The letters are mostly from Boston and Cambridge, and recently quite a number of requests have been received asking for the repetition of the Tschaikowsky symphony. The season has also been a financial success; there have been large audiences which filled Music Hall at each concert.

This great interest shown by the Boston public in the welfare of the Symphony and the large crowds the German as well as the Italian opera have drawn here naturally lead to the question whether in Mr. Paur's opinion Boston could support an opera. The answer was rather discouraging:

"I am afraid that the Boston public would only care for the very best. It is out of the question to think of giving Boston such an opera as is now in our midst and making it a financial success. I have heard 'Tristan und Isolde' under the leadership of Seidl. About twenty years ago I heard the same work performed with Wagner himself as conductor. The historical details and the general effect were then better, but the singing of Nordica and Jean de Reszke excelled anything I have ever heard, and from their interpretation I received entirely new impressions of the work and I cannot praise them sufficiently. I think it would be well worth a trial to see whether an opera could live in Boston which, though it could not include in its cast such famous singers as make up the Italian opera, has a cast of first-class artists and a good orchestra. Much attention should be given to the work of the orchestra and it should be made prominent, and each opera thoroughly rehearsed. Thus the music itself would be the main feature, and I think this would prove a great education to the public, and very good performances could be expected. I do not see any way in which the Boston Symphony could be utilized in such an undertaking. There is, in the first place, a lack of time, and then performances of this kind naturally could not achieve the high excellence that is maintained in the Symphony concerts and the effect on the orchestra would be deteriorating."

Could not a similar thing be said of the Promenade concerts?

"Yes, and I very much regret the necessity of these concerts. The season lasts but seven months and there are five months of rest, and it becomes necessary for the members of the orchestra to do something. The Promenade concerts are now so popular that somebody would continue them should the Symphony cease to give them, and they are perhaps the best that can be done under the circumstances. They tend to keep the orchestra together and this is one good feature. I have given a good deal of serious thought to this subject and wish I could see my way clear to make this work unnecessary for members of the orchestra, but as yet nothing has presented itself to my mind that is tangible. The effect of these concerts on the orchestra is not a very good one. I do not think these concerts, either, are educating the public. Most people go there to enjoy themselves; they smoke, eat and drink and chat and pay only passing attention to the music, and while, of course, as a means of enjoyment they accomplish their purpose, they do not elevate the public mind!"

Mr. Paur says that he has not as yet made any plans for next season, or at least none that he would care to make public at this time. He also states that it is his intention to stay in this country the coming summer, and while he has as yet not selected any particular place, it is his intention to go to the mountains. The health of Mrs. Paur necessitated a trip to Europe last summer which was spent almost wholly in Switzerland, but Mrs. Paur's health has steadily improved, and Mr. Paur hopes that another summer's rest will strengthen her so far that next season she will once more be able to follow her artistic calling.

On being questioned whether it is true that he has received quite a number of urgent and lucrative calls from Europe, he told our representative that he has received very favorable offers, on the ground that the climate did not suit Mrs. Paur, and it was expected that he would accept, but for the present he does not intend to do so.

THE MUSICAL AGE
CONDUCTED BY HARRY E. FREUND.
SUCCESSOR TO FREUND'S MUSICAL WEEKLY.
NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 15, 1896.

EMIL PAUR.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THE concerts given in this city by the Boston Symphony Orchestra are so highly appreciated by New York's cultured public that a few words about the career of that admirable organization may not prove out of place.

Thanks to the generosity of a music-loving citizen of Boston, actuated only by a desire to present good music in the best way, the idea was conceived in 1881 of a large permanent orchestra which should give each year an extended series of concerts in Music Hall, Boston, and make an occasional visit to the adjacent New England cities. The idea was acted upon and the Boston Symphony Orchestra thus began its existence. It had already given concerts during five seasons before it paid its first visit to New York. Since then a total of forty-two concerts have been given here—fifteen in Steinway Hall, fifteen in Chickering Hall, five in the Carnegie Music Hall, five in the Metropolitan Opera House, in regular series, with two extra concerts, one on the evening of Sunday, March 27, 1892, at the Metropolitan Opera House, given jointly with Paderewski in aid of the Washington Arch Fund, and the second at the Madison Square Garden Concert Hall on the evening of Monday, May 2d, of the same year, when d'Albert was the soloist.

Of the forty-two concerts mentioned, eleven were given under the leadership of Wilhelm Gericke, twenty-one under Nikisch, and ten under the leadership of the present conductor, Mr. Emil Paur.

Mr. Georg Henschel was the first conductor of the orchestra, and retained this position for three years, and on his retirement, in 1885, went to London, where he met with his usual success as a composer and teacher, and in a few years assumed the leadership of a large orchestra there, giving twelve concerts each year in St. James's Hall.

Mr. Henschel's successor was Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, who came from Vienna, and to this second leader can be attributed much of the wonderful precision and finish of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. After five years of untiring zeal and persistent striving for absolute perfection of ensemble, during which time he spared neither the orchestra nor himself, Mr. Gericke returned to Vienna.

The third and youngest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was Arthur Nikisch, a Hungarian, leader of the orchestra at the Stadt Theater, at Leipsic, the first opera house in that city. His reign was for four years, a year longer than that of Mr. Henschel, and a year less than Mr. Gericke. One thing the Boston Symphony Orchestra has always done for its conductors—it has given to them a greater renown than was theirs when they assumed control. Henschel, Gericke, and Nikisch must all own that a greater fame attended their return to Europe because of their association with America's first orchestra. Nikisch, on leaving Boston, was appointed director of the Royal Opera, and also conductor of the orchestra at Buda-Pesth, but has just accepted a more congenial position as the conductor of the Gewandhaus Concerts, in Leipsic, and the Berlin Philharmonic.

When Arthur Nikisch left the Stadt Theater, in Leipsic, to come to Boston he was succeeded by the same man who followed him as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the present leader, Mr. Emil Paur. It is also worthy of comment that Mr. Nikisch and Mr. Paur played at the same desk as first violinists under Mr. Gericke at the very same Stadt Theater several years before. Mr. Paur enters upon his third year with the orchestra this season.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give three more concerts at the Metropolitan Opera House. They will be on the evenings of January 23, February 27, and March 26. The soloists include Mme. Melba, Ben. Davis, and E. A. MacDowell.

(From Our Special Correspondent.)

BOSTON, January 11th, 1896.

BOSTON has become devoutly symphonic this season, possibly remembering the proverb, "Si l'ou n'a pas ce qu'on aime il faut aimer ce qu'on a." We are apt to forget how provincial we are in the matter of opera, depending upon the crumbs which fall from the New York table for what little we get of this form of music, and think only upon the fact that we possess a magnificent orchestra. It matters not what programme is presented, Music Hall is always filled and the side aisles are crowded with standing auditors at each performance. At one time this crowding of the hall depended upon the soloist, and the orchestra might give the finest of instrumental works, so long as there was no soloist there would be a number of empty seats. How this has changed may be judged from the fact that a recent programme gave Bach, Mozart, Haydn, Handel and Beethoven as represented by his first (and very Haydnish) symphony, with no soloist save a few obligatos by Mr. Kneisel, and yet the usual crowd was present.

I state this fact emphatically because the impression has got abroad that interest is languishing in the symphony concerts, whereas exactly the opposite is the case.

As you probably know in New York, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is in superb condition at present as regards its technique and its material. Give it a little strengthening in the horns and the violas, add one or two contrabasses, and it will compare with any organization in the world. Yet we occasionally wince at the programmes; we have passed our pinafore period, and to feed us upon the gruel of Haydn when we crave the caviare of the modern Russian composers is rather tantalizing.

We do not care so greatly for the classical austerities, but are longing for the World, the Flesh, and the D—vorak novelties. Even the Bostonian is human and hankers after the beanpots—I mean the fleshpots of Egypt.

We have, of course, gone through the Paderewski fever. It would be a very old story to speak of his concert with orchestra, which you had in New York some time before we did. That concert proved that if there were not an impressible girl in the world Paderewski would still be a powerful artist. Yet the feminine idolatry adds a little to the success, and it must be confessed that even the Boston maiden thawed and warmed to a dull red at the last concert. Yet the pianist could well afford to get along without this species of devotion, for he is a sincere and manly fellow, apart from all his genius. He showed that twice in Boston, recently. Last night he appeared in the Boston Theatre (in connection with the Symphony Orchestra) for the benefit of poor Goldstein, once our best contrabass player, now hopelessly insane, and by this act lifted the family of the unfortunate musician from out the slough of poverty. A few days ago it was represented to him at the New England Conservatory there were a number of students who were debarred from returning to their homes to spend the Christmas holidays; he quietly slipped down to the institution and gave these lonesome ones an unparalleled Christmas gift in the shape of an entire recital.

In the concert of Saturday, and the charity concert of Sunday, our orchestra played as seldom before. Mr. Paur has certainly brought the organization to a higher state of efficiency, a finer ensemble than it had even in the great days of Gericke. The volunteering of the whole orchestra and its leader, to play for the benefit of an afflicted comrade, deserves to be recognized, as well as the generosity of Paderewski noticed above, and the beneficence displayed stands out the more brilliantly when the attempts of certain artists to charge for their services (and charge roundly, too) is considered. Mr. Goldstein, or rather his family, will be about $3,000 richer because of the concert, which was chiefly brought about by the efforts of Mr. Paur.

[illegible] MARCH 1, 1896.

SOCIETY'S LENT.

Mrs. "Jack" and the Rest of Swelldom Astir.

(From Town Topics.)

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is a most extraordinary organization. I say this from quite another standpoint than that of musical art, and also with fear and trembling. One cannot be in Boston long before it is made clear that Mr. Higginson's "best gift to man" must be spoken of with a sort of mental courtesy, and it is like touching the apple of society's eye to find fault with its personnel, much less its able conductor. It is true a certain set of fashionable music lovers quarrel with amiable Mr. Paur for being a family man, not addicted to sitting in the laps of the great, after the manner of his predecessors, but even these sang azur followers of music and Mammon will not hear a word against the results of his devotion to art and domesticity. But the reason for calling the Symphony Orchestra extraordinary is because it is a potent factor in the sum of Boston society. In no other city in the world would this state of things exist, and it proclaims how very democratic these double-dyed aristocrats become when they get the chance. Seated in the front ranks are four or five musicians, who are good fiddlers, and on occasion soloists, but this is not their chief attraction. They are society pets, orchestra pets, and what that splendid body would be without them it is not safe to even think, much less say out loud. Their leader is Mr. Kneisel, but he does not count among the smart people. He is not "in," but Mr. Loeffler, his desk companion, is, several fathoms deep. Mr. Higginson is supposed to love him, Mr. Montgomery Sears makes much of him. He dines out; he is a card for most musicales, and whenever swelldom and the heavenly maid come together, pallid, smiling Loeffler is observed "in their midst." That he is persona grata in the best homes cannot be gainsaid, especially since his compositions have been played at the concerts, and he has posed as something "besides a mere violinist." I have watched him in the orchestra often, and concluded by his glances at the audience that he has a very high opinion of Mr. Loeffler's status. When he played in his Russian prince's private orchestra, fifteen years ago, he was just such a pale slip of a fellow as he is now, barring the absence of his blonde white hair. New England's climate is so inimical to hair! Even dear Paderewski would not dare to remain in these chill airs two consecutive seasons.

Dark-haired, dreamy-eyed Roth, looking as spruce as a tailor's fashion plate, is also a great pet, running Loeffler and Adamowski a close second. He does not "go everywhere," as they do, but he is adored by the younger set of girls for just that reason. Even Mrs. "Jack" smiles on him from her balcony seat, and does not seem to notice him elsewhere. One of the dashing orchestra men is W. W. Swansbowne, who came so near causing the Charles River to burst into flames two seasons ago. He was taken up previously by several musical followers of high degree and nearly spoiled with kindness. Though one of the "second violins," he is a delightful artist, and what may be termed a masher. The band of juvenile elite used to rave about "Swany" until they were forbidden by their elders, on pain of having their rehearsal tickets taken away and their allowance of violet and Huyler money suspended.

American 2/23 96

The Boston Symphony.

The program announced for the fourth concert in the series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Music Hall, next Wednesday evening, is an interesting one, because of the fact that two of the three orchestral selections to be played are novelties. The first and more important is the Symphony No. 6, known as the "Pathetic," by Tschaikowsky, which was published and performed just before his death. It is a singularly beautiful composition, impressive, and full of beautiful melodies. So favorable was the impression made at the first performance of this symphony at the Boston concerts early in January, that it was repeated, by very general request, at the concerts of last week, a compliment paid to not more than five compositions in the fifteen years' history of the organization. The second novelty on the program is the work of Richard Strauss, who is recognized as one of the ablest of the younger German composers of the present day. His reputation was made while director of the Court Opera at Weimar, and he is at present conductor of a series of concerts in Munich. The title of the composition, "Till Eulenspiegel's Lustige Streiche," conveys but little idea to the ordinary concert-goer of the nature of the selection. Till Eulenspiegel is the hero of an old German tale, supposed by some to have been written by Dr. Thomas Murner (1476-1580). The story gives him out as a wandering Braunschweig mechanic, who plays all sorts of tricks on everybody, and always comes out ahead. The closing orchestral selection will be the Hungarian Rhapsody No. 2, by Franz Liszt, a most beautiful piece of orchestral coloring, and eminently adapted to display the virtuosity of the orchestra in every department. Frl. Milka Ternina, the soloist selected for this concert, is the prima donna soprano of the Damrosch Opera Company, and this is her first visit to this country.

Herald 2/23

Boston Symphony Programme.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra announces for the fourth concert in its series at Music Hall, on Wednesday evening, February 26, an attractive programme, in which two of the three orchestral selections to be performed are given their initial production in these concerts.

The first and more important is the Symphony No. 6, called the "Pathetic," by Tschaikowsky, which was published and performed very shortly before his death and the last movement of which was supposed to be his own requiem. It is worthy of note in connection with this symphony that it made such a profound impression at its first performance at the Boston concerts early in January that it was repeated in the concerts last week. Such an immediate repetition is a compliment that has been paid to not more than half a dozen compositions in the entire 15 years' history of this organization.

The second novelty upon the programme is a composition by Richard Strauss, with the almost unmistakable title "Till Eulenspiegel's Lustige Streiche." Till (or Tyll) Eulenspiegel is the hero of an old German tale, supposed by some to have been written by Dr. Thomas Murner (1476-1589). The story describes a wandering Braunschweig mechanic, who plays all sorts of tricks on everybody, and always comes out ahead. The book has long been a popular classic in Germany, and has become almost identified with the folk-lore of the nation. For centuries Eulenspiegel has been as popular and familiar a mythical character as any hero in the Deutschen Volksbucher—as Santa Claus, Slovenly Peter, or Baron Munchausen is with us.

The remaining orchestral number on the programme is Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody No. 2, a composition eminently adapted to display the virtuosity of the various departments of the orchestra.

Frl. Milka Ternina, the soloist announced for this concert, is the prima donna soprano of the Damrosch Opera Company, and this is her first visit to this country. She was born in Agram, the capital of Croatia, received her musical education in Vienna and began her career as an opera singer at the Stadt Theatre in Bremen. From there she accepted the position of leading soprano at the Opera House in Munich, where she has been for the past seven years. An indication of the remarkable hold she has upon the public at Munich is afforded by the following incident: When Felix Weingartner, the famous Berlin conductor, was under contract to accept a position in Munich, Frl. Ternina was also under contract to leave Munich for Berlin; but Weingartner having changed his mind and being anxious to remain in Berlin, he was released solely upon the stipulation that Frl. Ternina should be allowed to remain in Munich. Frl. Ternina's selections at the coming concert are an aria from "Oberon" and Agatha's prayer and aria from "Der Freischutz."

Illus 2/22

SYMPHONY CONCERT NOVELTIES.

Works of Tschaikowsky and Richard Strauss to Be Given.

An interesting feature of the fourth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announced for next Wednesday evening at Music Hall, will be the performance of two novelties. The first of these will be the Symphony No. 6, by Tschaikowsky, known as the "Pathetic." So favorable was the impression made by the first performance of this work in the Boston concerts early in January, that it was repeated in the concerts of last week, something that has not happened more than half a dozen times in the history of this organization. This symphony was published and performed very shortly before Tschaikowsky's death, and it is supposed that he meant the last movement to be his own requiem.

The second novelty is by Richard Strauss, and has the rather lengthy title, "Till Eulenspiegel's Lustige Streiche." Till, or Tyll, Eulenspiegel is the hero of an old German tale, supposed by some to have been written by Dr. Thomas Murner (1476-1580). The [illegible] dering Braunschweig mechanic, who plays all sorts of tricks on everybody, and always comes out ahead. The book has long been a popular classic in Germany, and has become almost identified with the folk-lore of the nation. For centuries Eulenspiegel has been as popular and familiar a mythical character in Germany as any hero in the Deutschen Volksbucher—as Santa Claus, Slovenly Peter or Baron Munchausen is to the English.

Richard Strauss is looked upon as one of the most promising of the younger German school. His reputation was made while director of the Court Opera at Weimar, and he belongs to the extreme modern school. He is at present conductor of a series of concerts in Munich.

The other orchestral number on the programme is Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody No. 2, a composition eminently adapted to display the virtuosity of the various departments of the orchestra.

Frl. Milka Ternina of the Damrosch Opera Company will be the soloist.

THE MUSICAL AGE
CONDUCTED BY HARRY E. FREUND.
SUCCESSOR TO FREUND'S MUSICAL WEEKLY.
NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 15, 1896.

EMIL PAUR.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THE concerts given in this city by the Boston Symphony Orchestra are so highly appreciated by New York's cultured public that a few words about the career of that admirable organization may not prove out of place.

Thanks to the generosity of a music-loving citizen of Boston, actuated only by a desire to present good music in the best way, the idea was conceived in 1881 of a large permanent orchestra which should give each year an extended series of concerts in Music Hall, Boston, and make an occasional visit to the adjacent New England cities. The idea was acted upon and the Boston Symphony Orchestra thus began its existence. It had already given concerts during five seasons before it paid its first visit to New York. Since then a total of forty-two concerts have been given here—fifteen in Steinway Hall, fifteen in Chickering Hall, five in the Carnegie Music Hall, five in the Metropolitan Opera House, in regular series, with two extra concerts, one on the evening of Sunday, March 27, 1892, at the Metropolitan Opera House, given jointly with Paderewski in aid of the Washington Arch Fund, and the second at the Madison Square Garden Concert Hall on the evening of Monday, May 2d, of the same year, when d'Albert was the soloist.

Of the forty-two concerts mentioned, eleven were given under the leadership of Wilhelm Gericke, twenty-one under Nikisch, and ten under the leadership of the present conductor, Mr. Emil Paur.

Mr. Georg Henschel was the first conductor of the orchestra, and retained this position for three years, and on his retirement, in 1885, went to London, where he met with his usual success as a composer and teacher, and in a few years assumed the leadership of a large orchestra there, giving twelve concerts each year in St. James's Hall.

Mr. Henschel's successor was Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, who came from Vienna, and to this second leader can be attributed much of the wonderful precision and finish of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. After five years of untiring zeal and persistent striving for absolute perfection of ensemble, during which time he spared neither the orchestra nor himself, Mr. Gericke returned to Vienna.

The third and youngest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was Arthur Nikisch, a Hungarian, leader of the orchestra at the Stadt Theater, at Leipsic, the first opera house in that city. His reign was for four years, a year longer than that of Mr. Henschel, and a year less than Mr. Gericke. One thing the Boston Symphony Orchestra has always done for its conductors—it has given to them a greater renown than was theirs when they assumed control. Henschel, Gericke, and Nikisch must all own that a greater fame attended their return to Europe because of their association with America's first orchestra. Nikisch, on leaving Boston, was appointed director of the Royal Opera, and also conductor of the orchestra at Buda-Pesth, but has just accepted a more congenial position as the conductor of the Gewandhaus Concerts, in Leipsic, and the Berlin Philharmonic.

When Arthur Nikisch left the Stadt Theater, in Leipsic, to come to Boston he was succeeded by the same man who followed him as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the present leader, Mr. Emil Paur. It is also worthy of comment that Mr. Nikisch and Mr. Paur played at the same desk as first violinists under Mr. Gericke at the very same Stadt Theater several years before. Mr. Paur enters upon his third year with the orchestra this season.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give three more concerts at the Metropolitan Opera House. They will be on the evenings of January 23, February 27, and March 26. The soloists include Mme. Melba, Ben. Davis, and E. A. MacDowell.

(From Our Special Correspondent.)

BOSTON, January 11th, 1896.

BOSTON has become devoutly symphonic this season, possibly remembering the proverb, "Si l'ou n'a pas ce qu'on aime il faut aimer ce qu'on a." We are apt to forget how provincial we are in the matter of opera, depending upon the crumbs which fall from the New York table for what little we get of this form of music, and think only upon the fact that we possess a magnificent orchestra. It matters not what programme is presented, Music Hall is always filled and the side aisles are crowded with standing auditors at each performance. At one time this crowding of the hall depended upon the soloist, and the orchestra might give the finest of instrumental works, so long as there was no soloist there would be a number of empty seats. How this has changed may be judged from the fact that a recent programme gave Bach, Mozart, Haydn, Handel and Beethoven as represented by his first (and very Haydnish) symphony, with no soloist save a few obligatos by Mr. Kneisel, and yet the usual crowd was present.

I state this fact emphatically because the impression I got abroad that interest is languishing in the symphony concerts, whereas exactly the opposite is the case.

As you probably know in New York, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is in superb condition at present as regards its technique and its material. Give it a little strengthening in the horns and the violas, add one or two contrabasses, and it will compare with any organization in the world. Yet we occasionally wince at the programmes; we have passed our pinafore period, and to feed us upon the gruel of Haydn when we crave the caviare of the modern Russian composers is rather tantalizing.

We do not care so greatly for the classical austerities, but are longing for the World, the Flesh, and the D—vorak novelties. Even the Bostonian is human and hankers after the beanpots—I mean the fleshpots of Egypt.

We have, of course, gone through the Paderewski fever. It would be a very old story to speak of his concert with orchestra, which you had in New York some time before we did. That concert proved that if there were not an impressible girl in the world Paderewski would still be a powerful artist. Yet the feminine idolatry adds a little to the success, and it must be confessed that even the Boston maiden thawed and warmed to a dull red at the last concert. Yet the pianist could well afford to get along without this species of devotion, for he is a sincere and manly fellow, apart from all his genius. He showed that twice in Boston, recently. Last night he appeared in the Boston Theatre (in connection with the Symphony Orchestra) for the benefit of poor Goldstein, once our best contrabass player, now hopelessly insane, and by this act lifted the family of the unfortunate musician from out the slough of poverty. A few days ago it was represented to him at the New England Conservatory there were a number of students who were debarred from returning to their homes to spend the Christmas holidays; he quietly slipped down to the institution and gave these lonesome ones an unparalleled Christmas gift in the shape of an entire recital.

In the concert of Saturday, and the charity concert of Sunday, our orchestra played as seldom before. Mr. Paur has certainly brought the organization to a higher state of efficiency, a finer ensemble than it had even in the great days of Gericke. The volunteering of the whole orchestra and its leader, to play for the benefit of an afflicted comrade, deserves to be recognized, as well as the generosity of Paderewski noticed above, and the beneficence displayed stands out the more brilliantly when the attempts of certain artists to charge for their services (and charge roundly, too) is considered. Mr. Goldstein, or rather his family, will be about $3,000 richer because of the concert, which was chiefly brought about by the efforts of Mr. Paur.

BOSTON POST,
MARCH 1 1896.

SOCIETY'S LENT.

Mrs. "Jack" and the Rest of Swe.dom Astir.

(From Town Topics.)

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is a most extraordinary organization. I say this from quite another standpoint than that of musical art, and also with fear and trembling. One cannot be in Boston long before it is made clear that Mr. Higginson's "best gift to man" must be spoken of with a sort of mental courtesy, and it is like touching the apple of society's eye to find fault with its personnel, much less its able conductor. It is true a certain set of fashionable music lovers quarrel with amiable Mr. Paur for being a family man, not addicted to sitting in the laps of the great, after the manner of his predecessors, but even these sang azur followers of music and Mammon will not hear a word against the results of his devotion to art and domesticity. But the reason for calling the Symphony Orchestra extraordinary is because it is a potent factor in the sum of Boston society. In no other city in the world would this state of things exist, and it proclaims how very democratic these double-dyed aristocrats become when they get the chance. Seated in the front ranks are four or five musicians, who are good fiddlers, and on occasion soloists, but this is not their chief attraction. They are society pets, orchestra pets, and what that splendid body would be without them it is not safe to even think, much less say out loud. Their leader is Mr. Kneisel, but he does not count among the smart people. He is not "in," but Mr. Loeffler, his desk companion, is, several fathoms deep. Mr. Higginson is supposed to love him. Mr. Montgomery Sears makes much of him. He dines out; he is a card for most musicales, and whenever swelldom and the heavenly maid come together, pallid, smiling Loeffler is observed "in their midst." That he is persona grata in the best homes cannot be gainsaid, especially since his compositions have been played at the concerts, and he has posed as something "besides a mere violinist." I have watched him in the orchestra often, and concluded by his glances at the audience that he has a very high opinion of Mr. Loeffler's status. When he played in his Russian prince's private orchestra, fifteen years ago, he was just such a pale slip of a fellow as he is now, barring the absence of his blonde white hair. New England's climate is so inimical to hair! Even dear Paderewski would not dare to remain in these chill airs two consecutive seasons.

Dark-haired, dreamy-eyed Roth, looking as spruce as a tailor's fashion plate, is also a great pet, running Loeffler and Adamowski a close second. He does not "go everywhere," as they do, but he is adored by the younger set of girls for just that reason. Even Mrs. "Jack" smiles on him from her balcony seat, and does not seem to notice him elsewhere. One of the dashing orchestra men is W. W. Swansbowne, who came so near causing the Charles River to burst into flames two seasons ago. He was taken up previously by several musical flowers of high degree and nearly spoiled with kindness. Though one of the "second violins," he is a delightful artist, and what may be termed a masher. The band of juvenile elite used to rave about "Swany" until they were forbidden by their elders, on pain of having their rehearsal tickets taken away and their allowance of violet and Huyler money suspended.

American 2/23 96

The Boston Symphony.

The program announced for the fourth concert in the series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Music Hall, next Wednesday evening, is an interesting one, because of the fact that two of the three orchestral selections to be played are novelties. The first and more important is the Symphony No. 6, known as the "Pathetic," by Tschaikowsky, which was published and performed just before his death. It is a singularly beautiful composition, impressive, and full of beautiful melodies. So favorable was the impression made at the first performance of this symphony at the Boston concerts early in January, that it was repeated, by very general request, at the concerts of last week, a compliment paid to not more than five compositions in the fifteen years' history of the organization. The second novelty on the program is the work of Richard Strauss, who is recognized as one of the ablest of the younger German composers of the present day. His reputation was made while director of the Court Opera at Weimar, and he is at present conductor of a series of concerts in Munich. The title of the composition, "Till Eulenspiegel's Lustige Streiche," conveys but little idea to the ordinary concert-goer of the nature of the selection. Till Eulenspiegel is the hero of an old German tale, supposed by some to have been written by Dr. Thomas Murner (1476-1580). The story gives him out as a wandering Braunschweig mechanic, who plays all sorts of tricks on everybody, and always comes out ahead. The closing orchestral selection will be the Hungarian Rhapsody No. 2, by Franz Liszt, a most beautiful piece of orchestral coloring, and eminently adapted to display the virtuosity of the orchestra in every department. Frl. Milka Ternina, the soloist selected for this concert, is the prima donna soprano of the Damrosch Opera Company, and this is her first visit to this country.

Herald 2/23

Boston Symphony Programme.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra announces for the fourth concert in its series at Music Hall, on Wednesday evening, February 26, an attractive programme, in which two of the three orchestral selections to be performed are given their initial production in these concerts.

The first and more important is the Symphony No. 6, called the "Pathetic," by Tschaikowsky, which was published and performed very shortly before his death and the last movement of which was supposed to be his own requiem. It is worthy of note in connection with this symphony that it made such a profound impression at its first performance at the Boston concerts early in January that it was repeated in the concerts last week. Such an immediate repetition is a compliment that has been paid to not more than half a dozen compositions in the entire 15 years' history of this organization.

The second novelty upon the programme is a composition by Richard Strauss, with the almost unmistakable title "Till Eulenspiegel's Lustige Streiche." Till (or Tyll) Eulenspiegel is the hero of an old German tale, supposed by some to have been written by Dr. Thomas Murner (1476-1580). The story describes a wandering Braunschweig mechanic, who plays all sorts of tricks on everybody, and always comes out ahead. The book has long been a popular classic in Germany, and has become almost identified with the folk-lore of the nation. For centuries Eulenspiegel has been as popular and familiar a mythical character as any hero in the Deutschen Volksbucher—as Santa Claus, Slovenly Peter, or Baron Munchausen is with us.

The remaining orchestral number on the programme is Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody No. 2, a composition eminently adapted to display the virtuosity of the various departments of the orchestra.

Frl. Milka Ternina, the soloist announced for this concert, is the prima donna soprano of the Damrosch Opera Company, and this is her first visit to this country. She was born in Agram, the capital of Croatia, received her musical education in Vienna and began her career as an opera singer at the Stadt Theatre in Bremen. From there she accepted the position of leading soprano at the Opera House in Munich, where she has been for the past seven years. An indication of the remarkable hold she has upon the public at Munich is afforded by the following incident: When Felix Weingartner, the famous Berlin conductor, was under contract to accept a position in Munich, Frl. Ternina was also under contract to leave Munich for Berlin; but Weingartner having changed his mind and being anxious to remain in Berlin, he was released solely upon the stipulation that Frl. Ternina should be allowed to remain in Munich. Frl. Ternina's selections at the coming concert are an aria from "Oberon" and Agatha's prayer and aria from "Der Freischutz."

Herald 2/24

SYMPHONY CONCERT NOVELTIES.

Works of Tschaikowsky and Richard Strauss to Be Given.

An interesting feature of the fourth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announced for next Wednesday evening at Music Hall, will be the performance of two novelties. The first of these will be the Symphony No. 6, by Tschaikowsky, known as the "Pathetic." So favorable was the impression made by the first performance of this work in the Boston concerts early in January, that it was repeated in the concerts of last week, something that has not happened more than half a dozen times in the history of this organization. This symphony was published and performed very shortly before Tschaikowsky's death, and it is supposed that he meant the last movement to be his own requiem.

The second novelty is by Richard Strauss, and has the rather lengthy title, "Till Eulenspiegel's Lustige Streiche." Till, or Tyll, Eulenspiegel is the hero of an old German tale, supposed by some to have been written by Dr. Thomas Murner (1476-1580). Th[illegible] dering Braunschweig mechanic, who plays all sorts of tricks on everybody, and always comes out ahead. The book has long been a popular classic in Germany, and has become almost identified with the folk-lore of the nation. For centuries Eulenspiegel has been as popular and familiar a mythical character in Germany as any hero in the Deutschen Volksbucher—as Santa Claus, Slovenly Peter or Baron Munchausen is to the English.

Richard Strauss is looked upon as one of the most promising of the younger German school. His reputation was made while director of the Court Opera at Weimar, and he belongs to the extreme modern school. He is at present conductor of a series of concerts in Munich.

The other orchestral number on the programme is Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody No. 2, a composition eminently adapted to display the virtuosity of the various departments of the orchestra.

Frl. Milka Ternina of the Damrosch Opera Company will be the soloist.

THE SUN.

BALTIMORE, THURSDAY, FEB. 27, 1896.

A TSCHAIKOWSKY SYMPHONY.

The Great Russian's Last Composition of the Kind Produced Here by the Boston Orchestra.

An up-to-date concert programme seems to be incomplete without the name of Tschaikowsky, at least this must be the firm opinion of Director Paur, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for at nearly every one of the orchestra's concerts this year something by this wonderful composer has been produced. The public has in every case been clearly the gainer, for Tschaikowsky stands forth in the musical history of the end of this century as one of its most splendid and striking figures.

At the concert of the orchestra last night at Music Hall Tschaikowsky was represented on the programme by his last symphony, number six, in B minor. The added title of "Pathetic" applies to the work in more than one way, as the composer died soon after its completion. The last movement of the symphony has been supposed to have been written for his own requiem.

In the matter of form this symphony departs essentially from the traditional treatment. It has been maintained that the word "suite" would apply to it more correctly. However this may be, the beauty of the work has not suffered because of the formal innovations. The interest is kept up throughout in a manner that is rare and is a sign of a musician of the highest endowments. Probably nothing else has been performed by the orchestra this year that has such intense power.

The playing of the orchestra in this work, as indeed thoughout the entire concert, was all that could be desired. Mr. Paur's reading of the symphony lost nothing by his vigor and enthusiasm. The more delicate treatment of the first and last movements was as appreciative and satisfying as the spirited second and third movements.

The name of Strauss upon the programme of the orchestra looks at first sight rather out of place. The Strauss represented at the concert was not Johann, of waltz fame, but a younger scion of the family of Strauss, from whom much has been expected. A few years ago one of his symphonies was performed in this city, and last night he was represented by what, for lack of a better word, may be called a musical "divertisement," entitled "Til Eulenspiegels Lustige Streiche," which has been rendered into English as "Til Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." As the name indicates, it is of a jocular and irregular character, being in keeping with the erratic doings of Eulenspiegel, who is a popular hero of a German volksbuch of the fifteenth century.

The work shows decided originality, but the novelty seems to be the result of the composer's imagination run mad. It was given for the first time in this city.

The concluding number was an arrangement, or rather a derangement, of the second Liszt Hungarian Rhapsody by Karl Mueller Berghaus. This composition has become such a hackneyed piano solo that one might suppose it had earned exemption from duty under other auspices, and this, however, does not seem to be the case, as the management last night relied upon it to supply the requisite popular portion of the concert.

The soloist was Fraulein Milka Ternina, the prima donna of the Royal Opera in Munich and at present the leading singer of the Damrosch Opera Company. She sang the recitative and aria from Weber's "Oberon," "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster;" Agatha's Prayer and aria, "Wie nakte mir der Schlummer," from "Der Freischuetz."

Fraulein Ternina is certainly one of the most intelligent and satisfactory singers who has visited America in the past ten years. Her voice is of heroic dimensions, of unusually beautiful quality and under good control. The most striking characteristic of her singing is her superb style and the great musical temperament dominating her performance.

The concert was the last but one of the season's series by the orchestra, and was in many respects the most interesting that has been given this year.

Evening Herald

SATURDAY EVENING, FEBRUARY 29, 1896.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The fourth concert of the season by the Boston Symphony orchestra occurred at the Academy of Music last night, and one of the largest houses of the year was in attendance. Mr. Paur had provided a modern programme, except for the vocal solos, which were antique, and perhaps enjoyably so. The sixth, or "Pathetic," symphony of Tschaikowsky was the heavy number of the bill. People in this quarter are not unfamiliar with it, through the readings of Mr. Seidl and Walter Damrosch, and Boston took to it so keenly that it was repeated at a subsequent concert—the first and only time that a piece was played twice by this orchestra in its home town in a single season. It is a resonant and stirring oftener than a pathetic work, although there is an undertone of melancholy such as we find to be not uncommon in all the art of the East. It is difficult to be sentimental on the bass drum. But through all the clash and riot of brass and percussive instruments there are high ideals; indeed, the whole work is serious and dignified in its intention and the effect is that of seeing a stately and beautiful structure through driving mist and whirling branches. Had Tschaikowsky lived longer his style would have ripened, his work would have gained repose, and he might have become the equal of Rubinstein as a melodist and formalist, while his more pungent individuality would always have imbued his work with more character than that of Rubinstein. The latter regretted his Slavic origin, so far as it affected his music. He followed German models, when he could, and denied utterance to his racial promptings. Tschaikowsky is proudly and frankly Russian. When his symphony expresses pain it is with a savage's defiance of it; not with the assumption of suffering that we find in the work of those arch sentimentalists, the Frenchmen, nor with the real though sickly plainings of a Chopin. The beauty is not tame. It never attains to loveliness; the gayety never reaches joy; the tragedy is often fantastic. The thing which most impresses the hearer in this work is its splendid vitality, its barbarian vigor. Its author has a fair command of the resources of the orchestra and what he does not know, he dares. He is ingenious within certain limits, and he has tact, as well. Had he been lacking in this latter attribute he would not have closed the symphony with a requiem, but would have arranged it in the conventional form. The requiem is a soothing finish to the excited work. The Second Hungarian rhapsody of Liszt was played in the fiery, heroic strain of the Russian symphony. This and prayers before battle ought to put heart into soldiers. The harp episode in the Berghaus instrumentation was struck out with wondrous liberty and force of tone. Usually the harp suggests a zephyr; this time it was a gale. There was a delightful suite adapted from Godard's "Jocelyn," the first of two that he constructed from airs and other portions of his opera. Though nearly unknown in this larger aspect to American audiences, his work as it was revealed last night warrants close acquaintance. It has symphonic breadth and ring, especially as interpreted by this magnificent orchestra, and it has much that is suave and beautiful, though these aspects are less congenial to Mr. Paur than its vigorous and even dynamic phases. It has moments of surprising power, its rustic incidents are sweet, fresh and unaffected; the harmony is less distinct than in the older writers, but is constant and ingenuous. A bright gavotte, quaint and in minors, and a chime movement gave most pleasure to the audience. Alwin Schroeder, the cellist, played Dvorak's "Wood Rest" and a caprice by Julius Klengel with vivacity, expression, stable tone and power. Through some mischance, perhaps, the orchestra did not accompany his solos, and he had only an upright piano in its place. The effect was not conspicuously admirable, but it gave the more prominence to his solo work. The Dvorak piece is pleasant in sentiment, though not a strong or striking work, and the caprice is full of life. The other soloist was Lillian Blauvelt of Brooklyn, a delightful singer, whatever her selections, and an artist of charming personality, which goes farther than an audience realizes toward the acceptance of her work. Her voice is true and melodious, her method admirable in its simplicity and directness, the art of it never being forced on the attention. Her selections were the "Voi che sapete," from "Figaro," and "With Verdure Clad," from "The Creation," neither of them commanding, but both pretty and restful. Applause for her was especially vigorous. The next and last concert of the season by the Symphony orchestra will occur on the 27th of March.

THE HERALD

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 27.

FOURTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Freulein, Ternina and the Boston Orchestra at the Music Hall—Success of the Cantatrice.

A varied programme truly was the one presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night. In the instrumental numbers could be seen such a striking difference of temperament, idea and method as to make even the light and familiar selections decidedly interesting, to say nothing of the unique composition of Richard Strauss, as eccentric in construction as it is complicated in title.

But the star feature of the evening was the singing of Freulein Milka Ternina, the soprano, of whom so much has been said and written since her advent in this country. She came from Munich to join the Damrosch Company, and has since fully sustained the splendid reputation attained in the Old Country. She was heard for the first time by Baltimoreans in the Music Hall last night, and those who were present will not soon forget the peerless vocalization of the famous cantatrice.

First she sang the recitative and aria "Ocean! Thou Mighty Monster," from Weber's opera "Oberon," a well-known number, yet happily selected, for it afforded Ternina ample opportunity to display the remarkable range of her voice. From the extreme high register to broad tones in alt the enunciation was true, and each note as full of music as the sweetest chimes; and it was all done without the least apparent effort. Even in the fullest of orchestral accompaniment the voice sung out above all in its dramatic intensity, as pure as crystal. There was everything in the style and effort to admire and dwell upon.

Equally as well done was the second vocal number, "Agatha's Prayer," and aria from "Der Freischutz," its deep pathos and melodious rhythm in such a contrast to the dramatic fire of the first solo. Ternina was given an ovation after the sweet, sympathetic rendition of this selection.

Tschaikowsky's symphony "Pathetic," F in B minor, so named probably for the sombre adajio which opens it, and the funeral finale movement. The work was produced shortly before the composer's death, and the apparent inconsistency of the various movements seems to tell of the writer's vain effort to throw off the gruesome forebodings, which resulted ultimately in the adajio lamentoso, the last movement supposed to have been meant for his own requiem.

The symphony is not unfamiliar to the local concert-goers. It seems like a rehearsal of a morbid existence, dashed here and there with a firm determination to infuse a rainbow halo into a clouded life, as can be inferred from the three snappy intermediate movements. It is characteristically Tschaikowsky; replete with sharp contrasts, bold centrapuntal construction and departures in instrumentation.

"Tiel Eulenspiegels Lustige Streiche" was the Strauss number, which is now being given its fourth performance in America. Probably as many meanings could be advanced for its themes as have been hazarded in vain endeavors to furnish an English translation for the title. It is descriptive of the merry pranks of Tyel Owiglass, a mythical personage in German folklore, and the music, in keeping with the subject, is of such light, jovial nature as to culminate almost in an actual farce.

The concluding number was Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody No. 2, scored for orchestra by Karl Mueller-Berghaus. The work was handled in excellent manner, but is hardly an improvement over the old Liszt-Doppler arrangement.

Director Paur was heartily encored for the intelligent reading given the symphony, as well as the masterly manner in which the vocal accompaniments were conducted.

Baltimore American and COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER

ONE HUNDRED AND TWENTY YEARS OLD AND THE OLDEST DAILY NEWSPAPER IN AMERICA.

"WE BUILD."

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 27, 1896.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.

Performance of the Boston Orchestra—A Delightful Singer.

The audience assembled to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening heard by far the finest concert which has taken place this season—or, indeed, in several seasons—in Baltimore. Everything contributed to this end. The superb orchestra was in its best form, Mr. Paur was in his happiest mood, the program was highly interesting and well arranged, and the soloist proved to be one of the greatest artists heard here in a long time. Altogether, the concert was delightful, and those who were present were to be congratulated.

The Tchaikowsky symphony, which opened the program, was very welcome. It is a magnificent work, and repeated hearings but serve to deepen the impression of solemnity and grandeur it produces. This symphony was the last that Tchaikowsky wrote. It is his swan song. He has rightly named it pathetic, and its effect throughout is one of somber, gloomy melancholy. The symphony is a masterpiece, and it is a source of deep regret that it is the last work the world will ever receive from its composer, the greatest of his nationality, one of the greatest of his time.

It abounds in rhythmical and technical difficulties, especially in the second and third movements; but the Boston Orchestra, as usual, played it with that perfection and finish which are characteristic of all their work. Mr. Paur conducted the work con amore, and it received an electrifying treatment at his hands. This symphony was first produced in Baltimore at a Peabody symphony concert on the 23d of February, 1895; so, last evening's performance came near being an anniversary.

The second number introduced the soloist Frl. Milka Ternina, a well-known and highly-appreciated singer in her own country, Germany, and at present one of the prime donne of the Damrosch German Opera Company.

Rarely does nature endow one person with all the attributes of an artist as she has Fraulein Ternina. A noble voice, faultlessly placed and delivered; perfect diction and enunciation, great dramatic power, splendid artistic intelligence, united to a personality very dignified and attractive—all in all, a superb singer, a fact immediately recognized by her audience, who were enthusiastic in their appreciation and delight. Frl. Ternina selected the two great Weber arias, "Ocean, Ungeheuer," from Oberon, and "Leise, Leise," from the Freischutz, for her solos, and her singing of both was beyond criticism, artistic and finished in every phrase. She more than fulfilled the high expectations aroused by the promise of her appearance.

The novelty, "Till Eulenspiegel's Lustige Streiche," belongs, as may be inferred from its title, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," distinctively to the humoreske type, although it is inscribed "in rondo form," but this is applicable only in its widest sense. It is program music based on an old German tale which belongs to the folklore of the nation, and "merry pranks" abound in the orchestral score, which is the most modern and highly colored of all this fin de siecle composer's works. He seems to have brought every possibility of the modern orchestra into play, and the result is a vivid tone-picture, so "lustig" that the hearers must smile perforce at its extravagancies. Richard Strauss, its composer, is in the very van of modern orchestral writers, and this latest composition out-herods Herod. The concert was brought to a close by a brilliant performance of the second Hungarian Rhapsody of Liszt, orchestrated by Muller-Berghaus. Mr. Paur has rarely conducted with more enthusiasm than he did last night, a fact which naturally contributed to the success of the concert. The next and final concert takes place Wednesday, March 25th.

Sun 2/26

CONCERTS THIS WEEK.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Kneisel Quartette.

The fourth concert in the series given this season at the Music Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Emil Paur, will take place Wednesday evening.

The numbers selected for the performance include: Tschaikowsky's Symphony, No. 6, "Pathetic;" Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 2, and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegels Lustige Streiche."

The soloists will be Fraulein Milka Ternina, one of the leading sopranos of the Damrosch Opera Company, and for seven years dramatic soprano at the Munich Opera House. Her selections will be an aria from "Oberon," "Agatha's Prayer" and an aria from "Die Freischutz."

Tomorrow afternoon, at Music Hall, will be given the third concert in the series by the Kneisel Quartette and Prof. Harold Randolph, of Baltimore. Two of the numbers to be given have never been heard in Baltimore before. They are a suite for piano and violin in D minor, by Emile Bernard, and a string quartette in E flat minor, written by Tschaikowsky, in memory of Ferdinand Laub, the noted violinist and quartette

---

Baltimore Every Saturday 2/22

Boston Symphony Concert.

Baltimore will be specially favored next Wednesday night at the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at Music Hall, when Frl. Milka Terina, the great Wagnerian dramatic soprano, will make her first appearance here. Ternina is under engagement with the Damrosch Opera Company but has been specially engaged as soloist for the coming concert. For several years she has been the leading vocalist at the Wagnerian festivals at Munich and has recently arrived in America. She has a voice of superb power and sweetness, and is said to excel any of the prima donnas heard in this country.

Her numbers on the program for the Wednesday concert are an aria from "Oberon," and also Agatha's prayer and aria from "Der Freischutz" The other numbers for orchestra under Mr. Emil Paur include Tschaikowsky Symphony No 6, "Pathetic," Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody No. 2; and the famous Strauss "Till Eulenspiegels Lustige Streiche." The concert, in consequence of the engagement of Frl. Ternina, will be the most notable of the series.

Life 2/22

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT AT THE MUSIC HALL.—Again Baltimoreans will have an opportunity to enjoy something in the German opera line, this time it will be Frl. Milka Ternina, who will appear as the soloist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on next Wednesday evening, February 26, at 8.15, at the regular monthly concert of this brilliant musical organization. Frl Ternina is a soprano of the Damrosch Opera Company and for the past seven years has been the leading soprano at the opera house in Munich. This is her first visit to this country, not being with the Damrosch Opera Company when heard here in January, yet she is well and favorably known to a great many by reputation; for this reason alone she will be received, no doubt, with great favor and given a warm reception. Her selections for the coming concert will be an aria from "Oberon" and Agatha's prayer and aria from "Der Freischutz." She will be greatly augmented by the enlarged Symphony Orchestra in the rendition of her parts, in a way few can fail to appreciate and which so many of our music-lovers have learned to appreciate in the past. Tickets for sale at Albert's, 13 N. Charles street, and we suggest securing them early.

News 2/19

Boston Symphony Concert.

An echo of the German opera season will be heard next Wednesday evening at Music Hall when Frl. Milka Ternina will appear as the soloist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its regular monthly concert. Frl. Ternina is a soprano of the Damrosch Opera Company. For the past seven years she has been the leading soprano at the opera house in Munich.

This is her first visit to this country. Frl Ternina's selctions at the coming concert will be an aria from "Oberon" and Agatha's prayer and aria from "Der Freischutz." She was not with the company in its recent Baltimore season, but has been singing with it in New York and other cities.

THE SUN.

BALTIMORE, THURSDAY, FEB. 27, 1896.

A TSCHAIKOWSKY SYMPHONY.

The Great Russian's Last Composition of the Kind Produced Here by the Boston Orchestra.

An up-to-date concert programme seems to be incomplete without the name of Tschaikowsky, at least this must be the firm opinion of Director Paur, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for at nearly every one of the orchestra's concerts this year something by this wonderful composer has been produced. The public has in every case been clearly the gainer, for Tschaikowsky stands forth in the musical history of the end of this century as one of its most splendid and striking figures.

At the concert of the orchestra last night at Music Hall Tschaikowsky was represented on the programme by his last symphony, number six, in B minor. The added title of "Pathetic" applies to the work in more than one way, as the composer died soon after its completion. The last movement of the symphony has been supposed to have been written for his own requiem.

In the matter of form this symphony departs essentially from the traditional treatment. It has been maintained that the word "suite" would apply to it more correctly. However this may be, the beauty of the work has not suffered because of the formal innovations. The interest is kept up throughout in a manner that is rare and is a sign of a musician of the highest endowments. Probably nothing else has been performed by the orchestra this year that has such intense power.

The playing of the orchestra in this work, as indeed thoughout the entire concert, was all that could be desired. Mr. Paur's reading of the symphony lost nothing by his vigor and enthusiasm. The more delicate treatment of the first and last movements was as appreciative and satisfying as the spirited second and third movements.

The name of Strauss upon the programme of the orchestra looks at first sight rather out of place. The Strauss represented at the concert was not Johann, of waltz fame, but a younger scion of the family of Strauss, from whom much has been expected. A few years ago one of his symphonies was performed in this city, and last night he was represented by what, for lack of a better word, may be called a musical "divertisement," entitled "Til Eulenspiegels Lustige Streiche," which has been rendered into English as "Til Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." As the name indicates, it is of a jocular and irregular character, being in keeping with the erratic doings of Eulenspiegel, who is a popular hero of a German volksbuch of the fifteenth century.

The work shows decided originality, but the novelty seems to be the result of the composer's imagination run mad. It was given for the first time in this city.

The concluding number was an arrangement, or rather a derangement, of the second Liszt Hungarian Rhapsody by Karl Mueller Berghaus. This composition has become such a hackneyed piano solo that one might suppose it had earned exemption from duty under other auspices, and this, however, does not seem to be the case, as the management last night relied upon it to supply the requisite popular portion of the concert.

The soloist was Fraulein Milka Ternina, the prima donna of the Royal Opera in Munich and at present the leading singer of the Damrosch Opera Company. She sang the recitative and aria from Weber's "Oberon," "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster;" Agathe's Prayer and aria, "Wie nakte mir der Schlummer," from "Der Freischuetz."

Fraulein Ternina is certainly one of the most intelligent and satisfactory singers who has visited America in the past ten years. Her voice is of heroic dimensions, of unusually beautiful quality and under good control. The most striking characteristic of her singing is her superb style and the great musical temperament dominating her performance.

The concert was the last but one of the season's series by the orchestra, and was in many respects the most interesting that has been given this year.

Sun 2/20

CONCERTS THIS WEEK.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Kneisel Quartette.

The fourth concert in the series given this season at the Music Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Emil Paur, will take place Wednesday evening.

The numbers selected for the performance include: Tschaikowsky's Symphony, No. 6, "Pathetic;" Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 2, and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegels Lustige Streiche."

The soloists will be Fraulein Milka Ternina, one of the leading sopranos of the Damrosch Opera Company, and for seven years dramatic soprano at the Munich Opera House. Her selections will be an aria from "Oberon," "Agatha's Prayer" and an aria from "Die Freischutz."

Tomorrow afternoon, at Music Hall, will be given the third concert in the series by the Kneisel Quartette and Prof. Harold Randolph, of Baltimore. Two of the numbers to be given have never been heard in Baltimore before. They are a suite for piano and violin, in D minor, by Emile Bernard, and a string quartette in E flat minor, written by Tschaikowsky, in memory of Ferdinand Laub, the noted violinist and quartette player.

Brooklyn Daily Eagle

SATURDAY EVENING, FEBRUARY 29, 1896.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The fourth concert of the season by the Boston Symphony orchestra occurred at the Academy of Music last night, and one of the largest houses of the year was in attendance. Mr. Paur had provided a modern programme, except for the vocal solos, which were antique, and perhaps enjoyably so. The sixth, or "Pathetic," symphony of Tschaikowsky was the heavy number of the bill. People in this quarter are not unfamiliar with it, through the readings of Mr. Seidl and Walter Damrosch, and Boston took to it so keenly that it was repeated at a subsequent concert—the first and only time that a piece was played twice by this orchestra in its home town in a single season. It is a resonant and stirring oftener than a pathetic work, although there is an undertone of melancholy such as we find to be not uncommon in all the art of the East. It is difficult to be sentimental on the bass drum. But through all the clash and riot of brass and percussive instruments there are high ideals; indeed, the whole work is serious and dignified in its intention and the effect is that of seeing a stately and beautiful structure through driving mist and whirling branches. Had Tschaikowsky lived longer his style would have ripened, his work would have gained repose, and he might have become the equal of Rubinstein as a melodist and formalist, while his more pungent individuality would always have imbued his work with more character than that of Rubinstein. The latter regretted his Slavic origin, so far as it affected his music. He followed German models, when he could, and denied utterance to his racial promptings. Tschaikowsky is proudly and frankly Russian. When his symphony expresses pain it is with a savage's defiance of it; not with the assumption of suffering that we find in the work of those arch sentimentalists, the Frenchmen, nor with the real though sickly plainings of a Chopin. The beauty is not tame. It never attains to loveliness; the gayety never reaches joy; the tragedy is often fantastic. The thing which most impresses the hearer in this work is its splendid vitality, its barbarian vigor. Its author has a fair command of the resources of the orchestra and what he does not know, he dares. He is ingenious within certain limits, and he has tact, as well. Had he been lacking in this latter attribute he would not have closed the symphony with a requiem, but would have arranged it in the conventional form. The requiem is a soothing finish to the excited work. The Second Hungarian rhapsody of Lisst was planed in the fiery, heroic strain of the Russian symphony. This and prayers before battle ought to put heart into soldiers. The harp episode in the Berghaus instrumentation was struck out with wondrous liberty and force of tone. Usually the harp suggests a zephyr; this time it was a gale. There was a delightful suite adapted from Godard's "Jocelyn," the first of two that he constructed from airs and other portions of his opera. Though nearly unknown in this larger aspect to American audiences, his work as it was revealed last night warrants close acquaintance. It has symphonic breadth and ring, especially as interpreted by this magnificent orchestra, and it has much that is suave and beautiful, though these aspects are less congenial to Mr. Paur than its vigorous and even dynamic phases. It has moments of surprising power, its rustic incidents are sweet, fresh and unaffected; the harmony is less distinct than in the older writers, but is constant and ingenuous. A bright gavotte, quaint and in minors, and a chime movement gave most pleasure to the audience. Alwin Schroeder, the cellist, played Dvorak's "Wood Rest" and a caprice by Julius Klengel with vivacity, expression, stable tone and power. Through some mischance, perhaps, the orchestra did not accompany his solos, and he had only an upright piano in its place. The effect was not conspicuously admirable, but it gave the more prominence to his solo work. The Dvorak piece is pleasant in sentiment, though not a strong or striking work, and the caprice is full of life. The other soloist was Lillian Blauvelt of Brooklyn, a delightful singer, whatever her selections, and an artist of charming personality, which goes farther than an audience realizes toward the acceptance of her work. Her voice is true and melodious, her method admirable in its simplicity and directness, the art of it never being forced on the attention. Her selections were the "Voi che sapete," from "Figaro," and "With Verdure Clad," from "The Creation," neither of them commanding, but both pretty and restful. Applause for her was especially vigorous. The next and last concert of the season by the Symphony orchestra will occur on the 27th of March.

Baltimore
Every Saturday
2/22

Boston Symphony Concert.

Baltimore will be specially favored next Wednesday night at the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at Music Hall, when Frl. Milka Terina, the great Wagnerian dramatic soprano, will make her first appearance here. Ternina is under engagement with the Damrosch Opera Company but has been specially engaged as soloist for the coming concert. For several years she has been the leading vocalist at the Wagnerian festivals at Munich and has recently arrived in America. She has a voice of superb power and sweetness, and is said to excel any of the prima donnas heard in this country.

Her numbers on the program for the Wednesday concert are an aria from "Oberon," and also Agatha's prayer and aria from "Der Freischutz." The other numbers for orchestra under Mr. Emil Paur include Tschaikowsky Symphony No 6, "Pathetic," Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody No. 2; and the famous Strauss "Till Eulenspiegels Lustige Streiche." The concert, in consequence of the engagement of Frl. Ternina, will be the most notable of the series.

THE MORNING HERALD
BALTIMORE
THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 27.

FOURTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Freulein Ternina and the Boston Orchestra at the Music Hall—Success of the Cantatrice.

A varied programme truly was the one presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night. In the instrumental numbers could be seen such a striking difference of temperament, idea and method as to make even the light and familiar selections decidedly interesting, to say nothing of the unique composition of Richard Strauss, as eccentric in construction as it is complicated in title.

But the star feature of the evening was the singing of Freulein Milka Ternina, the soprano, of whom so much has been said and written since her advent in this country. She came from Munich to join the Damrosch Company, and has since fully sustained the splendid reputation attained in the Old Country. She was heard for the first time by Baltimoreans in the Music Hall last night, and those who were present will not soon forget the peerless vocalization of the famous cantatrice.

First she sang the recitative and aria "Ocean! Thou Mighty Monster," from Weber's opera "Oberon," a well-known number, yet happily selected, for it afforded Ternina ample opportunity to display the remarkable range of her voice. From the extreme high register to broad tones in alt the enunciation was true, and each note as full of music as the sweetest chimes; and it was all done without the least apparent effort. Even in the fullest of orchestral accompaniment the voice sung out above all in its dramatic intensity, as pure as crystal. There was everything in the style and effort to admire and dwell upon.

Equally as well done was the second vocal number, "Agatha's Prayer," and aria from "Der Freischutz," its deep pathos and melodious rhythm in such a contrast to the dramatic fire of the first solo. Ternina was given an ovation after the sweet, sympathetic rendition of this selection.

Tschalkowsky's symphony "Pathetic," F in B minor, so named probably for the sombre adajio which opens it, and the funeral finale movement. The work was produced shortly before the composer's death, and the apparent inconsistency of the various movements seems to tell of the writer's vain effort to throw off the gruesome forebodings, which resulted ultimately in the adajio lamentoso, the last movement supposed to have been meant for his own requiem.

The symphony is not unfamiliar to the local concert-goers. It seems like a rehearsal of a morbid existence, dashed here and there with a firm determination to infuse a rainbow halo into a clouded life, as can be inferred from the three snappy intermediate movements. It is characteristically Tschaikowsky; replete with sharp contrasts, bold centrapuntal construction and departures in instrumentation.

"Tiel Eulenspiegels Lustige Streiche" was the Strauss number, which is now being given its fourth performance in America. Probably as many meanings could be advanced for its themes as have been hazarded in vain endeavors to furnish an English translation for the title. It is descriptive of the merry pranks of Tyel Owlglass, a mythical personage in German folklore, and the music, in keeping with the subject, is of such light, jovial nature as to culminate almost in an actual farce.

The concluding number was Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody No. 2, scored for orchestra by Karl Mueller-Berghaus. The work was handled in excellent manner, but is hardly an improvement over the old Liszt-Doppler arrangement.

Director Paur was heartily encored for the intelligent reading given the symphony, as well as the masterly manner in which the vocal accompaniments were conducted.

Baltimore American
AND COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER

ONE HUNDRED AND TWENTY YEARS OLD AND THE OLDEST DAILY NEWSPAPER IN AMERICA.

"WE BUILD."

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 27, 1896.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.

Performance of the Boston Orchestra—A Delightful Singer.

The audience assembled to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening heard by far the finest concert which has taken place this season—or, indeed, in several seasons—in Baltimore. Everything contributed to this end. The superb orchestra was in its best form. Mr. Paur was in his happiest mood, the program was highly interesting and well arranged, and the soloist proved to be one of the greatest artists heard here in a long time. Altogether, the concert was delightful, and those who were present were to be congratulated.

The Tchaikowsky symphony, which opened the program, was very welcome. It is a magnificent work, and repeated hearings but serve to deepen the impression of solemnity and grandeur it produces. This symphony was the last that Tchaikowsky wrote. It is his swan song. He has rightly named it pathetic, and its effect throughout is one of somber, gloomy melancholy. The symphony is a masterpiece, and it is a source of deep regret that it is the last work the world will ever receive from its composer, the greatest of his nationality, one of the greatest of his time.

It abounds in rhythmical and technical difficulties, especially in the second and third movements; but the Boston Orchestra, as usual, played it with that perfection and finish which are characteristic of all their work. Mr. Paur conducted the work con amore, and it received an electrifying treatment at his hands. This symphony was first produced in Baltimore at a Peabody symphony concert on the 23d of February, 1895; so, last evening's performance came near being an anniversary.

The second number introduced the soloist Frl. Milka Ternina, a well-known and highly-appreciated singer in her own country, Germany, and at present one of the prime donne of the Damrosch German Opera Company.

Rarely does nature endow one person with all the attributes of an artist as she has Fraulein Ternina. A noble voice, faultlessly placed and delivered; perfect diction and enunciation, great dramatic power, splendid artistic intelligence, united to a personality very dignified and attractive—all in all, a superb singer, a fact immediately recognized by her audience, who were enthusiastic in their appreciation and delight. Frl. Ternina selected the two great Weber arias, "Ocean, Ungeheuer," from Oberon, and "Leise, Leise," from the Freischutz, for her solos, and her singing of both was beyond criticism, artistic and finished in every phrase. She more than fulfilled the high expectations aroused by the promise of her appearance.

The novelty, "Till Eulenspiegel's Lustige Streiche," belongs, as may be inferred from its title, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," distinctively to the humoreske type, although it is inscribed "in rondo form," but this is applicable only in its widest sense. It is program music based on an old German tale which belongs to the folklore of the nation, and "merry pranks" abound in the orchestral score, which is the most modern and highly colored of all this fin de siecle composer's works. He seems to have brought every possibility of the modern orchestra into play, and the result is a vivid tone-picture, so "lustig" that the hearers must smile perforce at its extravagancies. Richard Strauss, its composer, is in the very van of modern orchestral writers, and this latest composition out-herods Herod. The concert was brought to a close by a brilliant performance of the second Hungarian Rhapsody of Liszt, orchestrated by Muller-Berghaus. Mr. Paur has rarely conducted with more enthusiasm than he did last night, a fact which naturally contributed to the success of the concert. The next and final concert takes place Wednesday, March 25th.

News 2/19

Boston Symphony Concert.

An echo of the German opera season will be heard next Wednesday evening at Music Hall when Frl. Milka Ternina will appear as the soloist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its regular monthly concert. Frl. Ternina is a soprano of the Damrosch Opera Company. For the past seven years she has been the leading soprano at the opera house in Munich.

This is her first visit to this country. Frl Ternina's selctions at the coming concert will be an aria from "Oberon" and Agatha's prayer and aria from "Der Freischutz." She was not with the company in its recent Baltimore season, but has been singing with it in New York and otner cities.

Life 2/22

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT AT THE MUSIC HALL.—Again Baltimoreans will have an opportunity to enjoy something in the German opera line, this time it will be Frl. Milka Ternina, who will appear as the soloist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on next Wednesday evening, February 26, at 8.15, at the regular monthly concert of this brilliant musical organization. Frl Ternina is a soprano of the Damrosch Opera Company and for the past seven years has been the leading soprano at the opera house in Munich. This is her first visit to this country, not being with the Damrosch Opera Company when heard here in January, yet she is well and favorably known to a great many by reputation; for this reason alone she will be received, no doubt, with great favor and given a warm reception. Her selections for the coming concert will be an aria from "Oberon" and Agatha's prayer and aria from "Der Freischutz." She will be greatly augmented by the enlarged Symphony Orchestra in the rendition of her parts, in a way few can fail to appreciate and which so many of our music-lovers have learned to appreciate in the past. Tickets for sale at Albert's, 13 N. Charles street, and we suggest securing them early.

[99]

The Evening Post.

New York, Friday, Feb. 28, 1896.

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

Boston Musicians in New York.

To bring orchestral players to New York is like taking coal to Newcastle; at least New Yorkers seem to think so, for they do not patronize the Boston players as generously as the best home talent. Two concerts were given here yesterday, chiefly by Boston musicians, and neither attracted as large an audience as it might. In the afternoon a chamber concert was given at the Mendelssohn Glee Club Hall by Miss Szumowska and Messrs T. and J. Adamowski, and in the evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra played at the Metropolitan.

Miss Szumowska proved to be no less delightful as an ensemble player than as a soloist. The beauty of her tone and the genuine musicianly spirit of the interpretations have been repeatedly dwelt on in this column and need not be emphasized again. The Messrs. Adamowski also are well known here, and they performed their parts in the Grieg sonata and Brahms trio chosen most satisfactorily. At the second recital, on March 9, Miss Szumowska will play the piano part of a Beethoven violin sonata and a Schumann trio, besides some solos.

The present conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has acquired an astounding virtuosity in the art of making uninteresting programmes. Of his three principal numbers last evening—Zöllner's "Midnight at Sedan," Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," and Brahms's fourth symphony—any one would have been sufficient to leaven an ordinary entertainment with deadly dulness; to combine them in one programme was a procedure that sufficiently accounted for the small audience.

Zoellner's piece, which is designated an "orchestral fantasia," is the interlude between the first two acts of his opera "Bei Sedan." It is a typical piece of Kapellmeister-musik of the Wagnerian persuasion such as any conductor might write. Richard Strauss's piece is intended to be a musical counterpart of the practical jokes of Till Eulenspiegel, known to every German. It illustrates the composer's marvellous knowledge of all the secrets of orchestration, but is, like all his music, weak in invention. The jocular use of rattles and unusual combinations would have doubtless pleased Offenbach. Of Brahms's fourth symphony, which was played after Miss Blauvelt had charmingly sung arias by Haydn and Mozart, it may be said that it was, like the other pieces, very well played under Mr. Paur's direction. But we confess once more that, with the exception of the opening bars of the andante, it seems to us to be deadly dull music—not deep or mystic, but simply shallow, commonplace, and void of ideas. The last movement is marked Chaconne. If any one admires it, we can only say, "Chaconne á son gout."

The Brooklyn Citizen.

Nos. 397 to 403 FULTON ST.
Opposite the City Hall.

Receiving the Entire United Press Telegraphic Service.
Entered at the Brooklyn, N. Y., Post Office as second-class matter.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 29.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A highly appreciative audience welcomed the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last evening. There were not many vacant seats in the house when Emil Paur, the popular conductor, stepped to the front of the platform. The concert was given under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute and the Philharmonic Society.

Tschaikowsky's "Pathetique" symphony was the opening selection. From the first note the audience was under the spell of the maestro and his company of artists. The close of the first part gave opportunity for the mild expression of approval which the soft strains of the adagio in B minor had excited. The second part was received with a little more enthusiasm, while the third brought forth still stronger manifestations of commendation. It was not until the end of the piece, however, that the unreserved satisfaction of the audience was evinced by the hearty applause, which was followed by the low murmur of happy voices.

An air of expectancy pervaded the auditorium when Mme. Lillian Blauvelt appeared. She sang Mozart's aria from the "Marriage of Figaro." Her efforts were received with that appreciation they always command among lovers of vocal music. After the orchestra had played Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 2, Mr. Alwin Schroeder rendered a couple of violoncello solo selections, which captivated his audience.

Mme. Blauvelt also sang "With Verdure Clad," from "The Creation." In response to prolonged applause, she was forced to show herself four times, but she could not be induced to sing another note. The rule of "no encores" was strictly followed.

The concluding selection was Godard's orchestral suite, from "Jocelyn." The programme was one of the best the orchestra ever presented to a Brooklyn audience, and Mr. Paur has a warmer place than ever in the hearts of music lovers in this city.

The Independent, N. Y. C.

FEB 27 1896

Music.

BY H. EUGENE STEVENSON.

The present week is a concert week. Last week was—hardly anything. The halls of Carnegie and the Metropolitan seemed, as it were, the places for the bats and the owls (not 'owls) and dustcloths and solemn silence. The current seven days tells a cheerfuller tale with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the local Symphony Society, Mr. Rafael Joseffy's reappearance, and smaller musical entertainments quite in wonted plentifulness. Next week comes Mr. Damrosch's Wagnerian season at the Academy of Music, with Klafsky, with Ternina, with Gadsky, Gruening, with Alvary, with Popovici, with Fischer, in imposing procession.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert this evening will be its fourth one of this tenth year of New York visiting, and the Metropolitan will doubtless hold an interested audience in view of two novelties on the program, one might say three. For the Symphony, Brahms's Fourth, is with us his rarest heard one, and counts for much with lovers of Brahms's noble and austere muse. Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks"—a descriptive and humorous score, ostensibly in rondo form, will come as one new matter. The other will be Heinrich Zoellner's orchestral fantasia, also descriptive," and such to the degree of emotional-program music "Midnight at Sedan," being an intermezzo from Mr. Zoellner's military opera lately produced (in "recital") here. Mr. Franz Kneisel will be the one soloist, playing Viotti's Violin Concerto, No. 22, in A minor; and Mme. Lillian Blauvelt will be another, and will sing Haydn's "With Verdure Clad."

We have come to February's ultimate week; and therewith, on Friday afternoon (to-morrow), and on Saturday evening, our one local Symphony Orchestra, with Mr. Damrosch thrown in, returns unto its duty to Manhattan and Carnegie Hall. The program will offer the "Heroic" Symphony of Beethoven; Liszt's two-part symphonic poem, "The Lament and Triumph of Tasso," and Brahms's beautiful, most beautiful B flat Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra. Even were this bill of music less inviting, a large and tolerably excited audience could be predicted, for Mr. Joseffy's sake. No favorite of a day or a year has taken his place with us. He is still not outrivaled, however splendidly rivaled. His withdrawal from public work seems to have been only a recutement pour mieux sauter—with every essential element of a consummate virtuoso's art and power. In this expectation no one is likely to be disappointed.

Mr. Plunket Greene and Miss Marie Brema are announced for a joint song-recital next week (not this one, as earlier advertised), in the Mendelssohn Glee Club's Hall; similar to the delightful concerts that they arranged last spring. The program presents a scheme of lyrics in wide chronological range; old British popular airs, leading to songs by Purcell, Beethoven, Schubert, Schumann, Rubinstein, Henschel, Moszkofski and several contemporary song-composers. Somebody lately mentioned Miss Brema as considerably a pupil of Mr. Greene's instruction. In lieder singing a resemblance in vocal technic is obvious, tho the likeness does not extend into the operatic work of the rich-voiced contralto that Mr. Damrosch imported to us.

There will be much chamber-music, too, before the week ends. Miss Jessie Shay, one of the most interesting of our younger and native pianists, gives a recital on Monday night, the New York Trio Club playing at Chamber Music Hall (Carnegie) on Tuesday night. The chief matters will be Schubert's Trio, Opus 100, and the Opus 70, No. 1 of Beethoven.——This evening Mr. Louis Schmidt, the violinist, will give a concert in the same hall, assisted by Miss Lottie Mills, pianist, and Miss Marguerite Hall, mezzo-soprano. The instrumental pièce de resistance will be Edward Grieg's G minor Sonata; Miss Mills will play several pianoforte pieces of good and approved character, and Miss Hall will sing some of Schumann's songs and Bizet's exquisite "Farewell of the Arab Hostess"—that exquisite pendant to his "Djamileh."—— Yet another concert, sans orchestra, will be a recital by Mrs. Harcourt Bull, at the Waldorf Hotel, on Tuesday afternoon. The lady's program will be of variety, dignity and length, as follows: Sonata Tragica, McDowell; A Song without Words, Mendelssohn; Waltz from "Narcissus," Nevin; Barcarolle in A minor, Rubinstein; Sketch, Schluky; two Schumann numbers; three Chopin numbers; Liszt's Eighth Rhapsody.

Apropos of Mr. Damrosch's initial week, it is noticeable that its burden is not made oppressively Wagnerian at all. "Fidelio," "Lohengrin," "The Scarlet Letter" (Damrosch) and "Siegfried" constitute the bill. Of the casts, it may be said that on Monday's "Fidelio," Mrs. Klafsky makes her début; on Wednesday, Mrs. Ternina will be heard for the first time here as Elsa; with Mrs. Klafsky as Ortrud and Mr. Gruening as Lohengrin, and Mr. Popovici as Telramund. Mr. Damrosch's own work will enlist in the chief rôles Hester Prynne and Arthur Dimmesdale, Mrs. Gadski and Mr. Barron Berthaldi; and Saturday afternoon brings Mr. Alvary as Siegfried, Miss Ternina as Brünnhilde, Paul Lange as Mime and Mr. Stehmann as The Wanderer.

Inasmuch as the Bayreuth Festival of 1896 will concern itself only with the Nibelungen Cyclus, those German stages are somewhat put to it for material for their own fairly concurrent and model Wagnerian performances. In such connection, the indefatigable Munich Royal Opera has announced the immediate preparation of a "model performance" of Mozart's "Don Giovanni"—one to be as truly such as the famous "Wedding of Figaro," that is given in the repertory of Herr Possart's establishment. The work is to be produced in exact accordance with the original score used by the master himself (in the possession of Madame Viardoto Garcia), and divided into two acts as indicated by the librettist. In order to effect the scenic changes more rapidly, a revolving stage is being constructed, by means of which the changes will be carried out in a few seconds, before the eyes of the audience.

SATURDAY EVENING, FEB. 29, 1896.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night at the Academy was a delightful affair. To be sure the programme verged a bit on the "popular," and it was over at the end of two hours, but both these characteristics are virtues in the eyes of a Brooklyn Institute audience, and in fact of any right-minded individual not wedded to tradition. The most important number of the evening was, necessarily, the sixth Tschaikowsky symphony, that called the Pathetique. While not so strange, so fiery, so maddening a work as the Fifth, it yet is a charteristic expression of the Russian temperament, and exceedingly beautiful in its two adagios The one which closes the symphony, the Adagio Lamentoso, can hold its own with the funeral music of Chopin and Beethoven in its massive harmonies, its strong dramatic feeling, and its thrilling sadness. Mr. Paur has seldom conducted more satisfactorily than in this number, the interpretation of the serious passages displaying quite as fine an insight as the charming third movement, when the contrasting themes afford opportunity for much vivacious expression. It was bravely done, by leader as well as men, from the warm, strong coloring at the opening to the last pianissimo at the close. There were crescendo effects so well worked up that it is difficult to see how they could be improved upon, and it was not easy to explain, during the progress of this symphony, why we do not care much for Mr. Paur.

But it all came back to us when he and his noble band essayed the second Hungarian rhapsody. Before us was the finest orchestra in America, and yet Seidl, with an inferior instrument in every way, at Brighton Beach last summer, could make that rhapsody speak as Mr. Paur can never hope to. It was the performance of a doctrinaire, of a pedagogue, of a Sunday school teacher; it was correct enough, and well-ordered, but every bit of the madness, the diabolism, was squeezed out of it; the opening dragged, the tempo was too slow throughout, in fact and in those magnificently crazy passages, neither strings, wood wind nor brasses seemed to lose their heads, as by every right they ought to! The band recovered itself, however, in the suite from Godard's opera, "Jocelyn," which brought out some of Mr. Paur's better qualities as an interpreter, and closed the concert most gloriously amidst the delicious harmonies of the Carillon. What a superb orchestra is is to be sure, be the conductor who he may, and what a shame that such a little second-rate city as Boston owns it, while imperial New York is forced to submit practically to "scratch" companies, preoccupied and insufficiently rehearsed!

The soloists were Lillian Blauvelt and Alwin Schroeder. Mme. Blauvelt opened in "Voi, che sapete," from the "Marriage of Figaro," which she sang with her usual daintiness and charm, but it was in Haydn's great aria, "With Verdure Clad," that she made the most profound impression. It is an old favorite with this singer, and one in which her fresh, sweet, tender voice appears to decided advantage. Every note rang out clear and true; only one whose method is correct can so attack and sustain; while the cantabile passages were warm, fluent and lovely. It seems a pity that such a pretty woman and true artist should confine herself to the concert room, when opera is so often lumbered up with creatures, who sing false and weigh two hundred. What a charming Elsa or Mignon Mme. Blauvelt would make, and how we hope she may tend toward such a realization!

The violoncello playing of Mr. Schroeder, particularly in connection with the incomparable Kneisel Quartet, is well known. Last evening he spoke to the public through Dvorak's dreamy "Waldesruhe" and Klengel's "Capriccio." Both performances were excellent in a way, but not noticeable for special magnetism or meaning. His tone is smooth, ripe and true, but it is a trifle monotonous. He is a sincere and careful artist, but he appears to best advantage in ensemble playing.

A large audience listened attentively to the music, and applauded vigorously. The next concert will take place March 27.

Jewish Comment 2/22

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

On next Wednesday evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its regular monthly concert at the Music Hall. Frl. Ternina, soprano of the Damrosch Opera Company, will appear as the soloist. The following programme will be rendered: Tschaikowsky, Symphony No. 6, "Pathetic;" Weber, aria, "Oberon;" Liszt, Hungarian Rhapsody No. 2; Weber, aria, "Freischutz;" Strauss, "Till Eulenspiegels Lustige Streiche."

MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

TERNINA.

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

4th Concert, Wednesday Evening, February 26, at 8.

PROGRAMME:

Tschaikowsky, Symphony No. 6, "Pathetic"; Weber, aria, "Oberon"; Liszt, Hungarian Rhapsody No. 2; Weber, aria, "Freischutz"; Strauss, "Till Eulenspiegels Lustige Streiche."

Tickets now on sale at Albert's, 13 N. Charles street.

[100]

The Evening Post.
New York, Friday, Feb. 28, 1896.

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

Boston Musicians in New York.

To bring orchestral players to New York is like taking coal to Newcastle; at least New Yorkers seem to think so, for they do not patronize the Boston players as generously as the best home talent. Two concerts were given here yesterday, chiefly by Boston musicians, and neither attracted as large an audience as it might. In the afternoon a chamber concert was given at the Mendelssohn Glee Club Hall by Miss Szumowska and Messrs T. and J. Adamowski, and in the evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra played at the Metropolitan.

Miss Szumowska proved to be no less delightful as an ensemble player than as a soloist. The beauty of her tone and the genuine musicianly spirit of the interpretations have been repeatedly dwelt on in this column and need not be emphasized again. The Messrs. Adamowski also are well known here, and they performed their parts in the Grieg sonata and Brahms trio chosen most satisfactorily. At the second recital, on March 9, Miss Szumowska will play the piano part of a Beethoven violin sonata and a Schumann trio, besides some solos.

The present conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has acquired an astounding virtuosity in the art of making uninteresting programmes. Of his three principal numbers last evening—Zöllner's "Midnight at Sedan," Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," and Brahms's fourth symphony—any one would have been sufficient to leaven an ordinary entertainment with deadly dulness; to combine them in one programme was a procedure that sufficiently accounted for the small audience.

Zoellner's piece, which is designated an "orchestral fantasia," is the interlude between the first two acts of his opera "Bei Sedan." It is a typical piece of Kapellmeister-musik of the Wagnerian persuasion such as any conductor might write. Richard Strauss's piece is intended to be a musical counterpart of the practical jokes of Till Eulenspiegel, known to every German. It illustrates the composer's marvellous knowledge of all the secrets of orchestration, but is, like all his music, weak in invention. The jocular use of rattles and unusual combinations would have doubtless pleased Offenbach. Of Brahms's fourth symphony, which was played after Miss Blauvelt had charmingly sung arias by Haydn and Mozart, it may be said that it was, like the other pieces, very well played under Mr. Paur's direction. But we confess once more that, with the exception of the opening bars of the andante, it seems to us to be deadly dull music—not deep or mystic, but simply shallow, commonplace, and void of ideas. The last movement is marked Chaconne. If any one admires it, we can only say, "Chaconne à son gout."

The Brooklyn Citizen.
Nos. 397 to 403 FULTON ST.
Opposite the City Hall.
Receiving the Entire United Press Telegraphic Service.
Entered at the Brooklyn, N. Y., Post Office as second-class matter.
SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 29.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A highly appreciative audience welcomed the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last evening. There were not many vacant seats in the house when Emil Paur, the popular conductor, stepped to the front of the platform. The concert was given under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute and the Philharmonic Society.

Tschaikowsky's "Pathetique" symphony was the opening selection. From the first note the audience was under the spell of the maestro and his company of artists. The close of the first part gave opportunity for the mild expression of approval which the soft strains of the adagio in B minor had excited. The second part was received with a little more enthusiasm, while the third brought forth still stronger manifestations of commendation. It was not until the end of the piece, however, that the unreserved satisfaction of the audience was evinced by the hearty applause, which was followed by the low murmur of happy voices.

An air of expectancy pervaded the auditorium when Mme. Lilian Blauvelt appeared. She sang Mozart's aria from the "Marriage of Figaro." Her efforts were received with that appreciation they always command among lovers of vocal music. After the orchestra had played Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 2, Mr. Alwin Schroeder rendered a couple of violoncello solo selections, which captivated his audience.

Mme. Blauvelt also sang "With Verdure Clad," from "The Creation." In response to prolonged applause, she was forced to show herself four times, but she could not be induced to sing another note. The rule of "no encores" was strictly followed.

The concluding selection was Godard's orchestral suite, from "Jocelyn."

The programme was one of the best the orchestra ever presented to a Brooklyn audience, and Mr. Paur has a warmer place than ever in the hearts of music lovers in this city.

The Independent, N. Y. C.
FEB 27 189[illegible]

Music.

BY R. IRENÆUS STEVENSON.

THE present week is a concert week. Last week was hardly anything. The halls of Carnegie and the Metropolitan seemed, as it were, the places for the bats and the owls (not 'owls) and dustcloths and solemn silence. The current seven days tells a cheerfuller tale with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the local Symphony Society, Mr. Rafael Joseffy's reappearance, and smaller musical entertainments quite in wonted plentifulness. Next week comes Mr. Damrosch's Wagnerian season at the Academy of Music, with Klafsky, with Ternina, with Gadsky, Gruening, with Alvary, with Popovici, with Fischer, in imposing procession.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert this evening will be its fourth one of this tenth year of New York visiting, and the Metropolitan will doubtless hold an interested audience in view of two novelties on the program, one might say three. For the Symphony, Brahms's Fourth, is with us his rarest heard one, and counts for much with lovers of Brahms's noble and austere muse. Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks"—a descriptive and humorous score, ostensibly in rondo form, will come as one new matter. The other will be Heinrich Zoellner's orchestral fantasia, also descriptive, and such to the degree of emotional-program music "Midnight at Sedan," being an intermezzo from Mr. Zoellner's military opera lately produced (in "recital") here. Mr. Franz Kneisel will be the one soloist, playing Viotti's Violin Concerto, No. 22, in A minor; and Mme. Lillian Blauvelt will be another, and will sing Haydn's "With Verdure Clad."

We have come to February's ultimate week; and therewith, on Friday afternoon (to-morrow), and on Saturday evening, our one local Symphony Orchestra, with Mr. Damrosch thrown in, returns unto its duty to Manhattan and Carnegie Hall. The program will offer the "Heroic" Symphony of Beethoven; Liszt's two-part symphonic poem, "The Lament and Triumph of Tasso," and Brahms's beautiful, most beautiful B flat Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra. Even were this bill of music less inviting, a large and tolerably excited audience could be predicted, for Mr. Joseffy's sake. No favorite of a day or a year has taken his place with us. He is still not outrivaled, however splendidly rivaled. His withdrawal from public work seems to have been only a reculement pour mieux sauter—with every essential element of a consummate virtuoso's art and power. In this expectation no one is likely to be disappointed.

Mr. Plunket Greene and Miss Marie Brema are announced for a joint song-recital next week (not this one, as earlier advertised), in the Mendelssohn Glee Club's Hall; similar to the delightful concerts that they arranged last spring. The program presents a scheme of lyrics in wide chronological range; old British popular airs, leading to songs by Purcell, Beethoven, Schubert, Schumann, Rubinstein, Henschel, Mozkofski and several contemporary song-composers. Somebody lately mentioned Miss Brema as considerably a pupil of Mr. Greene's instruction. In lieder singing a resemblance in vocal technic is obvious, tho the likeness does not extend into the operatic work of the rich-voiced contralto that Mr. Damrosch imported to us.

There will be much chamber-music, too, before the week ends. Miss Jessie Shay, one of the most interesting of our younger and native pianists, gives a recital on Monday night, the New York Trio Club playing at Chamber Music Hall (Carnegie) on Tuesday night. The chief matters will be Schubert's Trio, Opus 100, and the Opus 70, No. 1 of Beethoven.——This evening Mr. Louis Schmidt, the violinist, will give a concert in the same hall, assisted by Miss Lottie Mills, pianist, and Miss Marguerite Hall, mezzo-soprano. The instrumental pièce de resistance will be Edward Grieg's G minor Sonata; Miss Mills will play several pianoforte pieces of good and approved character, and Miss Hall will sing some of Schumann's songs and Bizet's exquisite "Farewell of the Arab Hostess"—that exquisite pendant to his "Djamileh."—— Yet another concert, sans orchestra, will be a recital by Mrs. Harcourt Bull, at the Waldorf Hotel, on Tuesday afternoon. The lady's program will be of variety, dignity and length, as follows: Sonata Tragica, McDowell; a Song without Words, Mendelssohn; Waltz from "Narcissus," Nevin; Barcarolle in A minor, Rubinstein; Sketch, Schluky; two Schumann numbers; three Chopin numbers; Liszt's Eighth Rhapsody.

Apropos of Mr. Damrosch's initial week, it is noticeable that its burden is not made oppressively Wagnerian at all. "Fidelio," "Lohengrin," "The Scarlet Letter" (Damrosch) and "Siegfried" constitute the bill. Of the casts, it may be said that on Monday's "Fidelio," Mrs. Klafsky makes her début; on Wednesday, Mrs. Ternina will be heard for the first time here as Elsa; with Mrs. Klafsky as Ortrud and Mr. Gruening as Lohengrin, and Mr. Popovici as Telramund. Mr. Damrosch's own work will enlist in the chief rôles Hester Prynne and Arthur Dimmesdale, Mrs. Gadski and Mr. Barron Berthaldi; and Saturday afternoon brings Mr. Alvary as Siegfried, Miss Ternina as Brünnhilde, Paul Lange as Mime and Mr. Stehmann as The Wanderer.

Inasmuch as the Bayreuth Festival of 1896 will concern itself only with the Nibelungen Cyclus, those German stages are somewhat put to it for material for their own fairly concurrent and model Wagnerian performances. In such connection, the indefatigable Munich Royal Opera has announced the immediate preparation of a "model performance" of Mozart's "Don Giovanni"—one to be as truly such as the famous "Wedding of Figaro," that is given in the repertory of Herr Possart's establishment. The work is to be produced in exact accordance with the original score used by the master himself (in the possession of Madame Viardoto Garcia), and divided into two acts as indicated by the librettist. In order to effect the scenic changes more rapidly, a revolving stage is being constructed, by means of which the changes will be carried out in a few seconds, before the eyes of the audience.

THE STANDARD UNION.
SATURDAY EVENING, FEB. 29, 1896.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night at the Academy was a delightful affair. To be sure the programme verged a bit on the "popular," and it was over at the end of two hours, but both these characteristics are virtues in the eyes of a Brooklyn Institute audience, and in fact of any right-minded individual not wedded to tradition. The most important number of the evening was, necessarily, the sixth Tschaikowsky symphony, that called the Pathetique. While not so strange, so fiery, so maddening a work as the Fifth, it yet is a charteristic expression of the Russian temperament, and exceedingly beautiful in its two adagios The one which closes the symphony, the Adagio Lamentoso, can hold its own with the funeral music of Chopin and Beethoven in its massive harmonies, its strong dramatic feeling, and its thrilling sadness. Mr. Paur has seldom conducted more satisfactorily than in this number, the interpretation of the serious passages displaying quite as fine an insight as the charming third movement, when the contrasting themes afford opportunity for much vivacious expression. It was bravely done, by leader as well as men, from the warm, strong coloring at the opening to the last pianissimo at the close. There were crescendo effects so well worked up that it is difficult to see how they could be improved upon, and it was not easy to explain, during the progress of this symphony, why we do not care much for Mr. Paur.

But it all came back to us when he and his noble band essayed the second Hungarian rhapsody. Before us was the finest orchestra in America, and yet Seidl, with an inferior instrument in every way, at Brighton Beach last summer, could make that rhapsody speak as Mr. Paur can never hope to. It was the performance of a doctrinaire, of a pedagogue, of a Sunday school teacher; it was correct enough, and well-ordered, but every bit of the madness, the diabolism, was squeezed out of it; the opening dragged, the tempo was too slow throughout, in fact and in those magnificently crazy passages, neither strings, wood wind nor brasses seemed to lose their heads, as by every right they ought to! The band recovered itself, however, in the suite from Godard's opera, "Jocelyn," which brought out some of Mr. Paur's better qualities as an interpreter, and closed the concert most gloriously amidst the delicious harmonies of the Carillon. What a superb orchestra is is to be sure, be the conductor who he may, and what a shame that such a little second-rate city as Boston owns it, while imperial New York is forced to submit practically to "scratch" companies, preoccupied and insufficiently rehearsed!

The soloists were Lillian Blauvelt and Alwin Schroeder. Mme. Blauvelt opened in "Voi, che sapete," from the "Marriage of Figaro," which she sang with her usual daintiness and charm, but it was in Haydn's great aria, "With Verdure Clad," that she made the most profound impression. It is an old favorite with this singer, and one in which her fresh, sweet, tender voice appears to decided advantage. Every note rang out clear and true; only one whose method is correct can so attack and sustain; while the cantabile passages were warm, fluent and lovely. It seems a pity that such a pretty woman and true artist should confine herself to the concert room, when opera is so often lumbered up with creatures, who sing false and weigh two hundred. What a charming Elsa or Mignon Mme. Blauvelt would make, and how we hope she may tend toward such a realization!

The violoncello playing of Mr. Schroeder, particularly in connection with the incomparable Kneisel Quartet, is well known. Last evening he spoke to the public through Dvorak's dreamy "Waldesruhe" and Klengel's "Capriccio." Both performances were excellent in a way, but not noticeable for special magnetism or meaning. His tone is smooth, ripe and true, but it is a trifle monotonous. He is a sincere and careful artist, but he appears to best advantage in ensemble playing.

A large audience listened attentively to the music, and applauded vigorously. The next concert will take place March 27.

Jewish Comment 2/22

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

On next Wednesday evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its regular monthly concert at the Music Hall. Frl. Ternina, soprano of the Damrosch Opera Company, will appear as the soloist. The following programme will be rendered: Tschaikowsky, Symphony No. 6, "Pathetic;" Weber, aria, "Oberon;" Liszt, Hungarian Rhapsody No. 2; Weber, aria, "Freischutz;" Strauss, "Till Eulenspiegels Lustige Streiche."

MUSIC HALL.
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
TERNINA.
MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.
rth Concert, Wednesday Evening, February 26, at 8.
PROGRAMME:
schaikowsky, Symphony No. 6, "Pathetic"; Weber, aria, "Oberon"; Liszt, ngarian Rhapsody No. 2; Weber, aria, ieshutz"; Strauss, "Till Eulenspiegels tige Streiche."
ickets now on sale at Albert's, 13 N. rles street.

[100]

THE MAIL AND EXPRESS.
Broadway and Fulton St., New York.
FRIDAY EVENING, FEBRUARY 28, 1896.

IN THE WORLD OF MUSIC.

The Boston Symphony Concert Last Night—Two Recitals.

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night at the Metropolitan Opera House was decidedly weaker than any of the season thus far, the Brahms Symphony No. 4 in E minor, opus 98, saving it from being mediocre. The opening number, the excerpt from Herr Zoellner's "Bei Sedan," was, on the whole, interesting, though at times a little strained. The composer shows his sincerity, and the sympathetic quality of his work is noticeable. One of the two disappointments of the evening was the omission of the Viotti violin concerto, in which Mr. Kneisel was to have taken the solo part. It was announced that owing to a severe cold, from which he was just recovering, Mr. Kneisel would be unable to play. The Viotti work has not been heard here, and it doubtless would have been a novelty worth obtaining. In its place Mme. Lillian Blauvelt sang "Voi Che Sapete," from Mozart's "Nozze di Figaro," her programme number being "With Verdure Clad," from Haydn's "Seasons." She was in good voice, but there is a sameness about her performances that rather palls after many hearings.

The other novelty of the evening was Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," a sort of musical joke, Till Eulenspiegel being the hero of an old German tale and a player of tricks on the rest of humanity in general. The Strauss work, though confessedly an attempt at humor, is, on the whole, a preposterous achievement. There are some exquisite bits in it, but the orchestration is bizarre to the last degree, and the suddenness of the jolts from one mood to another becomes wearisome after a few minutes. The piece is much too long for a joke, and can be taken only with a solemn seriousness after it has begun to tire the attention. The addition and use of a watchman's rattle to the instruments of the orchestra, which the score calls for, is almost insulting.

After the lighter weight contributions of the first part of the concert, the great Brahms symphony came as a sort of panacea. Its noble thoughts and dignified yet quick and powerful ideas were wonderfully satisfying. The hoarse and raucous combination of the Strauss number were forgotten in the quiet potentiality and rich meaning of the Symphony. It was played with appreciation and feeling by Mr. Paur and his men, and the music seemed to take its proper rank in the minds of hearers. The second movement, andante moderato, in 6-8 time, was particularly fine, the clarionets, which Brahms is very fond of, doing notably good work.

THE MUSIC CENTRE.

THE Boston Budget recently published an editorial on "Music Centres," and said, curiously enough, that Paris was first as a music centre today. This sounds very funny. London, with its forty concerts a day during the season, is far in advance of Paris, and both cities rank below Berlin and New York as centres where the great works of modern composers may be heard. Paris has yet to hear Wagner—the Wagner of the Ring, Tristan und Isolde and Die Meistersinger. London still rebels against novelties and worships Händel and Mendelssohn. Paris is chauvinistic and London is hide bound. Not only has New York its great opera house, wherein the greatest singers alive may be heard—singers that Paris seldom enjoys, but we have, thanks to Mr. Damrosch, our Wagner season, and, thanks to Boston, one of the greatest orchestras in the world. To Boston we must concede superiority in this respect, and Paris or London has no such an orchestra. The Berlin and Vienna Philharmonic bands are the only organizations worthy of mention in the same breath with Boston's band. No, most decidedly Paris is not the real music centre. New York is far more alive musically.

CONCERT ROOM MUSIC.

Matinee Performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The fourth matinee given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last Saturday was one of the most brilliant and enjoyable concerts of the season. An admirable programme had been arranged, and such performances were given of the great "Leonora" and "Oberon" overtures as will long be remembered by those fortunate enough to hear them. Other notable features were the beautiful renderings of Liszt's "Symphonic Poem" of "Tasso" and the "Mignon" overture, played in honor of its lately-deceased composer. The soloists were Mr. Alwin Schroeder, who gave a most impressive demonstration of virtuosity as a 'cellist by his playing of the Klengel capriccio, and Miss Caroline Gardner Clarke, a soprano with a good method, but a somewhat strident voice.

The last evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place on March 23, and the last matinee on Saturday, March 28. Upon this occasion the Boston Symphony Orchestra will for the first time in this city actually play a Strauss waltz, probably the latest, "The Roses of the South."

North Am

Daily Evening News.
THURSDAY, MARCH 5.

THE SYMPHONY.

One of the Best Ever Heard in Fall River.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played, Wednesday evening, at the Academy, to the smallest audience that has ever attended one of its concerts in this city. The present season is the 15th of this great orchestra and the performance was its 1,376th. It was the 11th performance in Fall River.

Several years ago the orchestra came here twice in one season, and the average receipts for one of the concerts were no higher than the receipts from last night's concert. Prices of seats were lower than for last night, however, and the audiences were larger. The storm interfered to a considerable extent with the attendance, but the advance sale of seats was the lowest on record for a Symphony concert here. The attendance at this biggest musical event of the season here was added evidence that this is an off year for patronage of high class music in this city. Hardly a high class concert this year has paid expenses.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is said by musicians who can speak with authority to be the finest permanent orchestra in the world. It improves with every season. Mr. Emil Paur, the present conductor, has it in perfect control, and he plays these 70 musicians as confidently as he would the piano, and the result in time, precision and harmony is equally as perfect as the performance of a great artist on the piano is. Seventy-two or 73 musicians took part in the concert, a larger number than has usually come here.

As though to emphasize the lack of deserved patronage, the concert was probable the most enjoyable ever given here. The men seemed to be just in the best mood for playing, and the selections were played with a rare spirit and swing. Mr. Paur was in his usual good humor, and seemed to enjoy the concert as fully as his men and the audience did. Miss Caroline Gardner Clarke, the soloist, was at her best. Everything in the concert contributed to the pleasure of the audience, if the size of the audience did not make the evening a specially pleasant one for the management of the concert.

The audience was a very appreciative one. Two of the orchestra selections, the overture and the Hungarian Rhapsody from Liszt have been heard here before, the latter being familiar to all advanced students of the piano. Both are popular favorites, and they are of a character that cannot grow tiresome through repetition. The symphony was never heard here before in public and it thoroughly pleased everybody, something that cannot be said of all symphonies, for they are tiresome at times for nearly everybody except musically inclined people. The conductor was called upon to respond to several rounds of hearty applause after each number. Miss Clarke was called out four times after singing the aria, and Mr. Paur and the players joined in urging an encore, but she had three short songs later and shook her her head in response to the loud calls.

Mr. Emil Paur was warmly welcomed as he came out to take his place on the platform. The concert was begun very close to 8 o'clock, and people who were delayed by the storm and came in late had to wait in the rear till the first number was completed. It was the stirring overture from Wagner's "Rienzi," and it made a most excellent introduction for the fine program.

Miss Clarke sang the aria from Lachner's "Vineta." She has sung here twice before, both times in Music Hall, and people were delighted with the power and richness of her perfectly trained voice. She sang to better advantage, last evening, than at her previous appearances, for her voice is better fitted in volume for a big hall. She is an earnest and faithful worker, and is repaid for her work with a voice that constantly improves. This earnestness is always apparent in her singing. The sang the aria with full orchestra accompaniment. The selection is a difficult one, and from its length must be trying. The singer maintained an even strength and force to the close. As a reward she was called out four times.

Miss Clarke sang later three short songs, to piano accompaniment by Mr. Max Zach. Each of these songs was distinctly differently in character from the other two. The "Spirng Song" by Mackenzie was descriptive and rather enlivening. "Thy Beaming Eyes," by MacDowell, was tender. The expression in this song was the finest of the three. Only one stanza was sung, and the audience hardly realized that it was closed before the third song was taken up. This was Clara Kathleen Rogers' "The Answer." The applause was hearty for each song.

The symphony was "Pathetique," No. 6, in B minor, opus 74, by Tschainowsky. There was a peculiar interest attached to this symphony, as it was the last important work completed by this brilliant Russian compositor before he committed suicide. His works have recently come into prominence, and he died without realizing the great success that he had won. The last movement of this symphony, which he named adagio lamentoso, it is quite generally believed he wrote as a lament for his own death, which he had decided upon. It [illegible] commonly called

The other movements there is prominent the dance element that is so characteristic of Russian music. In the third movement, the allegro molto vivace the brass is very prominent, and the climax is reached in that movement. The fourth movement is properly called a lament, for through it all there runs a wailing of strings and muted horns, and an involuntary sadness or a sensation of creepiness is produced, according to the temperament of the listener. In the first movement there a beautiful strain is sustained by the strings.

The concluding number was Liszt's "Hungarian Rhapsody" No. 2. There is another sort of barbaric dance tune from that of the symphony in it, and it is full of life and contains odd and unexpected passages. The audience enjoyed hearing it once more sufficiently to remain and applaud for a minute or two.

THE
FALL RIVER DAILY HERALD.
MARCH 5, 1896.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Fair Sized Audience Heard the Celebrated Boston Orchestra in the Academy.

Last evening at the Academy of Music lovers of music, and especially those who like "something in C minor with a melancholy coloring," were given a rich musical treat. In plain prose, the Boston Symphony orchestra held forth, giving their annual concert. This was their eleventh appearance here.

Taking in account the miserable weather of last evening, the house was as large as could be expected, the floor being well filled. Still, the continuance of these concerts in the future is doubtful, from the fact that they deserve better patronage from a capricious public than they have received in the past two years.

The programme was most excellent; in fact, the best one we have had for a number of years. And we had a brand new work on the programme—the Tschaikowski Symphony Pathetique—a composition that surely is the sensation just now in musical circles. It is even whispered that Tschaikowski meant this particular work to be his own requiem, and after its completion deliberately committed suicide.

We know surely that it was his last work, and that he evidently took his own life, but as to the composition being his premeditated last word, must be taken with a grain of salt. I will allow that the music appeals to you more if you allow yourself to think of a person in the presence of death, and most certainly the last movement brings you there, if music can. The crash on the tam-tam, the uncanny wheeze of the stopped horn are simply devilish.

The direct contrast to this movement was the second, the Allegro Con Grazia. The rythm here is most peculiar of five counts to the measure, and yet it is as graceful as could be imagined and as sunny and cheerful as a well ordered kindergarten.

I have read of some critics who see in the third movement the wish of the composer to depict the vanities and frivolities of the world—sounding brass and tinkling symbol. Those who were at the concert can testify as to the sounding brass, for there was a lot of it.

Personally, I like the first movement the best. The pungent opening of the allegro is as characteristic as the "Knocking of Fate" in Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. The memory of the melody played by the violins and cellos will linger for many a day.

For a "house warmer" we had the "Rienzi" overture of Wagner. Here we see the Past Master in dissonances and and discords revelling in the kind of music that he afterwards repudiated, namely—the Italian operatic school. Most musicians recall the whirling violin figure that accompanies the chorus of pilgrimes in "Tannhauser." We have the same idea in this very overture in the accompaniment to Rienzi's prayer. The idea was not Wagner's, but Bellini's. The figure occurs in the last named composer's Opera "Norma." There are some splendid places for the brass choir, notably the battle cry of the populace.

The second portion of the overture, that begins with the chorus taken from the opera, announcing the freedom of the people, is as stirring and bombastic as one could wish.

We have heard Miss Caroline Gardner Clarke here before, but not to such advantage as last evening, for she sang splendidly a rather uninteresting aria by Lachner, and was recalled many times. Rather appropriately she sang a Spring song, the words telling us that half of March was now well over, but still the snow is on the ground, but—Spring is not dead. 'Twas truly kind on such a night.

The Rhapsody of Liszt suggests a funeral on election day. A period of sorrow, followed by great hilarity, followed by campaign music at the polls; in the evening, Roman candles, sky rockets and the lock-up.

The work of the orchestra needs no praise from a provincial paper. The standard set years ago is always maintained, as indeed it was last [illegible]

The Independent, N. Y. C.
MAR 6- 1896

Music.

The other orchestral concert of the week, that by the Boston Symphony band, drew an audience of good size to the Metropolitan Opera House on Thursday evening. The indisposition of Mr. Franz Kneisel made it necessary for Mr. Paur to alter the program announced; and Mme. Lillian Blauvelt sang not only Haydn's "With Verdure Clad," but Mozart's ever-lovely arietta "Voi che sapete," to atone for the Viotti violin-concerto which had to be dismissed. The great interest of the evening centered, however, on the performance of Brahms's profoundly beautiful Fourth Symphony; a score of exhaustless charm and interest and worthy to have its numerical place—worthy of, perhaps, being the last—in that wonderful series by the greatest symphonist since Beethoven, Schubert and Schumann. Mr. Paur directed it with care (if not with grace), and it was a sincere pleasure and privilege to study again the changeful, melodic loveliness, the varied emotional hintings and the steady course of orchestral ingenuity displayed by the Austro-Hungarian composer. In the present predicament of symphonic thought in Europe the old and rugged Brahms towers up as does Cologne's big church, seen from across the flat river-lands adjacent.

This week brings the (Damrosch) Wagner Opera Season at the Academy of Music, of which this department will speak next Thursday. Also occur the Philharmonic Society's fifth rehearsal and fifth concert, at which Mr. Achille Rivarde is to be the soloist. The full program will be Bach's Third Concerto for Strings; a concert overture "From the Scottish Highlands," by F. Lamond (new); Bruch's Second Concerto for Violin, and Schubert's C Major Ninth (or Tenth) Symphony. The pleasant Szumofska Adamofski recitals, two chamber-music concerts, respectively, of the Dannreuther Quartet and the Kneisel Quartet, also will contribute to the week's musical refreshment.

Messrs. Novello, Ewer & Co. have lately issued a reprint of a valuable musical curiosity—two of the famous "descriptive" Sonatas for the harpsichord entitled "Bible Stories," written by Johann Kuhnau, perhaps the most important German composer prior to Bach. They appeared in 1700, and have become rarissimi. As early "program-music," music in which the description of incidents and emotions is definitely attempted, they have more than merely an interest as effort. Kuhnau had a true musical sense, and knew how far even "program-music," especially for the harpsichord, could go and should go. Like Beethoven he believed in expression of the emotions accompanying a situation, rather than "realism" in portrayal. His music, as such, is dignified. The present examples are edited by Mr. J. S. Shedlock.

[101]

Fourth Boston Symphony Matinee.

There were but few more auditors in the Academy of Music seats at the fourth popular matinee of the Boston Symphony Concert yesterday afternoon than musicians on the stage itself. Even the strike week matinee brought out a larger audience. Why this should have been it is, indeed, inscrutable to perceive. A great deal of dissatisfaction has been felt among the truly musical patrons of the regular season over Herr Emil Paur's fantastic selections, but no such argument could have been urged against yesterday's programme, which included Beethoven's peerless "Leonore" Overture No. 3, the prelude to Wagner's "Lohengrin," the overture to Weber's "Oberon" and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso." There has been a peculiar difference of patronage, anyway, between the regular and the popular concerts. When is music worth hearing and when not? It seems to be a matter of mere fashion, after all. The few who did enjoy this latest treat were enthusiastically responsive to the magnificent rendition of the "Leonore" number and to the delightful string work on the developed theme of Haydn's "Variations on the Austrian National Hymn," and to the superb technique displayed once more by Violoncellist Alvin Schroeder in his solos—Dvorak's "Waldesruhe" and Klengel's Capriccio, Op. 8. The Dvorak piece was a gently descriptive forest hymn, but the capriccio served to reveal to the best the firm but flexible bowing and resource and finesse of shifts of Mr. Schroeder's art. His tonal effects were exquisite. An orchestral feature was the playing of the "Mignon" overture to the memory of the dead maestro, M. Ambroise Thomas. Miss Caroline Gardner Clarke was the soprano soloist.

Record

Academy of Music—Boston Symphony Orchestra.

For some mysterious reason the admirable popular concert given in the Academy Saturday afternoon, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, failed to draw a large audience. Why this was the case it would be hard to determine; the plain fact remains that the house did not reach the proportions commensurate with the excellence of the programme. And it was a programme, let it be added, which illustrated in a delightful way the artistic resources of the forces led by Mr. Paur. Nothing, for instance, could have been finer than the performance of the lovely "Leonore" overture, No. 3, of Beethoven, or, for the matter of that, of the various other orchestral examples, which included the fanciful "Oberon" overture of Weber, and the beautiful prelude to "Lohengrin." The execution of the whole list was, indeed, full of charm, and would call for more than passing mention were it not that to praise the work of the Boston Symphony musicians has become an act which resembles the traditional painting of the lily.

The soloists were Alwin Schroeder, the accomplished 'cellist (whose technique had remarkable exposition in a Capriccio by Klengel, op. 8), and Miss Caroline Gardner Clarke, soprano.

Public Ledger

THE MAIL AND EXPRESS,
Broadway and Fulton St., New York.

FRIDAY EVENING, FEBRUARY 28, 1896.

IN THE WORLD OF MUSIC.

The Boston Symphony Concert Last Night—Two Recitals.

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night at the Metropolitan Opera House was decidedly weaker than any of the season thus far, the Brahms Symphony No. 4 in E minor, opus 98, saving it from being mediocre. The opening number, the excerpt from Herr Zoellner's "Bei Sedan," was, on the whole, interesting, though at times a little strained. The composer shows his sincerity, and the sympathetic quality of his work is noticeable. One of the two disappointments of the evening was the omission of the Viotti violin concerto, in which Mr. Kneisel was to have taken the solo part. It was announced that owing to a severe cold, from which he was just recovering, Mr. Kneisel would be unable to play. The Viotti work has not been heard here, and it doubtless would have been a novelty worth obtaining. In its place Mme. Lillian Blauvelt sang "Voi Che Sapete," from Mozart's "Nozze di Figaro," her programme number being "With Verdure Clad," from Haydn's "Seasons." She was in good voice, but there is a sameness about her performances that rather palls after many hearings.

The other novelty of the evening was Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," a sort of musical joke, Till Eulenspiegel being the hero of an old German tale and a player of tricks on the rest of humanity in general. The Strauss work, though confessedly an attempt at humor, is, on the whole, a preposterous achievement. There are some exquisite bits in it, but the orchestration is bizarre to the last degree, and the suddenness of the jolts from one mood to another becomes wearisome after a few minutes. The piece is much too long for a joke, and can be taken only with a solemn seriousness after it has begun to tire the attention. The addition and use of a watchman's rattle to the instruments of the orchestra, which the score calls for, is almost insulting.

After the lighter weight contributions of the first part of the concert, the great Brahms symphony came as a sort of panacea. Its noble thoughts and dignified yet quick and powerful ideas were wonderfully satisfying. The hoarse and raucous combination of the Strauss number were forgotten in the quiet potentiality and rich meaning of the Symphony. It was played with appreciation and feeling by Mr. Paur and his men, and the music seemed to take its proper rank in the minds of hearers. The second movement, andante moderato, in 6-8 time, was particularly fine, the clarionets, which Brahms is very fond of, doing notably good work.

THE MUSIC CENTRE.

THE Boston Budget recently published an editorial on "Music Centres," and said, curiously enough, that Paris was first as a music centre today. This sounds very funny. London, with its forty concerts a day during the season, is far in advance of Paris, and both cities rank below Berlin and New York as centres where the great works of modern composers may be heard. Paris has yet to hear Wagner—the Wagner of the Ring, Tristan und Isolde and Die Meistersinger. London still rebels against novelties and worships Händel and Mendelssohn. Paris is chauvinistic and London is hide bound. Not only has New York its great opera house, wherein the greatest singers alive may be heard—singers that Paris seldom enjoys, but we have, thanks to Mr. Damrosch, our Wagner season, and, thanks to Boston, one of the greatest orchestras in the world. To Boston we must concede superiority in this respect, and Paris or London has no such an orchestra. The Berlin and Vienna Philharmonic bands are the only organizations worthy of mention in the same breath with Boston's band. No, most decidedly Paris is not the real music centre. New York is far more alive musically.

CONCERT ROOM MUSIC.

Matinee Performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The fourth matinee given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last Saturday was one of the most brilliant and enjoyable concerts of the season. An admirable programme had been arranged, and such performances were given of the great "Leonora" and "Oberon" overtures as will long be remembered by those fortunate enough to hear them. Other notable features were the beautiful renderings of Liszt's "Symphonic Poem" of "Tasso" and the "Mignon" overture, played in honor of its lately-deceased composer. The soloists were Mr. Alwin Schroeder, who gave a most impressive demonstration of virtuosity as a 'cellist by his playing of the Klengel capriccio, and Miss Caroline Gardner Clarke, a soprano with a good method, but a somewhat strident voice.

The last evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place on March 23, and the last matinee on Saturday, March 28. Upon this occasion the Boston Symphony Orchestra will for the first time in this city actually play a Strauss waltz, probably the latest, "The Roses of the South."

Daily Evening News.

THURSDAY, MARCH 5.

THE SYMPHONY.

One of the Best Ever Heard in Fall River.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played, Wednesday evening, at the Academy, to the smallest audience that has ever attended one of its concerts in this city. The present season is the 15th of this great orchestra and the performance was its 1,376th. It was the 11th performance in Fall River.

Several years ago the orchestra came here twice in one season, and the average receipts for one of the concerts were no higher than the receipts from last night's concert. Prices of seats were lower than for last night, however, and the audiences were larger. The storm interfered to a considerable extent with the attendance, but the advance sale of seats was the lowest on record for a Symphony concert here. The attendance at this biggest musical event of the season here was added evidence that this is an off year for patronage of high class music in this city. Hardly a high class concert this year has paid expenses.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is said by musicians who can speak with authority to be the finest permanent orchestra in the world. It improves with every season. Mr. Emil Paur, the present conductor, has it in perfect control, and he plays these 70 musicians as confidently as he would the piano, and the result in time, precision and harmony is equally as perfect as the performance of a great artist on the piano is. Seventy-two or 73 musicians took part in the concert, a larger number than has usually come here.

As though to emphasize the lack of deserved patronage, the concert was probable the most enjoyable ever given here. The men seemed to be just in the best mood for playing, and the selections were played with a rare spirit and swing. Mr. Paur was in his usual good humor, and seemed to enjoy the concert as fully as his men and the audience did. Miss Caroline Gardner Clarke, the soloist, was at her best. Everything in the concert contributed to the pleasure of the audience, if the size of the audience did not make the evening a specially pleasant one for the management of the concert.

The audience was a very appreciative one. Two of the orchestra selections, the overture and the Hungarian Rhapsody from Liszt have been heard here before, the latter being familiar to all advanced students of the piano. Both are popular favorites, and they are of a character that cannot grow tiresome through repetition. The symphony was never heard here before in public and it thoroughly pleased everybody, something that cannot be said of all symphonies, for they are tiresome at times for nearly everybody except musically inclined people. The conductor was called upon to respond to several rounds of hearty applause after each number. Miss Clarke was called out four times after singing the aria, and Mr. Paur and the players joined in urging an encore, but she had three short songs later and shook her her head in response to the loud calls.

Mr. Emil Paur was warmly welcomed as he came out to take his place on the platform. The concert was begun very close to 8 o'clock, and people who were delayed by the storm and came in late had to wait in the rear till the first number was completed. It was the stirring overture from Wagner's "Rienzi," and it made a most excellent introduction for the fine program.

Miss Clarke sang the aria from Lachner's "Vineta." She has sung here twice before, both times in Music Hall, and people were delighted with the power and richness of her perfectly trained voice. She sang to better advantage, last evening, than at her previous appearances, for her voice is better fitted in volume for a big hall. She is an earnest and faithful worker, and is repaid for her work with a voice that constantly improves. This earnestness is always apparent in her singing. The sang the aria with full orchestra accompaniment. The selection is a difficult one, and from its length must be trying. The singer maintained an even strength and force to the close. As a reward she was called out four times.

Miss Clarke sang later three short songs, to piano accompaniment by Mr. Max Zach. Each of these songs was distinctly differently in character from the other two. The "Spirng Song" by Mackenzie was descriptive and rather enlivening. "Thy Beaming Eyes," by MacDowell, was tender. The expression in this song was the finest of the three. Only one stanza was sung, and the audience hardly realized that it was closed before the third song was taken up. This was Clara Kathleen Rogers' "The Answer." The applause was hearty for each song.

The symphony was "Pathetique," No. 6, in B minor, opus 74, by Tschaikowsky. There was a peculiar interest attached to this symphony, as it was the last important work completed by this brilliant Russian compositor before he committed suicide. His works have recently come into prominence, and he died without realizing the great success that he had won. The last movement of this symphony, which he named adagio lamentoso, it is quite generally believed he wrote as a lament for his own death, which he had decided upon. It is commonly called the "Pathetique." There are four movements, every one of them long, but in the first three there is a stirring quality that prevents any possibility of their being tiresome. In these movements there is prominent the dance element that is so characteristic of Russian music. In the third movement, the allegro molto vivace the brass is very prominent, and the climax is reached in that movement. The fourth movement is properly called a lament, for through it all there runs a wailing of strings and muted horns, and an involuntary sadness or a sensation of creepiness is produced, according to the temperament of the listener. In the first movement there a beautiful strain is sustained by the strings.

The concluding number was Liszt's "Hungarian Rhapsody" No. 2. There is another sort of barbaric dance tune from that of the symphony in it, and it is full of life and contains odd and unexpected passages. The audience enjoyed hearing it once more sufficiently to remain and applaud for a minute or two.

THE
FALL RIVER DAILY HERALD,
MARCH 5, 1896.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Fair Sized Audience Heard the Celebrated Boston Orchestra in the Academy.

Last evening at the Academy of Music lovers of music, and especially those who like "something in C minor with a melancholy coloring," were given a rich musical treat. In plain prose, the Boston Symphony orchestra held forth, giving their annual concert. This was their eleventh appearance here.

Taking in account the miserable weather of last evening, the house was as large as could be expected, the floor being well filled. Still, the continuance of these concerts in the future is doubtful, from the fact that they deserve better patronage from a capricious public than they have received in the past two years.

The programme was most excellent; in fact, the best one we have had for a number of years. And we had a brand new work on the programme—the Tschaikowski Symphony Pathetique—a composition that surely is the sensation just now in musical circles. It is even whispered that Tschaikowski meant this particular work to be his own requiem, and after its completion deliberately committed suicide.

We know surely that it was his last work, and that he evidently took his own life, but as to the composition being his premeditated last word, must be taken with a grain of salt. I will allow that the music appeals to you more if you allow yourself to think of a person in the presence of death, and most certainly the last movement brings you there, if music can. The crash on the tam-tam, the uncanny wheeze of the stopped horn are simply devilish.

The direct contrast to this movement was the second, the Allegro Con Grazia. The rythm here is most peculiar of five counts to the measure, and yet it is as graceful as could be imagined and as sunny and cheerful as a well ordered kindergarten.

I have read of some critics who see in the third movement the wish of the composer to depict the vanities and frivolities of the world—sounding brass and tinkling symbol. Those who were at the concert can testify as to the sounding brass, for there was a lot of it.

Personally, I like the first movement the best. The pungent opening of the allegro is as characteristic as the "Knocking of Fate" in Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. The memory of the melody played by the violins and cellos will linger for many a day.

For a "house warmer" we had the "Rienzi" overture of Wagner. Here we see the Past Master in dissonances and and discords revelling in the kind of music that he afterwards repudiated, namely—the Italian operatic school. Most musicians recall the whirling violin figure that accompanies the chorus of pilgrimes in "Tannhauser." We have the same idea in this very overture in the accompaniment to Rienzi's prayer. The idea was not Wagner's, but Bellini's. The figure occurs in the last named composer's Opera "Norma." There are some splendid places for the brass choir, notably the battle cry of the populace.

The second portion of the overture, that begins with the chorus taken from the opera, announcing the freedom of the people, is as stirring and bombastic as one could wish.

We have heard Miss Caroline Gardner Clarke here before, but not to such advantage as last evening, for she sang splendidly a rather uninteresting aria by Lachner, and was recalled many times. Rather appropriately she sang a Spring song, the words telling us that half of March was now well over, but still the snow is on the ground, but —Spring is not dead. 'Twas truly kind on such a night.

The Rhapsody of Liszt suggests a funeral on election day. A period of sorrow, followed by great hilarity, followed by campaign music at the polls; in the evening, Roman candles, sky rockets and the lock-up.

The work of the orchestra needs no praise from a provincial paper. The standard set years ago is always maintained, as indeed it was last evening.

JAMES D. D. COMEY.

The Independent, N. Y. C.

MAR 6- 1896

Music.

The other orchestral concert of the week, that by the Boston Symphony band, drew an audience of good size to the Metropolitan Opera House on Thursday evening. The indisposition of Mr. Franz Kneisel made it necessary for Mr. Paur to alter the program announced; and Mme. Lillian Blauvelt sang not only Haydn's "With Verdure Clad," but Mozart's ever-lovely arietta "Voi che sapete," to atone for the Viotti violin-concerto which had to be dismissed. The great interest of the evening centered, however, on the performance of Brahms's profoundly beautiful Fourth Symphony; a score of exhaustless charm and interest and worthy to have its numerical place—worthy of, perhaps, being the last—in that wonderful series by the greatest symphonist since Beethoven, Schubert and Schumann. Mr. Paur directed it with care (if not with grace), and it was a sincere pleasure and privilege to study again the changeful, melodic loveliness, the varied emotional hintings and the steady course of orchestral ingenuity displayed by the Austro-Hungarian composer. In the present predicament of symphonic thought in Europe the old and rugged Brahms towers up as does Cologne's big church, seen from across the flat river-lands adjacent.

This week brings the (Damrosch) Wagner Opera Season at the Academy of Music, of which this department will speak next Thursday. Also occur the Philharmonic Society's fifth rehearsal and fifth concert, at which Mr. Achille Rivarde is to be the soloist. The full program will be Bach's Third Concerto for Strings; a concert overture "From the Scottish Highlands," by F. Lamond (new); Bruch's Second Concerto for Violin, and Schubert's C Major Ninth (or Tenth) Symphony. The pleasant Szumofska Adamofski recitals, two chamber-music concerts, respectively, of the Dannreuther Quartet and the Kneisel Quartet, also will contribute to the week's musical refreshment.

Messrs. Novello, Ewer & Co. have lately issued a reprint of a valuable musical curiosity—two of the famous "descriptive" Sonatas for the harpsichord entitled "Bible Stories," written by Johann Kuhnau, perhaps the most important German composer prior to Bach. They appeared in 1700, and have become rarissimi. As early "program-music," music in which the description of incidents and emotions is definitely attempted, they have more than merely an interest as effort. Kuhnau had a true musical sense, and knew how far even "program-music," especially for the harpsichord, could go and should go. Like Beethoven he believed in expression of the emotions accompanying a situation, rather than "realism" in portrayal. His music, as such, is dignified. The present examples are edited by Mr. J. S. Shedlock.

Fourth Boston Symphony Matinee.

There were but few more auditors in the Academy of Music seats at the fourth popular matinee of the Boston Symphony Concert yesterday afternoon than musicians on the stage itself. Even the strike week matinee brought out a larger audience. Why this should have been it is, indeed, inscrutable to perceive. A great deal of dissatisfaction has been felt among the truly musical patrons of the regular season over Herr Emil Paur's fantastic selections, but no such argument could have been urged against yesterday's programme, which included Beethoven's peerless "Leonore" Overture No. 3, the prelude to Wagner's "Lohengrin," the overture to Weber's "Oberon" and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso." There has been a peculiar difference of patronage, anyway, between the regular and the popular concerts. When is music worth hearing and when not? It seems to be a matter of mere fashion, after all. The few who did enjoy this latest treat were enthusiastically responsive to the magnificent redition of the "Leonore" number and to the delightful string work on the developed theme of Haydn's "Variations on the Austrian National Hymn," and to the superb technique displayed once more by Violoncellist Alvin Schroeder in his solos—Dvorak's "Waldesruhe" and Klengel's Capriccio, Op. 8. The Dvorak piece was a gently descriptive forest hymn, but the capriccio served to reveal to the best the firm but flexible bowing and resource and finesse of shifts of Mr. Schroeder's art. His tonal effects were exquisite. An orchestral feature was the playing of the "Mignon" overture to the memory of the dead maestro, M. Ambroise Thomas. Miss Caroline Gardner Clarke was the soprano soloist.

Record

Academy of Music—Boston Symphony Orchestra.

For some mysterious reason the admirable popular concert given in the Academy Saturday afternoon, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, failed to draw a large audience. Why this was the case it would be hard to determine; the plain fact remains that the house did not reach the proportions commensurate with the excellence of the programme. And it was a programme, let it be added, which illustrated in a delightful way the artistic resources of the forces led by Mr. Paur. Nothing, for instance, could have been finer than the performance of the lovely "Leonore" overture, No. 3, of Beethoven, or, for the matter of that, of the various other orchestral examples, which included the fanciful "Oberon" overture of Weber, and the beautiful prelude to "Lohengrin." The execution of the whole list was, indeed, full of charm, and would call for more than passing mention were it not that to praise the work of the Boston Symphony musicians has become an act which resembles the traditional painting of the lily.

The soloists were Alwin Schroeder, the accomplished 'cellist (whose technique had remarkable exposition in a Capriccio by Klengel, op. 8), and Miss Caroline Gardner Clarke, soprano.

Public Ledger

[101]

SUNDAY, MARCH 8, 1896.

Seventeenth Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—New Suite of Foote—Mr. Schulz the Soloist.

The program of the Symphony concert last evening in Music Hall, Mr. Emil Paur, conductor, was as follows:

Suite in D minor, op. 36.....Foote
1. Allegro energico.
2. Espressivo, non troppo Adagio.
3. Tema con Variazioni: Andante espressivo, con moto.
4. Presto assai.
(First time.)
Concerto for Violoncello, A minor, op. 129 .....Schumann
Symphony in G minor.....Mozart

Mr. Foote's suite shows a gain in facility of expression. Whether that which he has to express is worth saying is another matter.

The first movement, in themes and treatment of them, is for the most part in the spirit of Mendelssohn. The fortissimo passages are inclined to be noisy rather than full and sonorous. The brass crackles and bursts; there is occasional blatancy. The second movement opens very agreeably and promises pleasure. This promise is not fulfilled. The composer wanders aimlessly and picks his thoughts apparently at random. The movement is by far the feeblest one of the suit. In the Theme with variations Mr. Foote shows in certain ways a decided advance. The variations are not of equal worth; nevertheless, the composer's hand is freer; his rhythms are not so rigid; the instrumentation is richer and more authoritative. The second and the fourth of these variations at once arrest attention. And yet in nearly all the variations there is the suggestion that the composer did not think each one out as a distinct and organic whole. There will be, for instance, an almost stern contrapuntal beginning, and then an incongruous romantic episode will enter, like sweetmeats with dry meat in one course at a German dinner. The finale seems to me an unsuccessful attempt to combine dry scholarship and the glowing cantabile of—say Massenet.

Now, in this suite I hear no genuine, unmistakable, individual voice. As the music is played, thoughts of several composers arise. I do not say the music is borrowed or even distinctly reminiscent. But there is no voice that belongs alone to Foote. This is no disgrace to the industrious composer. Little music is written today for orchestra that has pronounced individuality. When you hear a large work of Brahms you know it is by Brahms. When you hear a large work by MacDowell, you know that MacDowell wrote it. Mr. Chadwick has this individual touch. So has Ethelbert Nevin in a song.

Certainly Mr. Foote writes with a freer hand. And it all comes back to this statement. Industry must nearly always bring facility. Facility, however, is not synonymous with spontaneity, or strength, or beauty, or individuality. The suite was loudly welcomed.

* * *

Mr. Schulz played with his customary care, intelligence, and musical taste the 'cello concerto of Schumann. His choice was not to be applauded, however richly the performance deserved the hearty applause which it received. This concerto does not put in clear light the artistry of a virtuoso, and, with the exception of the slow movement, it is of little musical beauty. Indeed, it is one of Schumann's driest and dullest works, and if it did not bear the name of Schumann, I doubt if it would ever be heard in a concert room. The slow movement is of mysterious charm; but the rest of the work is an exhibition of the restless Schumann of the last period, groping after strange rhythms and progressions, searching vainly for that "one tone" heard by him in his dismal madness.

A discreet performance of the G minor Symphony of Mozart ended the concert of reasonable length. Some of the ultra-moderns sneer at the 18th century "passion" of this symphony, and an eminent critic in New York said not long ago that its interest is only historical. Yes, its passion is under firm control. The work is like a classic frieze. The symphony is beautiful for its calmness, its sureness, its pure elegance of expression. But we belong to a far different generation, and I confess I would not exchange the last movement of Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony for all the symphonies of Mozart and Haydn together. We sometimes forget that if Mozart and Haydn had lived today they would not be classics. That their works still charm is a proof of their genius; it is not due to the fact that they lived in "better, healthier" days.

* * *

Mr. Edward M. Heindl, a second flute player of the Symphony Orchestra, a musician known and respected by all concert-goers of this city, died last Friday morning, 58 years old. His career in this city was long and honorable. When chamber music was little cultivated, even in large towns, his face was familiar to all who enjoyed the concerts of the Mendelssohn Quintet. He was the first flute player of the Symphony Orchestra when it was founded, and he remained in this position until the arrival of Mr. Molé. As artist and as man he was held in loving esteem by his associates and troops of friends. The funeral exercises will be held at his house this afternoon at half past 2.

PHILIP HALE.

Gazette
SUNDAY MORNING EDITION.

BOSTON, MARCH 8 1896.

The Symphony Concert.

Last night the Symphony Orchestra gave its seventeenth concert, with the following programme:

Suite, D minor, op. 36.....Arthur Foote
Concerto for violoncello, A minor.....Schumann
Mr. Leo Schulz.
Symphony, G minor.....Mozart

As will be seen, the suite by Mr. Arthur Foote was the one novelty on the list, and the work is most creditable to its composer. It is demonstrably the result of hard work, patience and knowledge, and technically it will win the approval of musicians. Inspiration or spontaneity are no longer expected in orchestral work. If the young composer writes correctly; if he has a fair knowledge of orchestral effects, it is no longer demanded that his work shall be born of the fulness of ideas. Tone color and odd and unexpected harmonies are everything; dignity or importance of ideas nothing. If monotony is the result of faulty theory, we excuse it by calling it erudition, and feel remorse for the yawns with which nature punishes us for being so intensely modern.

The Suite is the work of a man of talent; it has nothing new to say, but it says old things with suavity and with irreproachable good manners. It is work manufactured in the best manner, and on an approved and fashionable model. It need not be ashamed of going into good society, or of receiving the deserved approval of well bred people. Our era is characterized by the absence of genius, and so talent of all kinds has the opportunity to distinguish itself. We do not expect passion, pathos, tenderness, or any emotion whatever in our works of art; but we do inlist that correctness and oddity shall supply the place of thought and feeling. Mr. Foote is a modern and he fully understands what modern art-lovers expect; he pleases without exciting us, he puts no strain on the heart, head or memory. We listen to him with respect, part with him in the friendliest manner and then put on our hats and overcoats and talk about the weather or of the next epidemic of influenza. Genius is more uncomfortable and less courteous; it forces itself on the memory and makes us feel our own bitterness; it warms our blood, thrills our nerves and brings the tears to our eyes, and makes us ashamed of facing our friends. Mr. Foote's suite never adds to the number of our heart beats; it is irreproachable in this as in other things. One can even write of it without vulgar enthusiasm and placidly look forward to the time when Mr. Foote will honor us and himself by producing another suite, concerto or symphony, for to the modern composer, the difference in art forms is simply a question of time and labor, and not of degree and inspiration. It deserves to be added that Mr. Foote's suite belongs to the better class of academic music; it is dignified and effective work. The third movement is most ingeniously developed and worked out in its seven variations, and the last movement is impressive and fiery. The work aroused much enthusiasm, and at its conclusion, Mr. Foote was called out to bow his thanks.

Mr. Schulz was a most sympathetic as well as skilful interpreter of the Schumann concerto, and the Mozart symphony was brilliantly read by Mr. Paur and his orchestra.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 8, 1896.
(Copyrighted by Post Publishing Company.)

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

After a lapse of two weeks the Symphony concerts were resumed last night, the seventeenth being especially notable because of the first hearing of a suite by a local composer, Mr. Arthur Foote.

The suite in D minor was placed on the programme, and of the several things which Mr. Foote has written this is the most musical and ambitious. It is in four movements, each distinct in itself, and although some of the themes are rather reminiscent, it must be conceded that much originality has been displayed in their development. The first movement is written freely and boldly, and other than mildly suggesting what is to follow, is perhaps the least interesting of the four movements. The second, however, is very expressive and introduces several pretty figures. The third movement is broken into a number of short passages, each of which is quaintly conceived. It is the least serious of the movements, and is in fact of a light, playful order. It is in the fourth movement in which the genuine originality of the composer is seen at its best, for although comparatively short, the movement is exceedingly brilliant, his masterly handling of tone colors producing some picturesque effects. The suite was beautifully played, and at its conclusion Mr. Foote acknowledged the long-continued applause from his seat in the balcony.

Schumann's 'cello concerto in A minor was the next number, introducing Mr. Leo Schulz of the orchestra. Mr. Schulz has not been heard as a soloist at these concerts for some time, and it was apparent that in the interim he has made much progress as a solo player. He plays with a firm touch, and his tone is clear, full and rich. In the Schumann concerto he was particularly at home, and gave the number (which is a particularly difficult undertaking, as all the four movements are enchained together) in a beautiful manner, carefully bringing out its many beauties.

The Mozart symphony in G minor followed, and to enter into detail as to its performance would only be to again chronicle the masterly manner in which all the symphonies are being read this season by Mr. Paur.

At the concert next week a new symphony will be played, "Anthar," by Balakirew, and the soloist will be Miss Antoinette Szumowska, who will play Saint-Saens's pianoforte concerto in G minor.

SUNDAY [illegible]
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCIX., NO. 68.

SUNDAY, MARCH 8, 1896.

LEO SCHULZ'S FINE PLAYING.

Recalls Splendidly Earned at the Symphony Concert.

The Soloist Gives a Thorough Exemplification of His Artistic Worth—Unfading Mozart Symphony Delightfully Played by the Orchestra—New Foote Suite.

The programme for last night's concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall was:

Suite in D minor, op. 36.....A. Foote
Concerto for 'cello, op. 129.....Schumann
Symphony, G minor.....Mozart

The soloist was Mr. Leo Schulz.

Mr. Foote's Suite was new. It is not as labored and academic as his more ambitious works have been hitherto, and suggests the effect of greater ease and spontaneity in invention. There is also greater ease in the orchestration, which is always graceful and clear, and often piquantly dainty. There is nothing vague in the Suite from beginning to end, and it is wholly lacking in the extravagances of the modern school. In fact, it might be characterized as something between Brahms made somewhat antique and Gade modernized. It is chastely melodious, the ideas are always refined, and the work is put together with irreproachable neatness. If such an expression may be permitted, it is well-groomed music. Nothing is out of place. The adagio has a charming leading theme, and it is interestingly and effectively scored. The third movement is a theme with variations, and these latter are skilfully contrasted, notably tasteful in their instrumentation and scholarly in their contrapuntal devices. The finale is spirited, well marked in its themes, and also clever contrapuntally. The workmanship is of the highest finish throughout. And yet the work seemed lacking in individual character and in originality; not that there is a trace of plagiarism in it, but that it says nothing that has not been said before in exactly the same way, and that its style constantly reflects that of other composers, notably Mendelssohn and Gade, admirable models unquestionably, in their clearness and their classical purity of taste, but dangerous, by reason of their strong mannerisms to the composer who studies them too closely and too confidingly. The work, however, is pleasing as an evidence of Mr. Foote's increased mastery over the technical resources of his art, in its steadily sustained melodiousness, and in its avoidance of the ugliness, the hysteria, the noise and blatant unmeaning that mark so much of the music of the time. It was read and played with great care, and was listened to with manifest interest, and when it was over the applause was very cordial, and did not cease until the composer had bowed his acknowledgments from the balcony.

The Schumann concerto is not often heard. With the exception of the beautiful but brief slow movement it is not an effective work, and has many tiresome movements, especially in the long-drawn-out opening movement. It is not felicitous writing for the solo instrument, inasmuch as it fails to bring out its most characteristic qualities, and has too little of the broad singing phrases that suit it so well. Mr. Schulz's playing was masterly in its easy freedom, its exquisitely refined tastefulness, the perfection of its intonation, its purity of style, the certainty and the brilliancy of its technique. He has never been heard here when he gave so thorough an exemplification of his artistic worth; the applause and the two imperative recalls that rewarded him were splendidly earned.

The unfading Mozart symphony which still remains, through all the revolutionary mutations that musical art has experienced since it was written, a work that can still be listened to with wonder and admiration, was perfectly read and delightfully played. Mr. Paur is always at his happiest when interpreting Mozart and Haydn.

There was sadness in seeing a new player at the stand of the second flute, which was rendered necessary by the death of Mr. E. M. Heindl, who had been a member of the orchestra from its foundation, and who had filled the position of principal flautist until he was replaced by Mr. Mole under the regime of Mr. Gericke. He was an excellent artist and an exemplary man.

The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Melpomene," Chadwick; concerto for pianoforte in G-minor, Saint-Saens; symphony, "Anthar," Balakirew (first time); Academic overture, Brahms. The soloist will be Miss Antoinette Szumowska.

SUNDAY, MARCH 8, 1896.

Mr Foote's New Work Played at Symphony Concert.

The program for last week's symphony comprised a suite in D minor by Mr Arthur Foote, played for the first time; Schumann's cello concerto in A minor and Mozart's symphony in G minor. Mr Leo Schulz was the soloist. Mr Foote's rank as a composer has long since been firmly established by many works which evinced musicianly attainments of a high grade and his latest contribution to the concert world accentuates his right to the position already accredited him by competent judges and critics of the higher art of composition. His understanding of the resources of the orchestra is marked and his combinations, lights and shades are effective and skilfully scored. The theme of the first movement in the suite was strongly developed and the contrasted second, given to the horns and woodwinds, was boldly treated and with some originality of instrumentation. The closing coda was quite elaborately scored and a brilliant interpretation was given by the orchestra.

The long crescendo in the second movement, admirably written, leads up to some odd passages by the brasses, and thence to a "musical conversation" by the 'celli and horns. The latter portion is capitally wrought out, and by introducing a background of violins and woodwinds, Mr Foote has produced a most charming effect. The melody, finally given to the violins, is free, although strong in character and precedes the closing coda. The work of the orchestra, especially in the music dialogue, was most commendable, each contingent playing with wonderful precision.

In the third movement Mr Foote has introduced seven variations on a simple theme. There is no similarity in the various movements, and each contrast is treated elaborately. The pizzicato variation was notably delicate and elicited applause which interrupted the playing of the orchestra. The last movement is of a sterner nature, two themes forming the base of the work. The composition is very interesting, and the large audience received it with many manifestations of pleasure, calling the popular composer to the platform at the close of the number.

Mr Leo Schulz played the difficult Schumann concerto brilliantly. This well-known cellist has a beautiful tone production, his instrument in the higher register resembling a viola and at times a violin in purity. The romanza in the second part was magnificently "sung," and the rapid passage work in the third movement was notably smooth and true in tone. His chords, double and triple, were admirable in blending, and his whole work is entitled to warm commendation. Save a little harshness in the bass notes, Mr Schulz's tones were very sweet.

The orchestra interpreted the Mozart symphony with the usual excellent effect. Perhaps the fantasia, with the modulations in the opening movement, the quavering figures in the second and the rushing passages of the fourth call for special comment, but where all was so well performed general encomiums should suffice. The recent indorsements of New York critics, who place Mr Paur's orchestra at the head of American organizations, and possibly the best in the world, may have had an inspiring influence on the men, for their work last week seemed to be as near perfection as one could reasonably wish for.

At the concerts this week Miss Antoinette Szumowska will be the soloist. The program will be as follows: "Melpomene" overture, Chadwick; concerto for pianoforte in G minor, Saint-Saens; symphony, "Anthar," Balakirew (first time); Academic overture, Brahms.

[102]

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, MARCH 8, 1896.

Seventeenth Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—New Suite of Foote—Mr. Schulz the Soloist.

The program of the Symphony concert last evening in Music Hall, Mr. Emil Paur, conductor, was as follows:

Suite in D minor, op. 36.....Foote
1. Allegro energico.
2. Espressivo, non troppo Adagio.
3. Tema con Variazioni: Andante espressivo, con moto.
4. Presto assai.
(First time.)
Concerto for Violoncello, A minor, op. 129 ..... Schumann
Symphony in G minor.....Mozart

Mr. Foote's suite shows a gain in facility of expression. Whether that which he has to express is worth saying is another matter.

The first movement, in themes and treatment of them, is for the most part in the spirit of Mendelssohn. The fortissimo passages are inclined to be noisy rather than full and sonorous. The brass crackles and bursts; there is occasional blatancy. The second movement opens very agreeably and promises pleasure. This promise is not fulfilled. The composer wanders aimlessly and picks his thoughts apparently at random. The movement is by far the feeblest one of the suit. In the Theme with variations Mr. Foote shows in certain ways a decided advance. The variations are not of equal worth; nevertheless, the composer's hand is freer; his rhythms are not so rigid; the instrumentation is richer and more authoritative. The second and the fourth of these variations at once arrest attention. And yet in nearly all the variations there is the suggestion that the composer did not think each one out as a distinct and organic whole. There will be, for instance, an almost stern contrapuntal beginning, and then an incongruous romantic episode will enter, like sweetmeats with dry meat in one course at a German dinner. The finale seems to me an unsuccessful attempt to combine dry scholarship and the glowing cantabile of—say Massenet.

Now, in this suite I hear no genuine, unmistakable, individual voice. As the music is played, thoughts of several composers arise. I do not say the music is borrowed or even distinctly reminiscent. But there is no voice that belongs alone to Foote. This is no disgrace to the industrious composer. Little music is written today for orchestra that has pronounced individuality. When you hear a large work of Brahms you know it is by Brahms. When you hear a large work by MacDowell, you know that MacDowell wrote it. Mr. Chadwick has this individual touch. So has Ethelbert Nevin in a song.

Certainly Mr. Foote writes with a freer hand. And it all comes back to this statement. Industry must nearly always bring facility. Facility, however, is not synonymous with spontaneity, or strength, or beauty, or individuality. The suite was loudly welcomed.

* * *

Mr. Schulz played with his customary care, intelligence, and musical taste the 'cello concerto of Schumann. His choice was not to be applauded, however richly the performance deserved the hearty applause which it received. This concerto does not put in clear light the artistry of a virtuoso, and, with the exception of the slow movement, it is of little musical beauty. Indeed, it is one of Schumann's driest and dullest works, and if it did not bear the name of Schumann, I doubt if it would ever be heard in a concert room. The slow movement is of mysterious charm; but the rest of the work is an exhibition of the restless Schumann of the last period, groping after strange rhythms and progressions, searching vainly for that "one tone" heard by him in his dismal madness.

A discreet performance of the G minor Symphony of Mozart ended the concert of reasonable length. Some of the ultra-moderns sneer at the 18th century "passion" of this symphony, and an eminent critic in New York said not long ago that its interest is only historical. Yes, its passion is under firm control. The work is like a classic frieze. The symphony is beautiful for its calmness, its sureness, its pure elegance of expression. But we belong to a far different generation, and I confess I would not exchange the last movement of Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" symphony for all the symphonies of Mo art and Haydn together. We sometimes forget that if Mozart and Haydn had lived today they would not be classics. That their works still charm is a proof of their genius; it is not due to the fact that they lived in "better, healthier" days.

* * *

Mr. Edward M. Heindl, a second flute player of the Symphony Orchestra, a Orchestra, Mr. Edward M. Heindl, a musician known and respected by all concert-goers of this city, died last Friday morning, 58 years old. His career in this city was long and honorable. When chamber music was little cultivated, even in large towns, his face was familiar to all who enjoyed the concerts of the Mendelssohn Quintet. He was the first flute player of the Symphony Orchestra when it was founded, and he remained in this position until the arrival of Mr. Molé. As artist and as man he was held in loving esteem by his associates and troops of friends. The funeral exercises will be held at his house this afternoon at half past 2.

PHILIP HALE.

Gazette
SUNDAY MORNING EDITION.
BOSTON, MARCH 8 1896.

The Symphony Concert.

Last night the Symphony Orchestra gave its seventeenth concert, with the following programme:

Suite, D-minor, op. 36.....Arthur Foote
Concerto for violoncello, A-minor.....Schumann
Mr. Leo Schulz.
Symphony, G-minor. .....Mozart

As will be seen, the suite by Mr. Arthur Foote was the one novelty on the list, and the work is most creditable to its composer. It is demonstrably the result of hard work, patience and knowledge, and technically it will win the approval of musicians. Inspiration or spontaneity are no longer expected in orchestral work. If the young composer writes correctly; if he has a fair knowledge of orchestral effects, it is no longer demanded that his work shall be born of the fulness of ideas. Tone color and odd and unexpected harmonies are everything; dignity or importance of ideas nothing. If monotony is the result of faulty theory, we excuse it by calling it erudition, and feel remorse for the yawns with which nature punishes us for being so intensely modern.

The Suite is the work of a man of talent; it has nothing new to say, but it says old things with suavity and with irreproachable good manners. It is work manufactured in the best manner, and on an approved and fashionable model. It need not be ashamed of going into good society, or of receiving the deserved approval of well bred people. Our era is characterized by the absence of genius, and so talent of all kinds has the opportunity to distinguish itself. We do not expect passion, pathos, tenderness, or any emotion whatever in our works of art; but we do inlist that correctness and oddity shall supply the place of thought and feeling. Mr. Foote is a modern and he fully understands what modern art-lovers expect; he pleases without exciting us, he puts no strain on the heart, head or memory. We listen to him with respect, part with him in the friendliest manner and then put on our hats and overcoats and talk about the weather or of the next epidemic of influenza. Genius is more uncomfortable and less courteous; it forces itself on the memory and makes us feel our own bitterness; it warms our blood, thrills our nerves and brings the tears to our eyes, and makes us ashamed of facing our friends. Mr. Foote's suite never adds to the number of our heart beats; it is irreproachable in this as in other things. One can even write of it without vulgar enthusiasm and placidly look forward to the time when Mr. Foote will honor us and himself by producing another suite, concerto or symphony, for to the modern composer, the difference in art forms is simply a question of time and labor, and not of degree and inspiration. It deserves to be added that Mr. Foote's suite belongs to the better class of academic music; it is dignified and effective work. The third movement is most ingeniously developed and worked out in its seven variations, and the last movement is impressive and fiery. The work aroused much enthusiasm, and at its conclusion, Mr. Foote was called out to bow his thanks.

Mr. Schulz was a most sympathetic as well as skilful interpreter of the Schumann concerto, and the Mozart symphony was brilliantly read by Mr. Paur and his orchestra.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 8, 1896.
(Copyrighted by Post Publishing Company.)

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

After a lapse of two weeks the Symphony concerts were resumed last night, the seventeenth being especially notable because of the first hearing of a suite by a local composer, Mr. Arthur Foote.

The suite in D minor was placed on the programme, and of the several things which Mr. Foote has written this is the most musical and ambitious. It is in four movements, each distinct in itself, and although some of the themes are rather reminiscent, it must be conceded that much originality has been displayed in their development. The first movement is written freely and boldly, and other than mildly suggesting what is to follow, is perhaps the least interesting of the four movements. The second, however, is very expressive and introduces several pretty figures. The third movement is broken into a number of short passages, each of which is quaintly conceived. It is the least serious of the movements, and is in fact of a light, playful order. It is in the fourth movement in which the genuine originality of the composer is seen at its best, for although comparatively short, the movement is exceedingly brilliant, his masterly handling of tone colors producing some picturesque effects. The suite was beautifully played, and at its conclusion Mr. Foote acknowledged the long-continued applause from his seat in the balcony.

Schumann's 'cello concerto in A minor was the next number, introducing Mr. Leo Schulz of the orchestra. Mr. Schulz has not been heard as a soloist at these concerts for some time, and it was apparent that in the interim he has made much progress as a solo player. He plays with a firm touch, and his tone is clear, full and rich. In the Schumann concerto he was particularly at home, and gave the number (which is a particularly difficult undertaking, as all the four movements are enchained together) in a beautiful manner, carefully bringing out its many beauties.

The Mozart symphony in G minor followed, and to enter into detail as to its performance would only be to again chronicle the masterly manner in which all the symphonies are being read this season by Mr. Paur.

At the concert next week a new symphony will be played, "Anthar," by Balakirew, and the soloist will be Miss Antoinette Szumowska, who will play Saint-Saens's pianoforte concerto in G minor.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCIX., NO. 68.

SUNDAY, MARCH 8, 1896.

LEO SCHULZ'S FINE PLAYING.

Recalls Splendidly Earned at the Symphony Concert.

The Soloist Gives a Thorough Exemplification of His Artistic Worth—Unfading Mozart Symphony Delightfully Played by the Orchestra—New Foote Suite.

The programme for last night's concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall was:

Suite in D minor, op. 36.....A. Foote
Concerto for 'cello, op. 129.....Schumann
Symphony, G minor.....Mozart

The soloist was Mr. Leo Schulz.

Mr. Foote's Suite was new. It is not as labored and academic as his more ambitious works have been hitherto, and suggests the effect of greater ease and spontaneity in invention. There is also greater ease in the orchestration, which is always graceful and clear, and often piquantly dainty. There is nothing vague in the Suite from beginning to end, and it is wholly lacking in the extravagances of the modern school. In fact, it might be characterized as something between Brahms made somewhat antique and Gade modernized. It is chastely melodious, the ideas are always refined, and the work is put together with irreproachable neatness. If such an expression may be permitted, it is well-groomed music. Nothing is out of place. The adagio has a charming leading theme, and it is interestingly and effectively scored. The third movement is a theme with variations, and these latter are skilfully contrasted, notably tasteful in their instrumentation and scholarly in their contrapuntal devices. The finale is spirited, well marked in its themes, and also clever contrapuntally. The workmanship is of the highest finish throughout. And yet the work seemed lacking in individual character and in originality; not that there is a trace of plagiarism in it, but that it says nothing that has not been said before in exactly the same way, and that its style constantly reflects that of other composers, notably Mendelssohn and Gade, admirable models unquestionably, in their clearness and their classical purity of taste, but dangerous, by reason of their strong mannerisms to the composer who studies them too closely and too confidingly. The work, however, is pleasing as an evidence of Mr. Foote's increased mastery over the technical resources of his art, in its steadily sustained melodiousness, and in its avoidance of the ugliness, the hysteria, the noise and blatant unmeaning that mark so much of the music of the time. It was read and played with great care, and was listened to with manifest interest, and when it was over the applause was very cordial, and did not cease until the composer had bowed his acknowledgments from the balcony.

The Schumann concerto is not often heard. With the exception of the beautiful but brief slow movement it is not an effective work, and has many tiresome movements, especially in the long-drawn-out opening movement. It is not felicitous writing for the solo instrument, inasmuch as it fails to bring out its most characteristic qualities, and has too little of the broad singing phrases that suit it so well. Mr. Schulz's playing was masterly in its easy freedom, its exquisitely refined tastefulness, the perfection of its intonation, its purity of style, the certainty and the brilliancy of its technique. He has never been heard here when he gave so thorough an exemplification of his artistic worth; the applause and the two imperative recalls that rewarded him were splendidly earned.

The unfading Mozart symphony which still remains, through all the revolutionary mutations that musical art has experienced since it was written, a work that can still be listened to with wonder and admiration, was perfectly read and delightfully played. Mr. Paur is always at his happiest when interpreting Mozart and Haydn.

There was sadness in seeing a new player at the stand of the second flute, which was rendered necessary by the death of Mr. E. M. Heindl, who had been a member of the orchestra from its foundation, and who had filled the position of principal flautist until he was replaced by Mr. Mole under the regime of Mr. Geriche. He was an excellent artist and an exemplary man.

The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Melpomene," Chadwick; concerto for pianoforte in G-minor, Saint-Saens; symphony, "Anthar," Balakirew (first time); Academic overture, Brahms. The soloist will be Miss Antoinette Szumowska.

Boston Sunday [illegible]

SUNDAY, MARCH 8, 1896.

Mr Foote's New Work Played at Symphony Concert.

The program for last week's symphony comprised a suite in D minor by Mr Arthur Foote, played for the first time; Schumann's cello concerto in A minor and Mozart's symphony in G minor. Mr Leo Schulz was the soloist. Mr Foote's rank as a composer has long since been firmly established by many works which evinced musicianly attainments of a high grade and his latest contribution to the concert world accentuates his right to the position already accredited him by competent judges and critics of the higher art of composition. His understanding of the resources of the orchestra is marked and his combinations, lights and shades are effective and skilfully scored. The theme of the first movement in the suite was strongly developed and the contrasted second, given to the horns and woodwinds, was boldly treated and with some originality of instrumentation. The closing coda was quite elaborately scored and a brilliant interpretation was given by the orchestra.

The long crescendo in the second movement, admirably written, leads up to some odd passages by the brasses, and thence to a "musical conversation" by the 'celli and horns. The latter portion is capitally wrought out, and by introducing a background of violins and woodwinds, Mr Foote has produced a most charming effect. The melody, finally given to the violins, is free, although strong in character and precedes the closing coda. The work of the orchestra, especially in the music dialogue, was most commendable, each contingent playing with wonderful precision.

In the third movement Mr Foote has introduced seven variations on a simple theme. There is no similarity in the various movements, and each contrast is treated elaborately. The pizzicato variation was notably delicate and elicited applause which interrupted the playing of the orchestra. The last movement is of a sterner nature, two themes forming the base of the work. The composition is very interesting, and the large audience received it with many manifestations of pleasure, calling the popular composer to the platform at the close of the number.

Mr Leo Schulz played the difficult Schumann concerto brilliantly. This well-known cellist has a beautiful tone production, his instrument in the higher register resembling a viola and at times a violin in purity. The romanza in the second part was magnificently "sung," and the rapid passage work in the third movement was notably smooth and true in tone. His chords, double and triple, were admirable in blending, and his whole work is entitled to warm commendation. Save a little harshness in the bass notes, Mr Schulz's tones were very sweet.

The orchestra interpreted the Mozart symphony with the usual excellent effect. Perhaps the fantasia, with the modulations in the opening movement, the quavering figures in the second and the rushing passages of the fourth call for special comment, but where all was so well performed general encomiums should suffice. The recent indorsements of New York critics, who place Mr Paur's orchestra at the head of American organizations, and possibly the best in the world, may have had an inspiring influence on the men, for their work last week seemed to be as near perfection as one could reasonably wish for.

At the concerts this week Miss Antoinette Szumowska will be the soloist. The program will be as follows: "Melpomene" overture, Chadwick; concerto for pianoforte in G minor, Saint-Saens; symphony, "Anthar," Balakirew (first time); Academic overture, Brahms.

---

[102]

Boston Daily Advertiser.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, MAR. 9, 1896.

A Concert Programme That Was Fairly Attractive.

Last Saturday's concert presented a programme that was fairly attractive, if not as varied as some that have preceded it. Mr. Arthur Foote's new Suite in D Minor was the first number, and the chief centre of interest. It proved to be much more melodious than some of the composer's earlier writings would lead one to expect, and although counterpoint was present in measurable quantity, the work derived its chief charm from the direct beauty of its thematic material.

The first movement, allegro energico, was cast in a free Sonata form, with a return of the first theme in place of closing theme—a sort of Sonata Rondo with the last theme left out. The opening measures were earnest and dignified, and gave promise of a great work. This promise, however, was not wholly fulfilled, for the extended subsidiary passages introduced a rather conventional second theme, richly enough harmonized, but becoming somewhat too saccharine in character. The development, based chiefly on the first theme, is successful enough, and so is the coda that closes what would be the recapitulation, in strict form. This whole movement has a rhythmic swing that does much to make it thoroughly effective.

The second movement, Espressivo, non troppo adagio, is the weakest of the four. It is full of melodic beauty, and contains some rich modulatory passages, but the ideas are not entirely coherent, nor are they especially distinctive. The slow movement seems to be the great crux of modern writers, and Mr. Foote has the same trouble that other composers have in trying to say something that shall be simple and at the same time forceful and original.

The third movement, andante espressivo con moto, presented a set of variations on a simple minor theme. These were not all of equal value; some of them displayed a power and dignity worthy of high praise, while others, after giving some delicious melody, would lapse into commonplaces. The varieties of rhythm employed, and the frequent (perhaps too frequent) contrasts between austerity and richness of harmony, gave the music a free style that made it seem more like development than a set of strict variations. It was played with a clearness that did credit to orchestra and conductor.

The final Presto was brisk enough at times, though not especially great. It contained some good contrapuntal writing, but in this case the scholarship and the musical beauty, like oil and water, did not mix very well. The wonderful orchestral fugue in Lachner's well-known suite shows that the strictest writing can be combined with thorough harmonic beauty, while the variations in the same suite prove that well marked contrasts may be obtained without too radical changes of style.

Mr. Foote's suite as a whole is eminently pleasing and successful. Its musical ideas are numerous and beautiful, and well worked out on the whole, in spite of an occasional lack of unity and coherence. Judged by the highest standards it is somewhat conventional, but it has many moments of dignity and power. At its close Mr. Foote was made to bow his acknowledgments from his seat in the audience.

Schumann's A-Minor concerto for violoncello is dull, in spite of a beautiful second movement. Its harmonies are broad and effective enough, but there is none of the spirited animation that characterizes his earlier works. Mr. Leo Schultz played it with all the ease and breadth of style that the public have been led to expect from him. His holding of the solo part against the whole orchestra in the latter part of the first movement showed admirable power, while the double-stopping and other difficulties of the final cadenza were as nothing in his hands. The C-string seemed a trifle muddy at times, but this was due to the composition, which brought its notes into contrast with the more cantabile tones of the upper strings.

The concert closed with a delightful clear rendering of Mozart's ever attractive G-Minor Symphony. It is more or less true of all Mozart's works that the stamp of his genius will prevent their ever becoming antiquated, but this one more than many others seems to belong to a far more recent epoch than most of the tinkling melodies of Mozart's time. Its strength and sincerity of harmony always win it a cordial recognition, even in these degenerate days of orchestral spice and bizarrerie. It is interesting to notice that the style of the Menuetto in this particular symphony is brusque and virile enough for the more modern scherzo that replaced the older form at the beginning of the present century.

Arthur Elson.

MONDAY, MARCH 9, 1896.
BOSTON STANDARD.

The concert by the Symphony orchestra on Saturday evening last was one of the best of the season thus far, the orchestra seemingly giving rhythmic expression of their pleasure for being at home once more. In this sentiment they were entirely in harmony with the large audience present, whose manifestitations of pleasure were equally earnest and spontaneous, if not so harmonically expressed. The Mozart symphony in G minor, which closed the evening's program, was most excellently interpreted, each musician seemingly in full sympathy with Mr. Paur, who, in his turn, was never in higher form. The solo playing in the Schumann concerto of Mr. Leo Schelz was a matter of general acclaim, his masterly genius investing the 'cello with a quality attainable to the most advanced masters of the musical art.

[103]

Boston Courier.
SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 8, 1896.

The seventeenth Symphony programme began with the first performance of a suite in D minor for full orchestra—opus 36—by Mr. Arthur Foote, upon whose excellent and esteemed talent this new composition reflects new and favorable light. We have always thought highly of his ability, and believed that sometimes his very conscientiousness and care formalized his expression and cast the gown of the academician over the jacket of the composer, so that his work seemed dryer, more deliberate and set, and in a certain sense older than it ought. But we find almost nothing of such restraint and scholasticism in this suite, throughout all of which there breathes an air of ease and freedom, and the manner of which seems spontaneous, adequate, well-adjusted and true. The themes are not brief, and their melodic forms show variety and independence without any suggestion of the fantastic, the commonplace or the long drawn. The thematic treatment is scholarly and strong, and the instrumentation is compact and contained within the natural middle range of the orchestra. There is no recourse to any airy twiddling of the strings or to any subterranean groans of bassoon or tuba or to any extravagance of musical instruments. Yet there is invention enough, some quaintness and a little oddity, for the harp appears two or three times for a few measures only and in the last movement perhaps a dozen notes are pointed with a touch of the triangle. The orchestral combinations are natural and agreeable, and just because no one makes any extraordinary demand upon the general resources, there is enough diversity and to spare for every want. The first movement is an energetic (and at the beginning and end) almost vehement allegro, the first theme of which, rushing up excitedly and then sweeping down more easily, contrasts well with a quieter and more level antithesis. The second is a sweet and placid adagietto. The third is a theme with variations, usually an unprofitable and uninteresting form. But Mr. Foote has a bright, clean-cut subject, and his seven short variations are delightfully individual in formation and original in coloring, rising at last to a rough and emphatic finale which smacks a little of what people like to speak of now as "American" in type and accent. The fourth movement is a vigorous fucato, with a very sturdy contrapuntal development which becomes frugal for a little while now and then. The playing was excellent, the audience was pleased and Mr. Foote was warmly summoned.

After the suite Schumann's con certo for violoncello in A major, opus 129, was played by Mr. Leo Schulz, who won much honor by his performance, which was finer than it may have seemed to some listeners. For this concerto is more for the artist than for the virtuoso, and although it has its difficulties and demands a thorough and extended technique; there is nothing showy about it, and even the rapid last movement could not be made a means for display without subordinating the composer to the performer. Mr. Schulz's playing was quiet, sympathetic and refined, had all needful strength and celerety, and was tender and sweet in the romance which constitutes the short second movent. His work was appreciated and he was handsomely recalled.

A good reading of Mozart's G minor symphony, which was much enjoyed, completed the programme.

For this week's concert this programme is promised: Chadwick, "Melpomene" overture; Saint-Saens, concerto for pianoforte, in G minor; Balakirew, first time, symphony, "Anthar;" Brahms, academic overture. Soloist, Miss Antoinette Szumowska.

The Musical Courier.
NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 11, 1896.

The seventeenth Symphony concert was given last evening. The program was as follows:

Suite, D minor, op. 36.....Foote
(First Time.)
Concerto for 'cello, A minor, op. 129.....Schumann
Mr. Leo Schulz.
Symphony, G minor.....Mozart

The first movement of Mr. Foote's suite, allegro energico, is in themes and in general treatment according to the gospel of Mendelssohn; yet there is not that master's discretion in the matter of fortissimo, for Mr. Foote's sonority is inclined to be blatant; the brass is handled as though it were a brass band late in the day at a firemen's muster. The second movement, espressivo, non troppo adagio (B flat major), begins admirably, with a flowing and agreeable cantabile, but the composer soon wanders in thought, and there is diffuseness and there is uncertainty. In spite of the fact that in the Theme—G minor—and Variations which follow the composer does not always seem to have regarded each variation as a single individual, organic whole, this movement shows a notable advance on his earlier work in freedom of thought and expression. The rhythms are attractive and well defined; the instrumentation is richer. This music is most respectable; and it is more than that: it is in large measure interesting. The finale, presto assai, D major, is a not very successful attempt to combine scholasticism with sensuous melody. As in nearly all of the music of this industrious composer, so in this suite there is no marked individual voice. Still there is a decided gain in ease and fluency of expression, and the vocabulary of the composer is fuller and not so painfully chosen. The suite was welcomed heartily by a friendly audience.

Mr. Schulz has never played here as well as he did last night; his technic was sure and brilliant; he displayed in full his intelligence and taste. The concerto of Schumann, with the exception of the mysteriously beautiful slow movement, is an unthankful task for the player and a bore to the hearer. I wonder if anybody would ever play it if it did not bear the name of Schumann.

The program of the concert the 14th is as follows: Chadwick's Melpomene overture; Saint-Saëns' G minor piano concerto (Miss Szumowska); Antar, by Rimsky-Korsakoff—not by Balakireff, as stated in the program book—and Brahms' Academic overture.

* * *

MONDAY, MARCH 9, 1896.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the seventeenth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Arthur Foote: Suite in D minor, opus 36.
(First time.)
Schumann: Concerto for violoncello, in A minor, opus 129.
Mozart: Symphony in G minor (Koechel, 550).
Mr. Leo Schulz was the 'cellist.

Mr. Foote's new suite made, in one way, a different impression from that to which one is used from a work by him. The general plan of the composition seemed to us to be the least good part of it; and Mr. Foote's power of writing both orchestral and choral works of well-nigh masterly coherence of scheme and classic unity of impression has hitherto been conspicuous. No doubt, one cannot make such severe demands in this respect upon a suite as upon an orchestral or chamber composition in the more highly developed sonata form. Originally the suite was nothing more than was implied in the name "Suite de pièces"—"Series of pieces;" and the several movements in the suites by the old masters had no more inner connection with one another than would come from their all being in the same key. But ever since more modern composers stopped writing all the movements of a suite in one and the same key, one has got to look for some other, more ideal, connecting link between them, so that the composition shall seem something more than a mere haphazard aggregation of unrelated parts.

It seems to us that the trouble with this suite of Mr. Foote's is in the second and third movements; Espressivo, non troppo Adagio, and Tema con variazioni. Both are slow movements, and, though some of the variations in the latter are in a more rapid tempo, its general character is that implied in its heading: Andante espressivo, con moto. The more rapid variations do not come until this character has impressed itself upon the listener, and he has already noted the lack of contrast between the movement and its immediate predecessor. And this Theme with Variations itself, though containing some of the happiest inspirations and the best writing in the whole suite, seemed to us to be open to much the same charge as the entire composition; the charge of a certain lack of unity and coherence of scheme. Was this because too long pauses were made between the separate variations? We cannot quite tell. The theme itself is charming, and each variation, by itself, is equally so; but somehow we could not catch the connecting thread on which all these pearls were strung. We hear that the composer is dissatisfied with the first movement, and intends rewriting it. Perhaps we are no more satisfied with it than he; but, on the other hand, it strikes us as having the best stuff in it of all the four movements, and to be laid out on the stoutest plan. What faults it has are merely matters of detail—both as regards development and instrumentation—which prevent its producing the effect it would were the conspicuously fine ideas in it better carried out. To us it is eminently worth rewriting; if Mr. Foote bends well to the oar—which he knows how to do as well as anyone going—he will make it the finest movement in the suite. The second movement strikes us as rather weak. Perhaps all the third needs, after all, is, as we have already hinted, to have the pauses between the separate variations done away with, so that the whole may be seen to flow more in one stream. The fourth movement, Presto assai, is capital throughout. The heading seems to us a little misleading; if Mr. Paur really took the movement in Mr. Foote's tempo—as there seems to be no reason for doubting—the impression was by no means that of a Presto; save in the Stringendo toward the close, it sounded no faster than an Allegro giusto. But this is comparatively unimportant; Rubinstein was famous for marking many of his movements in a way that gave no notion at all of their proper tempo, but merely of the general character; when expostulated with by conductors for thus misleading them, he would reply that the marking meant something to him and that he did not care to change it. Perhaps Mr. Foote feels in something the same way about this Presto assai. But the movement is unspeakably bright and inspiring in its onward rush, in its ingenious development, especially in the clever and distinctly humorous treatment of fugal forms. It is, in one sense, perhaps, the most modern thing Mr. Foote has yet written, and this impression of "modernity" is not gained at the expense of stout construction nor logical development. The suite was loudly applauded, and the composer had at last to bow his acknowledgments from his hiding-place in the first balcony.

Mozart's ever-wonderful G minor symphony was, upon the whole, excellently well played. We cannot remember hearing the full rhythmic effect of that inimitable initial viola figure in the first movement so well brought out for many years. And the wondrous first theme in the violins was played with all due grace and sensibility, yet without any over-sentimentalizing of the tempo. The little holding-back the rhythm in the second theme we did not like; ten or fifteen years ago it might have passed for modern romanticism of conception; now it sounds like the mere stencil-plate of romanticism. The divine Andante was admirably read, and minuet and finale went to a charm. Of the work itself we can only say that it seems to us as godlike as ever; it sounds as easily great and beautiful, as ineffably charming, as it did before "Tristan und Isolde" was written.

Mr. Schulz had a rather thankless task in Schumann's 'cello concerto. Virtuosity seems to have been a thing for which Schumann had no native sense. Liszt jokingly called his great pianoforte concerto "un concert sans piano"—in allusion to the already famous F minor sonata, originally published as "concert sans orchestre." One can fancy that Schumann must have heard this good-natured little fling and taken it to heart; for one can almost hear him groan in the first and last movements of this 'cello concerto, in his endeavors to make the solo part prominent and give the 'cellist a chance to show off his virtuosity. But these two movements are as dull as they are ineffective; seldom has Schumann shown himself less inspired. The short slow movement is a gem of beauty and genuinely Schumannesque feeling; but there is something lacking, it sounds rather half-baked; it leads you to expect more than you really get. Mr. Schulz played the work very beautifully indeed, like a true artist; but, save in the slow movement, he could not make it effective.

The next programme is: Chadwick, overture to "Melpomene;" Saint-Saëns, concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, in G minor; Rimsky-Korsakoff, symphony, "Antar;" Brahms, "Academic" overture. Miss Antoinette Szumowska will be the pianist.

The Boston Courier.
MONDAY, MARCH 9, 1896.

THE SYMPHONY.

A Concert of Much Merit—Mr. Schulz as Soloist—Arthur Foote's New Suite.

Fifteenth season Boston Symphony Orchestra, eighteenth concert. The programme:
Suite in D minor, op. 36.....A. Foote
Concerto for 'cello, op. 129.....Schumann
Symphony, G minor.....Mozart
Soloist, Mr. Leo Schulz.

It was a concert of grace and charm throughout; if there were no intense feelings, there were also no regrets, and everything moved along melodiously and clearly. Mr. Foote's new suite was, of course, the piece de resistance, so far as interest went. It turned out to be a very refined work of the purely classical style. It does not aim at exceeding heights, and it therefore succeeds excellently. There is a beautifully tender theme in the adagio, which is also well orchestrated, and the variations of the third movement are skilfully carried out and display all Mr. Foote's best qualities of musicianship. He is getting to use his tools with much defter touch than formerly. It might be asked of this suite whether inspiration does not sometimes flag, whether Mendelssohn is not sometimes too much to the fore in it. To each question a somewhat hesitating affirmative may be given, but qualified by the conviction that there is enough of originality in the work to justify warm praise. It was played extremely well and was received with marked favor.

Mr. Schulz gave us about the best 'cello playing we have heard from him in the Schumann concerto. In breadth, beauty of tone, elegance of phrasing and clean-cut technique there was little to be desired. The concerto, however, does not bring out the beauties of the instrument. Much of it is mere exercise, and the moments of weariness are not few. That Mr. Schulz succeeded in arousing interest in it as a whole was proof enough of his fine ability.

The ever-golden Mozart symphony, which delights and amazes by its melodic beauty and perennial youthfulness, brought the concert to an appropriate end. It was played with great delicacy and refinement of shading.

The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Melpomene," Chadwick; concerto for pianoforte in G minor, Saint-Saens; symphony, "Anthar," Balakirew (first time); Academic overture, Brahms. The soloist will be Miss Antoinette Szumowska.

BOSTON POST.
The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.
SUNDAY, MARCH 16, 1896.
(Copyright 1896, Post Publishing Company.)

WON PIANO HONORS.

Miss Antoinette Szumowska's Playing a Revelation.

The eighteenth in the present series of symphonies introduced a new aspirant for musical honors at Music Hall last night—local honors, at least, for while Miss Antoinette Szumowska has already won a reputation in other cities, she had not, up to last night, been heard in Boston.

The number she essayed was the Saint-Saens pianoforte concerto, No. 2, G minor, which is a favorite one with pianists, as it offers especial opportunities.

Miss Szumowska is a comparatively young woman, of pleasing presence, and plays with much ease and grace. She has a bold, firm touch, suggesting a male player rather than a woman. There is a marked earnestness and finish about her work which especially commend her to her audience.

The second number of the concerto she played with great delicacy of expression, the rapid dextrous fingering required in this movement being accomplished in a particularly graceful, easy way, and quite a burst of applause greeted her at the close of the movement.

Her interpretation of the third movement also gave much pleasure and Miss Szumowska was recalled five times at the close of the number

The only two other numbers on the programme were the "Melpomene" overture by Chadwick, and the long Brahms symphony, No. 2. Mr. Chadwick's overture was charmingly played, especially the coda and the symphony, particularly the third and fourth movements. The last, with its touch of Hungarianism, was played in characteristic fashion by the orchestra.

Next week's concert will include Rubinstein's symphony, No. 4; three Hungarian dances, Brahms-Dvorak; andante from second symphony and the overture, "Abu Hassan." No soloist has been announced.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, MAR. 9, 1896.

A Concert Programme That Was Fairly Attractive.

Last Saturday's concert presented a programme that was fairly attractive, if not as varied as some that have preceded it. Mr. Arthur Foote's new Suite in D Minor was the first number, and the chief centre of interest. It proved to be much more melodious than some of the composer's earlier writings would lead one to expect, and although counterpoint was present in measurable quantity, the work derived its chief charm from the direct beauty of its thematic material.

The first movement, allegro energico, was cast in a free Sonata form, with a return of the first theme in place of closing theme —a sort of Sonata Rondo with the last theme left out. The opening measures were earnest and dignified, and gave promise of a great work. This promise, however, was not wholly fulfilled, for the extended subsidiary passages introduced a rather conventional second theme, richly enough harmonized, but becoming somewhat too saccharine in character. The development, based chiefly on the first theme, is successful enough, and so is the coda that closes what would be the recapitulation, in strict form. This whole movement has a rhythmic swing that does much to make it thoroughly effective.

The second movement, Espressivo, non troppo adagio, is the weakest of the four. It is full of melodic beauty, and contains some rich modulatory passages, but the ideas are not entirely coherent, nor are they especially distinctive. The slow movement seems to be the great crux of modern writers, and Mr. Foote has the same trouble that other composers have in trying to say something that shall be simple and at the same time forceful and original.

The third movement, andante espressivo con moto, presented a set of variations on a simple minor theme. These were not all of equal value; some of them displayed a power and dignity worthy of high praise, while others, after giving some delicious melody, would lapse into commonplaces. The varieties of rhythm employed, and the frequent (perhaps too frequent) contrasts between austerity and richness of harmony, gave the music a free style that made it seem more like development than a set of strict variations. It was played with a clearness that did credit to orchestra and conductor.

The final Presto was brisk enough at times, though not especially great. It contained some good contrapuntal writing, but in this case the scholarship and the musical beauty, like oil and water, did not mix very well. The wonderful orchestral fugue in Lachner's well-known suite shows that the strictest writing can be combined with thorough harmonic beauty, while the variations in the same suite prove that well marked contrasts may be obtained without too radical changes of style.

Mr. Foote's suite as a whole is eminently pleasing and successful. Its musical ideas are numerous and beautiful, and well worked out on the whole, in spite of an occasional lack of unity and coherence. Judged by the highest standards it is somewhat conventional, but it has many moments of dignity and power. At its close Mr. Foote was made to bow his acknowledgments from his seat in the audience.

Schumann's A-Minor concerto for violoncello is dull, in spite of a beautiful second movement. Its harmonies are broad and effective enough, but there is none of the spirited animation that characterizes his earlier works. Mr. Leo Schultz played it with all the ease and breadth of style that the public have been led to expect from him. His holding of the solo part against the whole orchestra in the latter part of the first movement showed admirable power, while the double-stopping and other difficulties of the final cadenza were as nothing in his hands. The C-string seemed a trifle muddy at times, but this was due to the composition, which brought its notes into contrast with the more cantabile tones of the upper strings.

The concert closed with a delightful clear rendering of Mozart's ever attractive G-Minor Symphony. It is more or less true of all Mozart's works that the stamp of his genius will prevent their ever becoming antiquated, but this one more than many others seems to belong to a far more recent epoch than most of the tinkling melodies of Mozart's time. Its strength and sincerity of harmony always win it a cordial recognition, even in these degenerate days of orchestral spice and bizarrerie. It is interesting to notice that the style of the Menuetto in this particular symphony is brusque and virile enough for the more modern scherzo that replaced the older form at the beginning of the present century.

Arthur Elson.

MONDAY, MARCH 9, 1896.

BOSTON STANDARD.

The concert by the Symphony orchestra on Saturday evening last was one of the best of the season thus far, the orchestra seemingly giving rhythmic expression of their pleasure for being at home once again. In this sentiment they were entirely in harmony with the large audience present, whose manifestitations of pleasure were equally earnest and spontaneous, if not so harmonically expressed. The Mozart symphony in G minor, which closed the evening's program, was most excellently interpreted, each musician seemingly in full sympathy with Mr. Paur, who, in his turn, was never in higher form. The solo playing in the Schumann concerto of Mr. Leo Schelz was a matter of general acclaim, his masterly genius investing the 'cello with a quality attainable to the most advanced masters of the musical art.

[103]

Boston Courier.
SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 8, 1896.

The seventeenth Symphony programme began with the first performance of a suite in D minor for full orchestra—opus 36—by Mr. Arthur Foote, upon whose excellent and esteemed talent this new composition reflects new and favorable light. We have always thought highly of his ability, and believed that sometimes his very conscientiousness and care formalized his expression and cast the gown of the academician over the jacket of the composer, so that his work seemed dryer, more deliberate and set, and in a certain sense older than it ought. But we find almost nothing of such restraint and scholasticism in this suite, throughout all of which there breathes an air of ease and freedom, and the manner of which seems spontaneous, adequate, well-adjusted and true. The themes are not brief, and their melodic forms show variety and independence without any suggestion of the fantastic, the commonplace or the long drawn. The thematic treatment is scholarly and strong, and the instrumentation is compact and contained within the natural middle range of the orchestra. There is no recourse to any airy twiddling of the strings or to any subterranean groans of bassoon or tuba or to any extravagance of musical instruments. Yet there is invention enough, some quaintness and a little oddity, for the harp appears two or three times for a few measures only and in the last movement perhaps a dozen notes are pointed with a touch of the triangle. The orchestral combinations are natural and agreeable, and just because no one makes any extraordinary demand upon the general resources, there is enough diversity and to spare for every want. The first movement is an energetic (and at the beginning and end) almost vehement allegro, the first theme of which, rushing up excitedly and then sweeping down more easily, contrasts well with a quieter and more level antithesis. The second is a sweet and placid adagietto. The third is a theme with variations, usually an unprofitable and uninteresting form. But Mr. Foote has a bright, clean-cut subject, and his seven short variations are delightfully individual in formation and original in coloring, rising at last to a rough and emphatic finale which smacks a little of what people like to speak of now as "American" in type and accent. The fourth movement is a vigorous fucato, with a very sturdy contrapuntal development which becomes frugal for a little while now and then. The playing was excellent, the audience was pleased and Mr. Foote was warmly summoned.

After the suite Schumann's con certo for violoncello in A major, opus 129, was played by Mr. Leo Schulz, who won much honor by his performance, which was finer than it may have seemed to some listeners. For this concerto is more for the artist than for the virtuoso, and although it has its difficulties and demands a thorough and extended technique; there is nothing showy about it, and even the rapid last movement could not be made a means for display without subordinating the composer to the performer. Mr. Schulz's playing was quiet, sympathetic and refined, had all needful strength and celerety, and was tender and sweet in the romance which constitutes the short second movent. His work was appreciated and he was handsomely recalled.

A good reading of Mozart's G minor symphony, which was much enjoyed, completed the programme.

For this week's concert this programme is promised: Chadwick, "Melpomene" overture; Saint-Saens, concerto for pianoforte, in G minor; Balakirew, first time, symphony, "Anthar;" Brahms, academic overture. Soloist, Miss Antoinette Szumowska.

The Musical Courier.
NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 11, 1896.

The seventeenth Symphony concert was given last evening. The program was as follows:

Suite, D minor, op. 36.....Foote
(First Time.)
Concerto for 'cello, A minor, op. 129.....Schumann
Mr. Leo Schulz.
Symphony, G minor.....Mozart

The first movement of Mr. Foote's suite, allegro energico, is in themes and in general treatment according to the gospel of Mendelssohn; yet there is not that master's discretion in the matter of fortissimo, for Mr. Foote's sonority is inclined to be blatant; the brass is handled as though it were a brass band late in the day at a firemen's muster. The second movement, espressivo, non troppo adagio (B flat major), begins admirably, with a flowing and agreeable cantabile, but the composer soon wanders in thought, and there is diffuseness and there is uncertainty. In spite of the fact that in the Theme—G minor—and Variations which follow the composer does not always seem to have regarded each variation as a single individual, organic whole, this movement shows a notable advance on his earlier work in freedom of thought and expression. The rhythms are attractive and well defined; the instrumentation is richer. This music is most respectable; and it is more than that: it is in large measure interesting. The finale, presto assai, D major, is a not very successful attempt to combine scholasticism with sensuous melody. As in nearly all of the music of this industrious composer, so in this suite there is no marked individual voice. Still there is a decided gain in ease and fluency of expression, and the vocabulary of the composer is fuller and not so painfully chosen. The suite was welcomed heartily by a friendly audience.

Mr. Schulz has never played here as well as he did last night; his technic was sure and brilliant; he displayed in full his intelligence and taste. The concerto of Schumann, with the exception of the mysteriously beautiful slow movement, is an unthankful task for the player and a bore to the hearer. I wonder if anybody would ever play it if it did not bear the name of Schumann.

The program of the concert the 14th is as follows: Chadwick's Melpomene overture; Saint-Saëns' G minor piano concerto (Miss Szumowska); Antar, by Rimsky-Korsakoff —not by Balakireff, as stated in the program book—and Brahms' Academic overture.

* * *

Boston Transcript
MONDAY, MARCH 9, 1896.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the seventeenth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Arthur Foote: Suite in D minor, opus 36.
(First time.)
Schumann: Concerto for violoncello, in A minor, opus 129.
Mozart: Symphony in G minor (Koechel, 550).
Mr. Leo Schulz was the 'cellist.

Mr. Foote's new suite made, in one way, a different impression from that to which one is used from a work by him. The general plan of the composition seemed to us to be the least good part of it; and Mr. Foote's power of writing both orchestral and choral works of well-nigh masterly coherence of scheme and classic unity of impression has hitherto been conspicuous. No doubt, one cannot make such severe demands in this respect upon a suite as upon an orchestral or chamber composition in the more highly developed sonata form. Originally the suite was nothing more than was implied in the name "Suite de pièces" —"Series of pieces;" and the several movements in the suites by the old masters had no more inner connection with one another than would come from their all being in the same key. But ever since more modern composers stopped writing all the movements of a suite in one and the same key, one has got to look for some other, more ideal, connecting link between them, so that the composition shall seem something more than a mere haphazard aggregation of unrelated parts.

It seems to us that the trouble with this suite of Mr. Foote's is in the second and third movements; Espressivo, non troppo Adagio, and Tema con variazioni. Both are slow movements, and, though some of the variations in the latter are in a more rapid tempo, its general character is that implied in its heading: Andante espressivo, con moto. The more rapid variations do not come until this character has impressed itself upon the listener, and he has already noted the lack of contrast between the movement and its immediate predecessor. And this Theme with Variations itself, though containing some of the happiest inspirations and the best writing in the whole suite, seemed to us to be open to much the same charge as the entire composition; the charge of a certain lack of unity and coherence of scheme. Was this because too long pauses were made between the separate variations? We cannot quite tell. The theme itself is charming, and each variation, by itself, is equally so; but somehow we could not catch the connecting thread on which all these pearls were strung. We hear that the composer is dissatisfied with the first movement, and intends rewriting it. Perhaps we are no more satisfied with it than he; but, on the other hand, it strikes us as having the best stuff in it of all the four movements, and to be laid out on the stoutest plan. What faults it has are merely matters of detail—both as regards development and instrumentation—which prevent its producing the effect it would were the conspicuously fine ideas in it better carried out. To us it is eminently worth rewriting; if Mr. Foote bends well to the oar—which he knows how to do as well as anyone going—he will make it the finest movement in the suite. The second movement strikes us as rather weak. Perhaps all the third needs, after all, is, as we have already hinted, to have the pauses between the separate variations done away with, so that the whole may be seen to flow more in one stream. The fourth movement, Presto assai, is capital throughout. The heading seems to us a little misleading; if Mr. Paur really took the movement in Mr. Foote's tempo—as there seems to be no reason for doubting—the impression was by no means that of a Presto; save in the Stringendo toward the close, it sounded no faster than an Allegro giusto. But this is comparatively unimportant; Rubinstein was famous for marking many of his movements in a way that gave no notion at all of their proper tempo, but merely of the general character; when expostulated with by conductors for thus misleading them, he would reply that the marking meant something to him and that he did not care to change it. Perhaps Mr. Foote feels in something the same way about this Presto assai. But the movement is unspeakably bright and inspiring in its onward rush, in its ingenious development, especially in the clever and distinctly humorous treatment of fugal forms. It is, in one sense, perhaps, the most modern thing Mr. Foote has yet written, and this impression of "modernity" is not gained at the expense of stout construction nor logical development. The suite was loudly applauded, and the composer had at last to bow his acknowledgments from his hiding-place in the first balcony.

Mozart's ever-wonderful G minor symphony was, upon the whole, excellently well played. We cannot remember hearing the full rhythmic effect of that inimitable initial viola figure in the first movement so well brought out for many years. And the wondrous first theme in the violins was played with all due grace and sensibility, yet without any over-sentimentalizing of the tempo. The little holding-back the rhythm in the second theme we did not like; ten or fifteen years ago it might have passed for modern romanticism of conception; now it sounds like the mere stencil-plate of romanticism. The divine Andante was admirably read, and minuet and finale went to a charm. Of the work itself we can only say that it seems to us as godlike as ever; it sounds as easily great and beautiful, as ineffably charming, as it did before "Tristan und Isolde" was written.

Mr. Schulz had a rather thankless task in Schumann's 'cello concerto. Virtuosity seems to have been a thing for which Schumann had no native sense. Liszt jokingly called his great pianoforte concerto "un concert sans piano"—in allusion to the already famous F minor sonata, originally published as "concert sans orchestre." One can fancy that Schumann must have heard this good-natured little fling and taken it to heart; for one can almost hear him groan in the first and last movements of this 'cello concerto, in his endeavors to make the solo part prominent and give the 'cellist a chance to show off his virtuosity. But these two movements are as dull as they are ineffective; seldom has Schumann shown himself less inspired. The short slow movement is a gem of beauty and genuinely Schumannesque feeling; but there is something lacking, it sounds rather half-baked; it leads you to expect more than you really get. Mr. Schulz played the work very beautifully indeed, like a true artist; but, save in the slow movement, he could not make it effective.

The next programme is: Chadwick, overture to "Melpomene;" Saint-Saens, concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, in G minor; Rimski-Korsakoff, symphony, "Antar;" Brahms, "Academic" overture. Miss Antoinette Szumowska will be the pianist.

The Boston Traveler
MONDAY, MARCH 9, 1896.

THE SYMPHONY.

A Concert of Much Merit—Mr. Schulz as Soloist—Arthur Foote's New Suite.

Fifteenth season Boston Symphony Orchestra, eighteenth concert. The programme:
Suite in D minor, op. 36.....A. Foote
Concerto for 'cello, op. 129.....Schumann
Symphony, G minor.....Mozart
Soloist, Mr. Leo Schulz.

It was a concert of grace and charm throughout; if there were no intense feelings, there were also no regrets, and everything moved along melodiously and clearly. Mr. Foote's new suite was, of course, the piece de resistance, so far as interest went. It turned out to be a very refined work of the purely classical style. It does not aim at exceeding heights, and it therefore succeeds excellently. There is a beautifully tender theme in the adagio, which is also well orchestrated, and the variations of the third movement are skilfully carried out and display all Mr. Foote's best qualities of musicianship. He is getting to use his tools with much defter touch than formerly. It might be asked of this suite whether inspiration does not sometimes flag, whether Mendelssohn is not sometimes too much to the fore in it. To each question a somewhat hesitating affirmative may be given, but qualified by the conviction that there is enough of originality in the work to justify warm praise. It was played extremely well and was received with marked favor.

Mr. Schulz gave us about the best 'cello playing we have heard from him in the Schumann concerto. In breadth, beauty of tone, elegance of phrasing and clean-cut technique there was little to be desired. The concerto, however, does not bring out the beauties of the instrument. Much of it is mere exercise, and the moments of weariness are not few. That Mr. Schulz succeeded in arousing interest in it as a whole was proof enough of his fine ability.

The ever-golden Mozart symphony, which delights and amazes by its melodic beauty and perennial youthfulness, brought the concert to an appropriate end. It was played with great delicacy and refinement of shading.

The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Melpomene," Chadwick; concerto for pianoforte in G minor, Saint-Saens; symphony, "Anthar," Balakirew (first time); Academic overture, Brahms. The soloist will be Miss Antoinette Szumowska.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.
SUNDAY, MARCH 16, 1896.
(Copyright 1896, Post Publishing Company.)

WON PIANO HONORS.

Miss Antoinette Szumowska's Playing a Revelation.

The eighteenth in the present series of symphonies introduced a new aspirant for musical honors at Music Hall last night—local honors, at least, for while Miss Antoinette Szumowska has already won a reputation in other cities, she had not, up to last night, been heard in Boston.

The number she essayed was the Saint-Saens pianoforte concerto, No. 2, G minor, which is a favorite one with pianists, as it offers especial opportunities.

Miss Szumowska is a comparatively young woman, of pleasing presence, and plays with much ease and grace. She has a bold, firm touch, suggesting a male player rather than a woman. There is a marked earnestness and finish about her work which especially commend her to her audience.

The second number of the concerto she played with great delicacy of expression, the rapid dextrous fingering required in this movement being accomplished in a particularly graceful, easy way, and quite a burst of applause greeted her at the close of the movement.

Her interpretation of the third movement also gave much pleasure and Miss Szumowska was recalled five times at the close of the number

The only two other numbers on the programme were the "Melpomene" overture by Chadwick, and the long Brahms symphony, No. 2. Mr. Chadwick's overture was charmingly played, especially the coda and the symphony, particularly the third and fourth movements. The last, with its touch of Hungarianism, was played in characteristic fashion by the orchestra.

Next week's concert will include Rubinstein's symphony, No. 4; three Hungarian dances, Brahms-Dvorak; andante from second symphony and the overture, "Abu Hassan." No soloist has been announced.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCVI., NO. 75.

SUNDAY, MARCH 15, 1896.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Brilliant Performance of Chadwick's "Melpomene."

Full Justice Done the Overture by Mr. Paur and His Orchestra—Very Fine Reading of the Brahms Symphony No. 2, D-Major—Miss Antoinette Szumowska the Soloist.

The selections for the 18th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, last night were:

Overture, "Melpomene".....G. W. Chadwick
Concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, G-minor....
Saint-Saens
Symphony No. 2, D-major.....Brahms

Miss Antoinette Szumowska was the soloist.

Increased familiarity with Mr. Chadwick's overture enlarges respect for it. The work wears well and holds its own firmly. Its color, though tragic, is never overcharged, and the large and profound dignity befitting the theme has never been lost sight of by the composer. Temperance and keen artistic judgment and feeling, seconded by fine skill and unerring taste, are everywhere apparent. The clearness and beauty of the orchestration, notably in regard to the wood wind, and the always effective and well considered contrasts in tone color, impart a steady charm and interest to the score. The overture is fairly entitled to rank prominently with the best achievements in its kind that have come from the hand of a native composer. Full justice was done it by Mr. Paur and his orchestra, and prolonged applause followed its performance.

Mr. Paur, who evidences a deep and sympathetic appreciation of Brahms, gave an exceptionally fine reading of the symphony. Not a point was missed, and all that there is of grace, force and color in the work was brought out perfectly. The opening movement has never been more thoroughly interpreted than it was last night, and the pretty allegretto grazioso, with its piquant, rhythmic daintiness, was delightfully accented. But, oh, the wearisome length of the first allegro and the interminable toying with its brief leading subject, to no discoverable end except exhausting pedagogically all possibilities of thematic development, until at last resentful exasperation is stimulated by the ever-recurring repetitions!

Miss Szumowska has gained something of repose since she was last heard at these concerts. Her performance of the concerto was abundant in graces of style and charm of technique. The opening allegro was given with appropriate breadth and dignity, and the allegretto with brilliancy and clearness. More of maturity in taste and flexibility in sentiment might have been desired, but that will come by and by. In the finale, the young artiste was less successful. She took it at a rapid pace, which she could not always sustain with clearness of execution. The result was that some passages were blurred and others were unduly hurried and even clipped short, rendering it far from easy for the conductor and the orchestra to follow her with precision. As the movement progressed the pace began to tell on her fingers, and she became nervous, which did not mend matters. However, toward the close the artiste recovered, and the animated coda was wound up with great spirit and brilliancy, and a stormy round of applause and several recalls rewarded her.

Miss Szumowska has every qualification to win a high place in her art. Already her playing indicates the innate artist. What she most lacks is individuality and independence in style, but, with greater experience, this shortcoming will doubtless disappear.

The programme for the next concert is: Symphony No. 4, "Dramatic," Rubinstein; three Hungarian dances, Brahms-Dvork; andante from symphony No. 2, Weber; overture, "Abu Hassan," Weber. There will be no soloist.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, MARCH 15, 1896.

Eighteenth Concert of the Fifteenth Season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall Last Evening—Miss Szumowska the Soloist.

The program of the Symphony concert last evening, Mr. Paur, conductor, was as follows:

Overture "Melpomene".....Chadwick
Concerto No. 2 for piano, G minor.....
Saint-Saens
Symphony No. 2, D major.....Brahms

The program-book says that Mr. Chadwick's overture might have had a sub-title "Overture to an Imaginary Tragedy." But the title is "Melpomene; Dramatic Overture," whatever was the original intention of specification.

"Melpomene" is enough as it stands. This Muse presided over all melancholy subjects, as well as tragedy; for did not Horace write:

"Praecipe lugubres
Cantus Melpomene?"

She was dignified in look, stature and dress, this daughter of Zeus and Mnemosyne, and yet, according to one myth, she loved Achelous and bore unto him the Sirens, those fair creatures designed for man's destruction. Who, pray, will unriddle this riddle? The Sirens are the children of the Tragic Muse, who in turn was the daughter of the All-Powerful and Memory.

No doubt the program book is right. Mr. Chadwick evidently had a tragedy in mind; he did not attempt to exploit musically a strange family tree. His music is indeed tragic, nobly tragic. The very introduction prepares for the black curtain. Yet the gloom is neither peevish nor pessimistic. The mourning is a loud lamentation. There is the thought of heroic life and heroic death. His tragedy does not hint at Helen of Troy or her successors. There is no amorous parley in life; there is no sensuous regret when Death enters and dominates the scene. This music is nobly male, without thought of feminine influence.

Mr. Chadwick builded better than he perhaps knew when he chose the title that stands at the head of his admirable composition; Melpomene crowned the poets of high and lofty song, and through Melpomene has he gained the laurel.

* * *

Miss Szumowska is the delicate corollary to the weighty proposition, Paderewski. This surely is more gallant than to call her the pilot-fish that precedes the voracious shark—for Paderewski will soon be here. Let us not look upon the graceful pianist who appeared last evening as a species of gasteroteus; let us rather admire her as a pale reflection of the feminine Paderewski; as we have often said before, Paderewski is androgynal.

Fleetly, sweetly, and neatly did Miss Szumowska skim over the keys in the first two movements of Saint Saëns's polished, elegant concerto, like the Camilla mentioned by Mr Alexander Pope. You might well have demanded in the first movement more strength, but there were charming portions of cantabile, and fluent technique in passage-work. Crisp and crystalline was her performance of the Scherzo. In the finale the pace was too hot for her. The rhythm was not well defined, and there was not always distinctness.

The chief charm of Miss Szumowska's playing last night was a feminine refinement that suggested rare lace, a Watteau fan, and the perfume of sandal wood. And then this refinement would be vaporous, and you realized that the player is not an amazon of the piano.

* * *

When Mr. Paur is in doubt, he plays Brahms. It's a safe play in Boston. Let me not be unthankful; let me be duly appreciative of my educational opportunities in this town; but the symphony by Rimsky-Korsakoff, announced for last evening, would at least have gratified curiosity. For some reason or other, the first movement of the Brahms symphony seemed interminable. And for once the Scherzo was the most beautiful of the four movements, because it was the shortest. There is, it is true, a gospel of Johannes Brahms; but Brahms, to use an old New England phrase, is often a painful preacher of the word.

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, MARCH 15, 1896.

Echoes from Yesterday's Symphony Concert.

The reappearance of Miss Antoinette Szumowska as soloist with the Boston orchestra was cordially welcomed by large gatherings Friday afternoon and last evening. She is a very attractive young woman, this talented pupil of Paderewski, and her graceful bearing and unaffected manner contribute not a little to the enjoyment derived from listening to her playing.

She made an extremely favorable impression when first heard here with the Symphony orchestra, a year ago, and at a recital given a few weeks since added materially to her popularity in Boston. Her performance last evening was applauded with much enthusiasm, and she was recalled half a dozen times.

She played Saint-Saens' concerto for piano, No. 2, a very brilliant and exacting composition, one which offers excellent opportunities for displaying a pianist's virtuosity. It abounds in brilliant running passages and complicated arrangements of octaves and chords, all requiring extreme fecility of finger work.

Miss Szumowska's fingers are wonderfully flexible, and she plays the most rapid passages with exactness and delightful clearness. Indeed, so far as digital dexterity is concerned, her equal has rarely been heard here. This accomplishment was particularly evident yesterday in her performance of the brilliant unaccompanied cadenza in the first movement, which was splendidly played, and won cordial recognition from the audience.

In certain portions of the concerto the orchestration is very elaborate, and in these passages Miss Szumowska was heard to the least advantage; in fact, sometimes not heard at all, for she is far from being a robust player. Great strength is not, however, to be expected from a woman.

One of the especially pleasing features of her playing is the effective use she makes of the pedals in producing singing tones. This production of "singing tone" is one of Paderewski's specialties, and he seems to have been very successful in teaching the art to his pupil.

Brahms' symphony No. 2, in D major, was in respect to solidity the feature of the orchestral program. It was given a superb performance under Mr Paur's direction, and the audience tried very hard to enjoy the many mysterious beauties of the score. A portion of the gathering probably succeeded in this commendable effort, but the majority gave evidence of longing for something more lucid.

This symphony is unquestionably a noble work, rich in grand harmonic effects, but it is of excessive length, and its numerous repetitions and massive elaborations prove severely taxing to the attention of an average audience. The third movement is an exception, however, for it contains one of the most graceful, melodious and altogether charming minuets ever written. It was exquisitely played by the orchestra, and earned the one hearty burst of applause accorded the performance of the symphony.

Mr George W. Chadwick's dramatic overture in D minor entitled "Melpomene," was played with splendid expression, spirit and artistic finish. It is a delightful work, thoroughly scholarly in treatment, rich in delicious melodies and abounding in elaborate and strikingly brilliant orchestral effects. Its performance was very welcome.

The following program is announced for this week's rehearsal and concert: Symphony No. 4, dramatic, Rubinstein; three Hungarian dances, Nos. 19, 15 and 21, Brahms-Dvorak; andante from second symphony, Weber; overture, Abu Hassan, Weber.

Gazette

enjoys. That Boston's merchants appreciate this fact is shown by the advertising columns of the Gazette, as compared with those of other weekly society papers.

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 15.

The Symphony Concert.

The eighteenth concert of the Symphony Orchestra was given last night in Music Hall. The programme was as follows:

Overture, "Melpomene".....George W. Chadwick
Concerto for Pianoforte, G-minor.....Saint-Saëns
Symphony No. 2..... .....Brahms
(Soloist, Miss Antoinette Szumowska.

This programme is another proof of the liberality with which Mr. Paur deals with our local composers, and never before since the Symphony concerts were inaugurated have native composers had so many opportunities for having their works played. The "Melpomene" overture is not new, but to have it interpreted by the Symphony Orchestra will be an encouragement and a stimulus to Mr. Chadwick to write another overture at his leisure, and so add to the list of his admirable compositions. It is naturally a discouragement to our local geniuses to labor for months or years at elaborating an overture or a suite and then be unable to have the work played. The liberal policy pursued by Mr. Paur will doubtless result in the production of native works that the world will not willingly let die.

Miss Szumowska was in one of her happiest moods; she has conquered several of the small faults that formerly marred her playing. Her technical work now, as always, is beyond praise, but she is also the rare artist, gifted with intelligence, feeling and interpretative skill. Her reading of the Saint Saens concerto was admirable in almost every respect. The second movement was given with rare grace, delicacy and lightness, and the last movement with great brilliancy and dash. Occasionally there was a slight fault of omission and commission, especially in some of the rapid passages when notes were dropped or slurred; but the faults were few compared with the many merits, and it is doubtful if ever before Miss Szumowska did so much justice to her talents. It was the graceful, brilliant, dainty playing of a finished artist, and won enthusiastic applause, Miss Szumowska being repeatedly called forward to bow her thanks.

American Art Journal.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 14, 1896.

ARTHUR FOOTE'S SUITE FOR ORCHESTRA, D MINOR, OP. 36.

Last Saturday night the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its seventeenth concert, with the following program: Suite, D minor, op. 36, Arthur Foote; Concerto for violoncello, A minor (Schumann), Mr. Leo Schulz; Symphony, G minor, Mozart.

As will be seen, the Suite by Mr. Arthur Foote was the one novelty on the list, and the work is most creditable to its composer. It is demonstrably the result of hard work, patience and knowledge, and technically it will win the approval of musicians. Inspiration or spontaneity are no longer expected in orchestral work. If the young composer writes correctly; if he has a fair knowledge of orchestral effects, it is no longer demanded that his work shall be born of the fulness of ideas. Tone color and odd and unexpected harmonies are everything; dignity or importance of ideas nothing. If monotony is the result of faulty theory, we excuse it by calling it erudition, and feel remorse for the yawns with which nature punishes us for being so intensely modern.

The Suite is the work of a man of talent; it has nothing new to say, but it says old things with suavity and with irreproachable good manners. It is work manufactured in the best manner, and on an approved and fashionable model. It need not be ashamed of going into good society, or of receiving the deserved approval of well bred people. Our era is characterized by the absence of genius, and so talent of all kinds has the opportunity to distinguish itself. We do not expect passion, pathos, tenderness, or any emotion whatever in our works of art; but we do insist that correctness and oddity shall supply the place of thought and feeling. Mr. Foote is a modern and he fully understands what modern art lovers expect; he pleases without exciting us, he puts no strain on the heart, head or memory. We listen to him with respect, part with him in the friendliest manner and then put on our hats and overcoats and talk about the weather or of the next epidemic of influenza. Genius is more uncomfortable and less courteous; it forces itself on the memory and makes us feel our own bitterness; it warms our blood, thrills our nerves and brings the tears to our eyes, and makes us ashamed of facing our friends. Mr. Foote's Suite never adds to the number of our heart beats; it is irreproachable in this as in other things. One can even write of it without vulgar enthusiasm and placidly look forward to the time when Mr. Foote will honor us and himself by producing another suite, concerto or symphony, for to the modern composer, the difference in art forms is simply a question of time and labor, and not of degree and inspiration. It deserves to be added that Mr. Foote's Suite belongs to the better class of academic music; it is dignified and effective work. The third movement is most ingeniously developed and worked out in its seven variations, and the last movement is impressive and fiery. The work aroused much enthusiasm, and at its conclusion, Mr. Foote was called out to bow his thanks.

PHILIP WOOLF.

---

[104]

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCIX., NO. 75.
SUNDAY, MARCH 15, 1896.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Brilliant Performance of Chadwick's "Melpomene."

Full Justice Done the Overture by Mr. Paur and His Orchestra—Very Fine Reading of the Brahms Symphony No. 2, D-Major—Miss Antoinette Szumowska the Soloist.

The selections for the 18th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, last night were:

Overture, "Melpomene".....G. W. Chadwick
Concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, G-minor....
Saint-Saens
Symphony No. 2, D-major.....Brahms

Miss Antoinette Szumowska was the soloist.

Increased familiarity with Mr. Chadwick's overture enlarges respect for it. The work wears well and holds its own firmly. Its color, though tragic, is never overcharged, and the large and profound dignity befitting the theme has never been lost sight of by the composer. Temperance and keen artistic judgment and feeling, seconded by fine skill and unerring taste, are everywhere apparent. The clearness and beauty of the orchestration, notably in regard to the wood wind, and the always effective and well considered contrasts in tone color, impart a steady charm and interest to the score. The overture is fairly entitled to rank prominently with the best achievements in its kind that have come from the hand of a native composer. Full justice was done it by Mr. Paur and his orchestra, and prolonged applause followed its performance.

Mr. Paur, who evidences a deep and sympathetic appreciation of Brahms, gave an exceptionally fine reading of the symphony. Not a point was missed, and all that there is of grace, force and color in the work was brought out perfectly. The opening movement has never been more thoroughly interpreted than it was last night, and the pretty allegretto grazioso, with its piquant, rhythmic daintiness, was delightfully accented. But, oh, the wearisome length of the first allegro and the interminable toying with its brief leading subject, to no discoverable end except exhausting pedagogically all possibilities of thematic development, until at last resentful exasperation is stimulated by the ever-recurring repetitions!

Miss Szumowska has gained something of repose since she was last heard at these concerts. Her performance of the concerto was abundant in graces of style and charm of technique. The opening allegro was given with appropriate breadth and dignity, and the allegretto with brilliancy and clearness. More of maturity in taste and flexibility in sentiment might have been desired, but that will come by and by. In the finale, the young artiste was less successful. She took it at a rapid pace, which she could not always sustain with clearness of execution. The result was that some passages were blurred and others were unduly hurried and even clipped short, rendering it far from easy for the conductor and the orchestra to follow her with precision. As the movement progressed the pace began to tell on her fingers, and she became nervous, which did not mend matters. However, toward the close the artiste recovered, and the animated coda was wound up with great spirit and brilliancy, and a stormy round of applause and several recalls rewarded her.

Miss Szumowska has every qualification to win a high place in her art. Already her playing indicates the innate artist. What she most lacks is individuality and independence in style, but, with greater experience, this shortcoming will doubtless disappear.

The programme for the next concert is: Symphony No. 4, "Dramatic," Rubinstein; three Hungarian dances, Brahms-Dvork; andante from symphony No. 2, Weber; overture, "Abu Hassan," Weber. There will be no soloist.

Boston Journal.
SUNDAY, MARCH 15, 1896.

Eighteenth Concert of the Fifteenth Season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall Last Evening—Miss Szumowska the Soloist.

The program of the Symphony concert last evening, Mr. Paur, conductor, was as follows:

Overture "Melpomene".....Chadwick
Concerto No. 2 for piano, G minor.....
Saint-Saens
Symphony No. 2, D major.....Brahms

The program-book says that Mr. Chadwick's overture might have had a sub-title "Overture to an Imaginary Tragedy." But the title is "Melpomene; Dramatic Overture," whatever was the original intention of specification.

"Melpomene" is enough as it stands. This Muse presided over all melancholy subjects, as well as tragedy; for did not Horace write:

"Praecipe lugubres
Cantus Melpomene?"

She was dignified in look, stature and dress, this daughter of Zeus and Mnemosyne, and yet, according to one myth, she loved Achelous and bore unto him the Sirens, those fair creatures designed for man's destruction. Who, pray, will unriddle this riddle? The Sirens are the children of the Tragic Muse, who in turn was the daughter of the All-Powerful and Memory.

No doubt the program book is right. Mr. Chadwick evidently had a tragedy in mind; he did not attempt to exploit musically a strange family tree. His music is indeed tragic, nobly tragic. The very introduction prepares for the black curtain. Yet the gloom is neither peevish nor pessimistic. The mourning is a loud lamentation. There is the thought of heroic life and heroic death. His tragedy does not hint at Helen of Troy or her successors. There is no amorous parley in life; there is no sensuous regret when Death enters and dominates the scene. This music is nobly male, without thought of feminine influence.

Mr. Chadwick builded better than he perhaps knew when he chose the title that stands at the head of his admirable composition; Melpomene crowned the poets of high and lofty song, and through Melpomene has he gained the laurel.

* * *

Miss Szumowska is the delicate corollary to the weighty proposition, Paderewski. This surely is more gallant than to call her the pilot-fish that precedes the voracious shark—for Paderewski will soon be here. Let us not look upon the graceful pianist who appeared last evening as a species of gasterosteus; let us rather admire her as a pale reflection of the feminine Paderewski; as we have often said before, Paderewski is androgynal.

Fleetly, sweetly, and neatly did Miss Szumowska skim over the keys in the first two movements of Saint Saëns's polished, elegant concerto, like the Camilla mentioned by Mr Alexander Pope. You might well have demanded in the first movement more strength, but there were charming portions of cantabile, and fluent technique in passagework. Crisp and crystalline was her performance of the Scherzo. In the finale the pace was too hot for her. The rhythm was not well defined, and there was not always distinctness.

The chief charm of Miss Szumowska's playing last night was a feminine refinement that suggested rare lace, a Watteau fan, and the perfume of sandal wood. And then this refinement would be vaporous, and you realized that the player is not an amazon of the piano.

* * *

When Mr. Paur is in doubt, he plays Brahms. It's a safe play in Boston. Let me not be unthankful; let me be duly appreciative of my educational opportunities in this town; but the symphony by Rimsky-Korsakoff, announced for last evening, would at least have gratified curiosity. For some reason or other, the first movement of the Brahms symphony seemed interminable. And for once the Scherzo was the most beautiful of the four movements, because it was the shortest. There is, it is true, a gospel of Johannes Brahms; but Brahms, to use an old New England phrase, is often a painful preacher of the word.

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, MARCH 15, 1896.

Echoes from Yesterday's Symphony Concert.

The reappearance of Miss Antoinette Szumowska as soloist with the Boston orchestra was cordially welcomed by large gatherings Friday afternoon and last evening. She is a very attractive young woman, this talented pupil of Paderewski, and her graceful bearing and unaffected manner contribute not a little to the enjoyment derived from listening to her playing.

She made an extremely favorable impression when first heard here with the Symphony orchestra, a year ago, and at a recital given a few weeks since added materially to her popularity in Boston. Her performance last evening was applauded with much enthusiasm, and she was recalled half a dozen times.

She played Saint-Saens' concerto for piano, No. 2, a very brilliant and exacting composition, one which offers excellent opportunities for displaying a pianist's virtuosity. It abounds in brilliant running passages and complicated arrangements of octaves and chords, all requiring extreme fecility of finger work.

Miss Szumowska's fingers are wonderfully flexible, and she plays the most rapid passages with exactness and delightful clearness. Indeed, so far as digital dexterity is concerned, her equal has rarely been heard here. This accomplishment was particularly evident yesterday in her performance of the brilliant unaccompanied cadenza in the first movement, which was splendidly played, and won cordial recognition from the audience.

In certain portions of the concerto the orchestration is very elaborate, and in these passages Miss Szumowska was heard to the least advantage; in fact, sometimes not heard at all, for she is far from being a robust player. Great strength is not, however, to be expected from a woman.

One of the especially pleasing features of her playing is the effective use she makes of the pedals in producing singing tones. This production of "singing tone" is one of Paderewski's specialties, and he seems to have been very successful in teaching the art to his pupil.

Brahms' symphony No. 2, in D major, was in respect to solidity the feature of the orchestral program. It was given a superb performance under Mr Paur's direction, and the audience tried very hard to enjoy the many mysterious beauties of the score. A portion of the gathering probably succeeded in this commendable effort, but the majority gave evidence of longing for something more lucid.

This symphony is unquestionably a noble work, rich in grand harmonic effects, but it is of excessive length, and its numerous repetitions and massive elaborations prove severely taxing to the attention of an average audience. The third movement is an exception, however, for it contains one of the most graceful, melodious and altogether charming minuets ever written. It was exquisitely played by the orchestra, and earned the one hearty burst of applause accorded the performance of the symphony.

Mr George W. Chadwick's dramatic overture in D minor entitled "Melpomene," was played with splendid expression, spirit and artistic finish. It is a delightful work, thoroughly scholarly in treatment, rich in delicious melodies and abounding in elaborate and strikingly brilliant orchestral effects. Its performance was very welcome.

The following program is announced for this week's rehearsal and concert: Symphony No. 4, dramatic, Rubinstein; three Hungarian dances, Nos. 19, 15 and 21, Brahms-Dvorak; andante from second symphony, Weber; overture, Abu Hassan, Weber.

Gazette

enjoys. That Boston's merchants appreciate this fact is shown by the advertising columns of the Gazette, as compared with those of other weekly society papers.

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 15.

The Symphony Concert.

The eighteenth concert of the Symphony Orchestra was given last night in Music Hall. The programme was as follows:

Overture, "Melpomene".....George W. Chadwick
Concerto for Pianoforte, G-minor.....Saint-Saëns
Symphony No. 2.....Brahms
Soloist, Miss Antoinette Szumowska.

This programme is another proof of the liberality with which Mr. Paur deals with our local composers, and never before since the Symphony concerts were inaugurated have native composers had so many opportunities for having their works played. The "Melpomene" overture is not new, but to have it interpreted by the Symphony Orchestra will be an encouragement and a stimulus to Mr. Chadwick to write another overture at his leisure, and so add to the list of his admirable compositions. It is naturally a discouragement to our local geniuses to labor for months or years at elaborating an overture or a suite and then be unable to have the work played. The liberal policy pursued by Mr. Paur will doubtless result in the production of native works that the world will not willingly let die.

Miss Szumowska was in one of her happiest moods; she has conquered several of the small faults that formerly marred her playing. Her technical work now, as always, is beyond praise, but she is also the rare artist, gifted with intelligence, feeling and interpretative skill. Her reading of the Saint Saens concerto was admirable in almost every respect. The second movement was given with rare grace, delicacy and lightness, and the fast movement with great brilliancy and dash. Occasionally there was a slight fault of omission and commission, especially in some of the rapid passages when notes were dropped or slurred; but the faults were few compared with the many merits, and it is doubtful if ever before Miss Szumowska did so much justice to her talents. It was the graceful, brilliant, dainty playing of a finished artist, and won enthusiastic applause, Miss Szumowska being repeatedly called forward to bow her thanks.

American Art Journal.
NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 14, 1896.

ARTHUR FOOTE'S SUITE FOR ORCHESTRA, D MINOR, OP. 36.

Last Saturday night the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its seventeenth concert, with the following program: Suite, D minor, op. 36, Arthur Foote; Concerto for violoncello, A minor (Schumann), Mr. Leo Schulz; Symphony, G minor, Mozart.

As will be seen, the Suite by Mr. Arthur Foote was the one novelty on the list, and the work is most creditable to its composer. It is demonstrably the result of hard work, patience and knowledge, and technically it will win the approval of musicians. Inspiration or spontaneity are no longer expected in orchestral work. If the young composer writes correctly; if he has a fair knowledge of orchestral effects, it is no longer demanded that his work shall be born of the fulness of ideas. Tone color and odd and unexpected harmonies are everything; dignity or importance of ideas nothing. If monotony is the result of faulty theory, we excuse it by calling it erudition, and feel remorse for the yawns with which nature punishes us for being so intensely modern.

The Suite is the work of a man of talent; it has nothing new to say, but it says old things with suavity and with irreproachable good manners. It is work manufactured in the best manner, and on an approved and fashionable model. It need not be ashamed of going into good society, or of receiving the deserved approval of well bred people. Our era is characterized by the absence of genius, and so talent of all kinds has the opportunity to distinguish itself. We do not expect passion, pathos, tenderness, or any emotion whatever in our works of art; but we do insist that correctness and oddity shall supply the place of thought and feeling. Mr. Foote is a modern and he fully understands what modern art lovers expect; he pleases without exciting us, he puts no strain on the heart, head or memory. We listen to him with respect, part with him in the friendliest manner and then put on our hats and overcoats and talk about the weather or of the next epidemic of influenza. Genius is more uncomfortable and less courteous; it forces itself on the memory and makes us feel our own bitterness; it warms our blood, thrills our nerves and brings the tears to our eyes, and makes us ashamed of facing our friends. Mr. Foote's Suite never adds to the number of our heart beats; it is irreproachable in this as in other things. One can even write of it without vulgar enthusiasm and placidly look forward to the time when Mr. Foote will honor us and himself by producing another suite, concerto or symphony, for to the modern composer, the difference in art forms is simply a question of time and labor, and not of degree and inspiration. It deserves to be added that Mr. Foote's Suite belongs to the better class of academic music; it is dignified and effective work. The third movement is most ingeniously developed and worked out in its seven variations, and the last movement is impressive and fiery. The work aroused much enthusiasm, and at its conclusion, Mr. Foote was called out to bow his thanks.

PHILIP WOOLF.

[104]

...N DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, MAR. 16, 1896.

Symphony Concert Devoted to Composers of the Present.

Last Saturday's symphony concert presented a programme devoted entirely to composers of the present, and even the substitution of a classic Brahms symphony for the more modern work of Balakireff did not deprive the list of its contemporary character. What the Russian symphony might have been cannot be told, but it is certain that the German work kept the concert within the limits of strict classicality.

The evening began with an admirable presentation of Chadwick's "Melpomene" overture. Every phrase was brought out with remarkable clearness, and with a delicacy of shading that deserves high praise. This is a work, too, that deserves a careful reading. Its themes are always earnest and sincere, its contrasts are well brought out but never overdrawn, its climaxes are forcible without becoming exaggerated. It contains little or none of the modern sensationalism, but says its say with a measured dignity not unworthy of the tragic muse of antiquity. The prominence of reed and wood-wind in the color-scheme is another thing that imparts an ancient flavor to the music. English horn and oboe were demanded with a persistence worthy of the old Romans themselves, and in our orchestra it goes without saying that they were always excellently played. The impressive horn passages of the development were effectively given, while the fortissimo climax of the coda, followed by a crash on the drums, was powerful enough to suggest that the murder of sleep was the tragedy implied in the title.

Miss Antoinette Szumowska was the soloist. This artist has already been heard here during the present season, and so has the Saint-Saens G-minor concerto. A hearing of the two in combination only increased the admiration that had previously been accorded to each separately. In the opening measures Miss Szumowska displayed a surety of touch that augured well for the success of her performance. The whole of the opening andante was with just the proper dynamic force, and the ensemble between piano and orchestra was well-nigh perfect. But it was in the second movement that the soloist's style had its best exemplification. The bright, sparkling theme that begins the allegretto, and forms one of its chief charms, afforded an excellent chance for the display of the charming grace and delicate crispness that characterize her playing. The final presto was taken at a rattling pace, and became an exciting exhibition of technique. At times there seemed a slight lack of power, but this fault was only temporary, and even if she did not always reach the standard of virtuosity attained by Sieveking in the movement, she gave it with a clearness that ought to please the conservatives in the present degenerate era of pianoforte pounding.

The Brahms second symphony ended the concert. The reading of this noble work was all that Mr. Paur's previous successes had led the public to expect. It was given with the requisite thoroughness of analysis and sympathetic understanding, and proved that Brahms need not be treated as a supernatural being whose utterances are unintelligible to ordinary mortals. A few more such readings will do away with the senseless fashion of regarding every Brahms work with a shrug and a smile just because some of his writings are too abstruse to suit the popular taste. Studied skill and artificial devices of composition are always present in this particular symphony, and there are moments when they lead to an undue prolixity. But this is not enough to obscure the melodic beauties of the work, and its wealth of musical ideas ought to appeal to every auditor who is content to take his themes without an excess of the ultra-modern orchestral spice. That Brahms is the greatest modern composer is not so absolutely certain as some of his admirers would have people believe; it may safely be affirmed, however, that public appreciation of his works is sure to increase greatly in the near future.

Arthur Elson.

The Boston Traveler
MONDAY, MARCH 16, 1896.

THE SYMPHONY.

Mlle. Szumowska's Clean Cut and Brilliant Playing—A Brahms Symphony.

Fifteenth season Boston Symphony Orchestra; eighteenth concert. Mlle. Szumowska, soloist. The programme:

Overture, "Melpomene".....G. W. Chadwick
Concerto for pianoforé, No. 2, G minor.... " Saint-Saens
Symphony No. 2, D major.....Brahms

The "Melpomene" stands the test of repe[tition] admirably. Its largeness, dignity, classic beauty and inherent musical worth make it certain of existence for some time to come. Mr. Chadwick has done very little—perhaps nothing—of more than this one overture. It is a [work] we can send across the water with entire confidence. It was read with [accuracy] and in a style befitting its [character].

Mlle. Szumowska gave an excellent account of herself in the lovely and bubbling Saint Saens concerto. She has a crisp and exceedingly clean-cut technique, a touch of more than ordinary [beauty] and a poetic instinct not always found in a woman. She may be a feminine replica of Paderewski, her teacher, but even granting that, she plays with a considerable amount of authority in the [manner] of interpreting the composer. Her [technical] points are undoubtedly reminiscent of the great Pole, and they are not the less agreeable for that. It seems to [us] that Szumowska is in many respects the best equipped and most satisfactory woman pianist who has come to Boston [for] years.

The Brahms symphony is the same odd [curious] medley of passages of rare beauty and periods of great tediousness. The first and third movements will always delight by their melodic elegance and graceful treatment. The slow movement is in Brahms' most uncompromisingly academic vein, and the last movement is a conspicuous example of fine thematic material overburdened and obscured by [over]fine development. Yet the symphony [has] power and elegance enough to warrant continued rehearing, and this occasion it was played in a masterly fashion. Surely Brahms is Mr. Paur's

Boston Commercial
MONDAY, MARCH 16, 1896.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the eighteenth Symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Chadwick: Dramatic overture, "Melpomene."
Saint-Saëns: Concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, in G minor, opus 22.
Brahms: Symphony No. 2, in D major, opus 73.
Miss Antoinette Szumowska was the pianist.

Mr. Chadwick's "Melpomene" overture is more and more of a solid satisfaction, the more one hears it. Titles do not always mean very much; but they at least mean something, and one cannot grudge a composer the pleasure of giving his audience the hint a title conveys, so long as he shows in his work that he has not been his title's slave. If he has really mastered the idea contained in his title, and not been mastered by it, both he and his audience are generally safe. He will have written music which can appeal to his listeners as such; and they, in turn, will not be disposed to let the question, "Does the music really fill the bill?" stand between them and their appreciation of his composition as a work of art. Upon the whole, it is a matter of quite secondary importance whether music "fill the bill" or not; the main point is whether it is fine music or not. Yet, in spite of all this, few of us are such hard-and-fast purists that we are not conscious of a certain feeling of satisfaction when a composition, which we recognize as already fine in itself, thoroughly comes up to the specifications implied in its title. To our mind, Mr. Chadwick's overture does this conspicuously. He has taken his title in its highest sense, and well lived up to it in his music. Our idea of Melpomene, as the Muse of Tragedy, is inseparable from that of a certain classic beauty of form and proportion, a certain dignity and measure in expression. Eliminate these, and Tragedy becomes mere Melodrama. In this overture of his, Mr. Chadwick has preserved just enough of the classic musical spirit, of the classic modes of musical expression, to give the strenuous romanticism which is, after all, the most salient trait in the composition just the due tinge of tragic dignity. The work is not only full of vigor and beauty, and very stoutly built, but is altogether noble in character, and impressive as only noble things can be. The overture was excellently well played.

Brahm's D major symphony—which was substituted on second thoughts for Rimsky-Korsakoff's (not Balakirev's) "Antar," announced last week—is always welcome. Nowhere has Brahms shown himself more thoroughly possessed with the spirit of musical beauty. The symphony was evidently played con amore, with that enthusiasm our orchestra always shows for Brahms. Only the tempo of the first movement, Allegro non troppo, struck us as inexplicably slow. "Allegro non troppo" does not mean "not Allegro at all!" The movement dragged terribly. One almost trembles to think of what excesses in the opposite direction the reaction will bring with it, when this modern passion for slow Allegros has burnt itself out. Otherwise, the performance was capital.

Saint-Saens's G. Minor concerto still well holds its high position among modern pianoforte concertos; one may almost call it a perfect work. But Miss Szumowska, sad to say, was by no means in her best form last Saturday evening. She was plainly very nervous, and showed neither the mastery over herself nor the music that she has taught us to expect from her. You could not but feel the artist in her, the fineness of mental fibre that she has so often shown before; but the physical mastery was not there. She too often ran away with herself—as the saying is—at times to an extent that made accompanying her a real tour de force. Miss Szumowska has done far better here before, and will do better again; but it was not her night.

The next programme is: Rubinstein, symphony No. 4, in D minor, "Dramatic," opus 95; Brahms-Dvorak, three Hungarian Dances, Nos. 19, 15, and 21; Weber, (a) Andante from symphony No. 2, in C major; (b) Overture to "Abu Hassan."

The Boston Courier.
SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 15, 1896.

Miss Szumowska's performance of Saint-Saens' second pianoforte concerto, in the eighteenth Symphony programme, cast upon hers elf and her art the brightest and most shining lights in which they have yet been seen. The French vivacity, grace, deftness, fineness, proportion and sparkle of the author's mind and manner evidently appealed to her, so that she exhibited a nicer and quicker susceptibility to both mood and form than she has previously shown. The rapid tempi assigned for two of the movements and the agile virtuosity required in them fully matched her heretofore noticed disposition to make fast speed at almost any cost, while the distinct pronunciation and frequent repetition by the orchestra of the themes and their mutations kept her in close faithfulness to rhythm and accent. Her finger work was deliciously clear, her octaves and chords largely and squarely struck, her interest and animation unfailing and her strength maintaining itself adequately to the end of a concerto which, although not very long, does not spare the player at all or provide many easy passages in which he can "loaf and invite his soul" and his technique.

It was good to hear Mr. Chadwick's "Melpomene' overture again and so soon after the sonata spoken of in the Kneisel critique. For it belies not its name, but in brief compass invokes the tragic muse and sketches her dominion. From the faint, faraway menace of the sombre introduction, we pass by episodic steps through approach, engagement, onset, doubt, expectancy, and almost fury, to the one sudden fall of the thunderbolt of doom. Then, after a pause, come melancholy, grave content, monody and the solemn return—but now as a recorder of fate and fact—of the warning and prophecy which began the work.

Brahms's second symphony ended the concert, and was well and completely rendered, as also were the other two numbers.

For Saturday night next this is the promise: Rubinstein, Symphony No. 4, "Dramatic;" Brahms—Dvorak, Three Hungarian Dances, Nos. 19, 15 and 21; a. Weber, Andante from Second Symphony; b. Weber. Overture, "Abu Hassan."

Howard Malcom Ticknor.

The Musical Courier.
NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 18, 1896.

The program of the eighteenth Symphony concert was:

Overture, Melpomene.....Chadwick
Concerto No. 2, for piano, G minor.....Saint-Saëns
Symphony No. 2, D major.....Brahms

You know this overture by Chadwick? To me it is a nobly tragic work. The tragedy that he imagines is not cryptic, mystic. I do not believe that any woman caught the chief male in her meshes of perfumed hair. This music hints at conflict, of the delight of battle, of heroic death under the imperturbable sky. Melpomene crowned the poets of high and lofty song; through Melpomene did Chadwick gain the laurel.

Given the weighty proposition Paderewski, and you have the fragrant, delicate corollary Miss Szumowska. The charm of her playing last night was its feminine refinement. One might have demanded reasonably more breadth and power in the graver portions of the first movement, but there was haunting cantabile and there was elegance in passage work. Crisp and crystalline was the scherzo under her fleet fingers. The pace of the finale was too hot for absolute accuracy and distinctness, and the rhythm was not sharply defined. Miss Szumowska suggests in her playing the odor of sandalwood.

The Antar of Rimsky-Korsakoff had been announced, but it was omitted, and Mr. Paur, in doubt, played Brahms, which is a trump in the Boston musical game. For some reason or other the first movement seemed interminably long and the treatment of the Mendelssohnian theme irritating to madness. But we have often talked of Brahms. This afternoon I happened to see a review in the Pall Mall Gazette of the 2d of a Crystal Palace concert in which Brahms' third symphony was performed. Let us listen to the reviewer, instead of threshing again the old familiar wheat; for although he speaks of the third symphony, his remarks may be applied to nearly all of Brahms' orchestral works of long breath:

"If you ask us whether we like the work we may answer judicially—Yes, with a difference. Much of it is Beethoven, but Beethoven without the throbs, the inspired exaltation of spirit which sets what a great and good critic would call 'the symphonies of the Bonn master' apart from all similar works in the world. Much of it, again, is commonplace stuff, magnificently decorated—for example, the andante movement, which, so far as its melody goes, is very like and no better than the prayer from Zampa, but it is draped and adorned with endless ingenuity, with fine, 'thick' (this may be New Criticism, but it is the only word) masses of sound, and, in a word, with all the resources of a great, learned and industrious Academician. For the rest we far prefer Brahms in this irregular, not unjoyous mood, to the abysmally pretentious and dull Brahms of the Requiem. Even here his gaiety sometimes reminds you of a butterfly that is about the size of an elephant, and it would be superfluous to claim for his irregularity of inspiration that coherence and quickness of combination which make Beethoven so greatly magnificent; but Brahms is a portentous phenomenon, and we are content to gasp and stare before the evidences of his endless intricacy and massiveness of musical emotion."

Philip Hale.

...OVIDENCE JOURNAL.
THURSDAY, MARCH 19, 1896.

Symphony Concert.

The Symphony Orchestra's fifth concert was given last night in Infantry Hall. There was a large audience, who listened with rapt attention to the highly interesting programme, and waxed enthusiastic at times, especially over the superb playing of Mr. Timothie Adamowski, who contributed the solo number. The four numbers given, each representing a different composer, resembled each other in but one respect—that each was a gem of its kind, and presented not a dull moment from first to last. The following selections were played:

Overture to "Leonore," No. 3, in C major, Op. 72.....Ludwig van Beethoven
Andante and Finale from Concerto for Violin.....Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy
Symphony No. 6, in B minor, "Pathetique," Op. 74.....Peter Ilyitch Tschaikowsky
I. Adagio (B minor). Allegro non troppo (B minor).
II. Allegro con grazia (D major).
III. Allegro molto vivace (G major).
IV. Finale: Adagio lamentoso (B minor).
Overture to "Oberon"...Karl Maria von Weber

Beethoven's overture, which opened the concert, is the most brilliant of the four which he composed at different times for his one opera, "Fidelio"—or, as it was originally known, "Leonore." It is a work of unusual length and profundity for an opera overture, approaching the symphonic form, and is altogether a characteristic piece of Beethoven's workmanship. It abounds in sharp contrasts, and is by no means a thing to be recommended to amateur players; Mr. Paur's band of virtuosi, however, made light work of its difficulties, and performed it with telling effect.

As the programme began with an overture, so it ended with one, the last composition of that great genius, Weber, who died soon after conducting the first performance of "Oberon" in London. This overture has long been a favorite concert piece and small wonder, for it is simply filled with delicious music of every sort, from that which hints of elves and fairies and their moonlight pranks to the rush and swing of the most brilliant climax. Needless to say, it was superbly played.

The chief number of the programme was Tschaikowsky's great sixth symphony. This, too, was a swan song, the last gift of its composer to the world he was destined soon to leave. Weird stories have been circulated regarding the master work of the greatest Russian composer. One runs to the effect that he designed it as his requiem—this, of course, being meant to pair up with the rumor prevalent at the time of his death that he had committed suicide. In the same vein, perhaps, goes the tale that so profound and thrilling is its gloomy character that excitable musicians have been unable to sit out its performance, and have been compelled to seek the seclusion which the corridor grants. This sort of thing stimulates curiosity, and an unmistakable air of expectancy pervaded the audience last night, but no one was compelled to leave the building. But, putting aside subjective impressions, and measuring the symphony from the ordinary musical standpoint, there can be no doubt but that it must be emphatically termed a great work. It is heavily scored, and at times over noisy, but there is always the sense of a great composer with something original to say. The musical workmanship is of the finest, and the themes are pregnant and impressive. Its outlines are massive rather than graceful, and the hide of the Cossack is to be seen now and again beneath the cloak of the modern, as indeed is often the case with Tschaikowsky's music. But a great work it remains, and would alone suffice to make a man's reputation. It was received with much favor.

Mr. Adamowski's viola playing was a revelation, even to his old admirers. The criticism that has been made upon his playing—that he is apt to sacrifice something of the music to a showy style—could not be applied to his performance last evening. It was magnificent playing in every sense of the word, and, wedded to the charming music of Mendelssohn's concerto, brought out a storm of applause that at times could hardly wait for the conclusion of a phrase. It is a significant measure of the quality of this superb orchestra that such a soloist sits in the second seat.

The concert was greatly enjoyed by the large audience, and the symphony in particular freely commented upon. A well-known musician and keen critic announced his conversion to the suicide theory, saying that it sounded to him as if Tschaikowsky was tired of it all. Mr. Adamowski was the hero of the occasion with many.

The sixth and last concert will be given on Wednesday evening, April 22.

[105]

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.

MONDAY MORNING, MAR. 16, 1896.

Symphony Concert Devoted to Composers of the Present.

Last Saturday's symphony concert presented a programme devoted entirely to composers of the present, and even the substitution of a classic Brahms symphony for the more modern work of Balakireff did not deprive the list of its contemporary character. What the Russian symphony might have been cannot be told, but it is certain that the German work kept the concert within the limits of strict classicality.

The evening began with an admirable presentation of Chadwick's "Melpomene" overture. Every phrase was brought out with remarkable clearness, and with a delicacy of shading that deserves high praise. This is a work, too, that deserves a careful reading. Its themes are always earnest and sincere, its contrasts are well brought out but never overdrawn, its climaxes are forcible without becoming exaggerated. It contains little or none of the modern sensationalism, but says its say with a measured dignity not unworthy of the tragic muse of antiquity. The prominence of reed and wood-wind in the color-scheme is another thing that imparts an ancient flavor to the music. English horn and oboe were demanded with a persistence worthy of the old Romans themselves, and in our orchestra it goes without saying that they were always excellently played. The impressive horn passages of the development were effectively given, while the fortissimo climax of the coda, followed by a crash on the drums, was powerful enough to suggest that the murder of sleep was the tragedy implied in the title.

Miss Antoinette Szumowska was the soloist. This artist has already been heard here during the present season, and so has the Saint-Saens G-minor concerto. A hearing of the two in combination only increased the admiration that had previously been accorded to each separately.

In the opening measures Miss Szumowska displayed a surety of touch that augured well for the success of her performance. The whole of the opening andante was with just the proper dynamic force, and the ensemble between piano and orchestra was well-nigh perfect. But it was in the second movement that the soloist's style had its best exemplification. The bright, sparkling theme that begins the allegretto, and forms one of its chief charms, afforded an excellent chance for the display of the charming grace and delicate crispness that characterize her playing. The final presto was taken at a rattling pace, and became an exciting exhibition of technique. At times there seemed a slight lack of power, but this fault was only temporary, and even if she did not always reach the standard of virtuosity attained by Sieveking in the movement, she gave it with a clearness that ought to please the conservatives in the present degenerate era of pianoforte pounding.

The Brahms second symphony ended the concert. The reading of this noble work was all that Mr. Paur's previous successes had led the public to expect. It was given with the requisite thoroughness of analysis and sympathetic understanding, and proved that Brahms need not be treated as a supernatural being whose utterances are unintelligible to ordinary mortals. A few more such readings will do away with the senseless fashion of regarding every Brahms work with a shrug and a smile just because some of his writings are too abstruse to suit the popular taste. Studied skill and artificial devices of composition are always present in this particular symphony, and there are moments when they lead to an undue prolixity. But this is not enough to obscure the melodic beauties of the work, and its wealth of musical ideas ought to appeal to every auditor who is content to take his themes without an excess of the ultra-modern orchestral spice. That Brahms is the greatest modern composer is not so absolutely certain as some of his admirers would have people believe; it may safely be affirmed, however, that public appreciation of his works is sure to increase greatly in the near future.

Arthur Elson.

The Boston Traveler

MONDAY, MARCH 16, 1896.

THE SYMPHONY.

Mlle. Szumowska's Clean Cut and Brilliant Playing—A Brahms Symphony.

Fifteenth season Boston Symphony Orchestra; eighteenth concert. Mlle. Szumowska, soloist. The programme:

Overture, "Melpomene".....G. W. Chadwick
Concerto for pianoforo, No. 2, G minor.... .. Saint-Saens
Symphony No. 2, D major.....Brahms

The "Melpomene" stands the test of repetition admirably. Its largeness, dignity, classic beauty and inherent musical worth make it certain of existence for some time to come. Mr. Chadwick has done very little—perhaps nothing—of more value than this one overture. It is a work that can send across the water with entire confidence. It was read with sympathy and in a style befitting its character.

Mlle. Szumowska gave an excellent account of herself in the lovely and bubbling Saint Saens concerto. She has a crisp and exceedingly clean-cut technique, a touch of more than ordinary beauty and a poetic instinct not always found in a woman. She may be a feminine replica of Paderewski, her teacher, but, even granting that, she plays with a considerable amount of authority in the matter of interpreting the composer. Her technical points are undoubtedly reminiscent of the great Pole, and they are not the less agreeable for that. It seems to us that Szumowska is in many respects the best equipped and most satisfactory woman pianist who has come to Boston for years.

The Brahms symphony is the same old curious medley of passages of rare beauty and periods of great tediousness. The first and third movements will always delight by their melodic elegance and graceful treatment. The slow movement is in Brahms' most uncompromisingly academic style, and the last movement is a conspicuous example of fine thematic material overburdened and obscured by abstruse development. Yet the symphony has power and elegance enough to warrant its continued rehearing. On this occasion it was played in a masterly fashion. Surely Brahms is Mr. Paur's specialty.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, MARCH 16, 1896.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the eighteenth Symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Chadwick: Dramatic overture, "Melpomene."
Saint-Saëns: Concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, in G minor, opus 22.
Brahms: Symphony No. 2, in D major, opus 73.
Miss Antoinette Szumowska was the pianist.

Mr. Chadwick's "Melpomene" overture is more and more of a solid satisfaction, the more one hears it. Titles do not always mean very much; but they at least mean something, and one cannot grudge a composer the pleasure of giving his audience the hint a title conveys, so long as he shows in his work that he has not been his title's slave. If he has really mastered the idea contained in his title, and not been mastered by it, both he and his audience are generally safe. He will have written music which can appeal to his listeners as such; and they, in turn, will not be disposed to let the question, "Does the music really fill the bill?" stand between them and their appreciation of his composition as a work of art. Upon the whole, it is a matter of quite secondary importance whether music "fill the bill" or not; the main point is whether it is fine music or not. Yet, in spite of all this, few of us are such hard-and-fast purists that we are not conscious of a certain feeling of satisfaction when a composition, which we recognize as already fine in itself, thoroughly comes up to the specifications implied in its title. To our mind, Mr. Chadwick's overture does this conspicuously. He has taken his title in its highest sense, and well lived up to it in his music. Our idea of Melpomene, as the Muse of Tragedy, is inseparable from that of a certain classic beauty of form and proportion, a certain dignity and measure in expression. Eliminate these, and Tragedy becomes mere Melodrama. In this overture of his, Mr. Chadwick has preserved just enough of the classic musical spirit, of the classic modes of musical expression, to give the strenuous romanticism which is, after all, the most salient trait in the composition just the due tinge of tragic dignity. The work is not only full of vigor and beauty, and very stoutly built, but is altogether noble in character, and impressive as only noble things can be. The overture was excellently well played.

Brahm's D major symphony—which was substituted on second thoughts for Rimsky-Korsakoff's (not Balakirev's) "Antar," announced last week—is always welcome. Nowhere has Brahms shown himself more thoroughly possessed with the spirit of musical beauty. The symphony was evidently played con amore, with that enthusiasm our orchestra always shows for Brahms. Only the tempo of the first movement, Allegro non troppo, struck us as inexplicably slow. "Allegro non troppo" does not mean "not Allegro at all!" The movement dragged terribly. One almost trembles to think of what excesses in the opposite direction the reaction will bring with it, when this modern passion for slow Allegros has burnt itself out. Otherwise, the performance was capital.

Saint-Saens's G. Minor concerto still well holds its high position among modern pianoforte concertos; one may almost call it a perfect work. But Miss Szumowska, sad to say, was by no means in her best form last Saturday evening. She was plainly very nervous, and showed neither the mastery over herself nor the music that she has taught us to expect from her. You could not but feel the artist in her, the fineness of mental fibre that she has so often shown before; but the physical mastery was not there. She too often ran away with herself—as the saying is—at times to an extent that made accompanying her a real tour de force. Miss Szumowska has done far better here before, and will do better again; but it was not her night.

The next programme is: Rubinstein, symphony No. 4, in D minor, "Dramatic," opus 95; Brahms-Dvorak, three Hungarian Dances, Nos. 19, 15, and 21; Weber, (a) Andante from symphony No. 2, in C major; (b) Overture to "Abu Hassan."

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 15, 1896.

Miss Szumowska's performance of Saint-Saens' second pianoforte concerto, in the eighteenth Symphony programme, cast upon hers elf and her art the brightest and most shining lights in which they have yet been seen. The French vivacity, grace, deftness, fineness, proportion and sparkle of the author's mind and manner evidently appealed to her, so that she exhibited a nicer and quicker susceptibility to both mood and form than she has previously shown. The rapid tempi assigned for two of the movements and the agile virtuosity required in them fully matched her heretofore noticed disposition to make fast speed at almost any cost, while the distinct pronunciation and frequent repetition by the orchestra of the themes and their mutations kept her in close faithfulness to rhythm and accent. Her finger work was deliciously clear, her octaves and chords largely and squarely struck, her interest and animation unfailing and her strength maintaining itself adequately to the end of a concerto which, although not very long, does not spare the player at all or provide many easy passages in which he can "loaf and invite his soul" and his technique.

It was good to hear Mr. Chadwick's "Melpomene' overture again and so soon after the sonata spoken of in the Kneisel critique. For it belies not its name, but in brief compass invokes the tragic muse and sketches her dominion. From the faint, faraway menace of the sombre introduction, we pass by episodic steps through approach, engagement, onset, doubt, expectancy, and almost fury, to the one sudden fall of the thunderbolt of doom. Then, after a pause, come melancholy, grave content, monody and the solemn return—but now as a recorder of fate and fact—of the warning and prophecy which began the work.

Brahms's second symphony ended the concert, and was well and completely rendered, as also were the other two numbers.

For Saturday night next this is the promise: Rubinstein, Symphony No. 4, "Dramatic;" Brahms—Dvorak, Three Hungarian Dances, Nos. 19, 15 and 21; a. Weber, Andante from Second Symphony; b. Weber, Overture, "Abu Hassan."

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 18, 1896.

The program of the eighteenth Symphony concert was:

Overture, Melpomene.....Chadwick
Concerto No. 2, for piano, G minor.....Saint-Saëns
Symphony No. 2, D major.....Brahms

You know this overture by Chadwick? To me it is a nobly tragic work. The tragedy that he imagines is not cryptic, mystic. I do not believe that any woman caught the chief male in her meshes of perfumed hair. This music hints at conflict, of the delight of battle, of heroic death under the imperturbable sky. Melpomene crowned the poets of high and lofty song; through Melpomene did Chadwick gain the laurel.

Given the weighty proposition Paderewski, and you have the fragrant, delicate corollary Miss Szumowska. The charm of her playing last night was its feminine refinement. One might have demanded reasonably more breadth and power in the graver portions of the first movement, but there was haunting cantabile and there was elegance in passage work. Crisp and crystalline was the scherzo under her fleet fingers. The pace of the finale was too hot for absolute accuracy and distinctness, and the rhythm was not sharply defined. Miss Szumowska suggests in her playing the odor of sandalwood.

The Antar of Rimsky-Korsakoff had been announced, but it was omitted, and Mr. Paur, in doubt, played Brahms, which is a trump in the Boston musical game. For some reason or other the first movement seemed interminably long and the treatment of the Mendelssohnian theme irritating to madness. But we have often talked of Brahms. This afternoon I happened to see a review in the Pall Mall Gazette of the 2d of a Crystal Palace concert in which Brahms' third symphony was performed. Let us listen to the reviewer, instead of threshing again the old familiar wheat; for although he speaks of the third symphony, his remarks may be applied to nearly all of Brahms' orchestral works of long breath:

"If you ask us whether we like the work we may answer judicially—Yes, with a difference. Much of it is Beethoven, but Beethoven without the throbs, the inspired exaltation of spirit which sets what a great and good critic would call 'the symphonies of the Bonn master' apart from all similar works in the world. Much of it, again, is commonplace stuff, magnificently decorated—for example, the andante movement, which, so far as its melody goes, is very like and no better than the prayer from Zampa, but it is draped and adorned with endless ingenuity, with fine, 'thick' (this may be New Criticism, but it is the only word) masses of sound, and, in a word, with all the resources of a great, learned and industrious Academician. For the rest we far prefer Brahms in this irregular, not unjoyous mood, to the abysmally pretentious and dull Brahms of the Requiem. Even here his gaiety sometimes reminds you of a butterfly that is about the size of an elephant, and it would be superfluous to claim for his irregularity of inspiration that coherence and quickness of combination which make Beethoven so greatly magnificent; but Brahms is a portentous phenomenon, and we are content to gasp and stare before the evidences of his endless intricacy and massiveness of musical emotion."

PHILIP HALE.

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL.

THURSDAY, MARCH 19, 1896.

Symphony Concert.

The Symphony Orchestra's fifth concert was given last night in Infantry Hall. There was a large audience, who listened with rapt attention to the highly interesting programme, and waxed enthusiastic at times, especially over the superb playing of Mr. Timothie Adamowski, who contributed the solo number. The four numbers given, each representing a different composer, resembled each other in but one respect—that each was a gem of its kind, and presented not a dull moment from first to last. The following selections were played:

Overture to "Leonore," No. 3, in C major, Op. 72.....Ludwig van Beethoven
Andante and Finale from Concerto for Violin.....Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy
Symphony No. 6, in B minor, "Pathetique," Op. 74.....Peter Ilyitch Tschaikowsky
I. Adagio (B minor). Allegro non troppo (B minor).
II. Allegro con grazia (D major).
III. Allegro molto vivace (G major).
IV. Finale: Adagio lamentoso (B minor).
Overture to "Oberon"...Karl Maria von Weber

Beethoven's overture, which opened the concert, is the most brilliant of the four which he composed at different times for his one opera, "Fidelio"—or, as it was originally known, "Leonore." It is a work of unusual length and profundity for an opera overture, approaching the symphonic form, and is altogether a characteristic piece of Beethoven's workmanship. It abounds in sharp contrasts, and is by no means a thing to be recommended to amateur players; Mr. Paur's band of virtuosi, however, made light work of its difficulties, and performed it with telling effect.

As the programme began with an overture, so it ended with one, the last composition of that great genius, Weber, who died soon after conducting the first performance of "Oberon" in London. This overture has long been a favorite concert piece and small wonder, for it is simply filled with delicious music of every sort, from that which hints of elves and fairies and their moonlight pranks to the rush and swing of the most brilliant climax. Needless to say, it was superbly played.

The chief number of the programme was Tschaikowsky's great sixth symphony. This, too, was a swan song, the last gift of its composer to the world he was destined soon to leave. Weird stories have been circulated regarding the master work of the greatest Russian composer. One runs to the effect that he designed it as his requiem—this, of course, being meant to pair up with the rumor prevalent at the time of his death that he had committed suicide. In the same vein, perhaps, goes the tale that so profound and thrilling is its gloomy character that excitable musicians have been unable to sit out its performance, and have been compelled to seek the seclusion which the corridor grants. This sort of thing stimulates curiosity, and an unmistakable air of expectancy pervaded the audience last night, but no one was compelled to leave the building. But, putting aside subjective impressions, and measuring the symphony from the ordinary musical standpoint, there can be no doubt but that it must be emphatically termed a great work. It is heavily scored, and at times over noisy, but there is always the sense of a great composer with something original to say. The musical workmanship is of the finest, and the themes are pregnant and impressive. Its outlines are massive rather than graceful, and the hide of the Cossack is to be seen now and again beneath the cloak of the modern, as indeed is often the case with Tschaikowsky's music. But a great work it remains, and would alone suffice to make a man's reputation. It was received with much favor.

Mr. Adamowski's viola playing was a revelation, even to his old admirers. The criticism that has been made upon his playing—that he is apt to sacrifice something of the music to a showy style—could not be applied to his performance last evening. It was magnificent playing in every sense of the word, and, wedded to the charming music of Mendelssohn's concerto, brought out a storm of applause that at times could hardly wait for the conclusion of a phrase. It is a significant measure of the quality of this superb orchestra that such a soloist sits in the second seat.

The concert was greatly enjoyed by the large audience, and the symphony in particular freely commented upon. A well-known musician and keen critic announced his conversion to the suicide theory, saying that it sounded to him as if Tschaikowsky was tired of it all. Mr. Adamowski was the hero of the occasion with many.

The sixth and last concert will be given on Wednesday evening, April 22.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, MARCH 22, 1896.

Uninteresting Program at Symphony Concert.

"Chimes of Normandy" to be Sung at the Castle Sq Theater.

Mr and Mrs Henschel—Paderewski's Return—Harmonic Happenings.

The 19th symphony program of the season could not be called very interesting. Rubinstein's "Dramatic" symphony occupied about two-thirds of the time, and the remaining half hour was devoted to Saint-Saens' poem, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel," Weber's overture to "Abu Hassan" and three Hungarian dances by Brahms. Admirers of Rubenstein do not rank his "Dramatic" symphony among his higher compositions, for although the orchestration is elaborate and complex at times there is a lack of coherency about the work which makes it uninteresting, and the frequent repetitions of many pages of the score are really wearisome. This is specially so in the second and fourth movements.

The triplet passages by the strings and the cantabile phrases by the clarinets were beautifully played in the first movement, and the concluding development, with the fusilade of changes from quarter to sixteenth notes, gave ample evidence of the grand ensemble work of the men, for the work by each contingent was as of one player and without a trace of indecision or cloudiness. The dance melody of the second movement was like a melodic oasis in a desert of uninteresting repetitions; the latter scholarly, of course, but to the average auditor reiterated unnecessarily.

The third part of the symphony is rather gloomy and meaningless, and possesses but little with which to inspire players or auditors. The figures given to the horns and clarinets were admirably played, and the interpretation of the whole movement was creditable to the orchestra. In the fourth part the sharp contrasts were conscientiously observed.

The Saint-Saens' poem was a welcome supplement to the Rubinstein's symphony, and the charmingly delicate rhythm of the composition appeared to put every one in good humor. Its irregularity of form, the tripping measures given to the strings, while a sonorous background is furnished by the basses, and the artistic harmonic contrasts are undeniably pleasing, and the men of the orchestra fairly reveled in the dainty work given them. The interpretation aroused the greatest enthusiasm of the concert.

The humor of Weber's overture was deliciously brought out, the pompous themes with mock solemnity by the basses and double basses and the lighter passages by the violins and companion instruments. The three Hungarian dances were splendidly played, especially the 21st, and the performance of this trio was brilliant in every way.

There will be no concert this week. The next rehearsal will be given Thursday afternoon, April 2, to enable the Handel and Haydn society to prepare for the concert Friday evening. Mrs Georg Henschel will be the soloist at the next symphony. The numbers for the orchestra will be as follows: Overture, "Der Portugiesische Gasthof," L. Cherubini; symphony in C minor, op 11 (MS.), Gustav Strube; overture, "Genoveva," Schumann.

Gazette

enjoys. That Boston's merchants appreciate this fact is shown by the advertising columns of the Gazette, as compared with those of other weekly society papers.

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 22.

The Symphony Concert.

The nineteenth concert of the season was given in Music Hall, last night by the Symphony orchestra. The following is the programme:

Symphony No. 4, D-minor.....Rubenstein
Symphonic Poem, A-major, op. 31.....Saint-Saëns
Overture, "Abu Hassan".....Weber
Three Hungarian Dances.....Brahms-Dvorak.

This is a good programme and it received a most artistic interpretation. The Rubenstein symphony loses neither in strength nor beauty by age though the impatient might object that it is a trifle long. Rubenstein remains the master of modern masters, in the largeness and boldness of his ideas, in genuine fiery feeling and in impetuosity of attack. We all know that Rubenstein was lacking in patience thereby differing from his great contemporaries who carve their work inch by inch and labor lovingly over it until it receives its highest finish. On the other hand Rubenstein gives us some delightfully pleasant and restful moments, stimulating the nerves by contrasts, rather than exhausting them by monotonous excitement. The adagio of this "Dramatic" symphony is a fine example of both these merits; it is a glimpse of the pure beauty that the old masters were so proud of dealing with, and one listens to it with an emotion in which there is no trace of pain. It is possible that in his love of beauty for beauty's sake Rubenstein was old fashioned; but the present generation of music lovers, at least, will excuse him for it has not yet reached the condition of being fully satisfied with noise developed on a scientific basis.

The Saint-Saëns work was played with the utmost grace and brilliancy by the orchestra, and one listened to it in pleased content, as to the conversation of a clever man who gives novelty to commonplaces by uttering them in the form of epigrams. As to the Hungarian dances, what Brahms says and Dvorak approves of cannot be wrong. There is a charming, stately liveliness in these dances, suggesting a love poem by Ben Jonson translated into sonorous Greek. The "Abu Hassan" overture is charming, and it was charmingly played by the orchestra.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, MARCH 22, 1896.

Rubinsteins Long, Tedious 4th Symphony.

Yet He Once Said It Was His Favorite Work.

Announcements of the Next Two Weeks—Notes.

The program of the Symphony Concert was as follows:

Symphony No. 4, in D minor, "Dramatic".....Rubinstein
Symphonic poem, "Omphale's Spinning-Wheel".....Saint-Saens
Overture to "Abu Hassan".....Weber
Three Hungarian dances (Nos. 15, 17 and 21).....Brahms
(Scored for orchestra by Dvorak.)

Rubinstein once said in Berlin that of all his symphonies he was fondest of the "Dramatic." He said this at the rehearsal of the symphony, which he conducted Nov. 12, '83. He also remarked that the slow movement was "poor stuff," but the other movements pleased him. Thus he differed in self-estimation from the old minister in Orange County, Vermont, who, when he was about to retire from his charge, concluded his farewell in these memorable words: "My brethren, I have preached many, many sermons; few have pleased God, and none have pleased me."

Truly the scherzo is interesting and original, peculiar in its use of the wood-wind; but the other movements are more attractive to the eyes of the reader of the score than to the ears of the hearer; for the instrumentation is generally so arranged that passages which look as though they should be effective sound strangely commonplace and crude. Passages of importance are given to the wood-wind which are entirely covered by the strings; or elaborate figures are introduced that would only be prominent when played on a piano. Nor is the thought always lofty enough or beautiful enough to shine through the shabby dress.

Rubinstein was right about the slow movement; it is poor stuff, and its sentiment is too often the sentimentalism of the salon. The first movement and the finale are over-elaborated, that is, in Rubinstein's way, and spun out to an appalling length; this symphony was, indeed, written for Russia, where nights are longest. The effect is frittered away by constant repetition. As in certain other large works of Rubinstein, there is the impression of eagerness to begin and pleasure taken in the stretching of the first movement; but when it comes to the labor of development, and omitting and revising, the interest departs and the rest is unhappily the result of perfunctory facility.

There were so many ideas in the composer's head that the moment he began a symphony, he worked ambitiously until the thought of an opera, or a concerto or a piece of chamber music harassed him, and it is as though he said, "I must hurry this thing up; there's something else to be done." An irregular, comparatively untrained genius, this Rubinstein; who, a marvel of industry, yet lacked intense application and had not the gift of rigid self-examination.

The symphony was well played, and the task was not an easy one. The Scherzo was especially well given. The first flute made a false entrance in the slow movement, and there was a trifling raggedness of attack in the finale; but, as I have said, the symphony is full of difficulties. On the whole, it was played admirably.

* * *

The other numbers of the program do not call for extended comment. Saint-Saëns's delightful symphonic poem, with the whirr of the wheel, the voice of the mocking Omphale and the impotent rage of the enamored Hercules, is well known here and warmly appreciated. Perhaps it never gave such keen delight as last evening, when it came directly after the labored and muddily scored symphony.

Weber's opera, "Abu Hassan," tells of our old friend in the "Arabian Nights," who, after he had married the slave of Zobeide, lived riotously, and tried to cheat his creditors and gain gifts from Caliph by feigning death. Is the short opera as hopelessly old-fashioned and tiresome as the short overture, with its 1811 idea of Eastern color in music?

The dances of Brahms played last night are not among his best.

PHILIP HALE.

SATURDAY, MARCH 21, 1896.

BOSTON STANDARD.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.—There is another most excellent program selected for tonight; one, too, which contains elements calculated to please all. We present it in full, as it deserves a hearing: Rubinstein—Symphony No. 4, in D minor, "Dramatic," op. 96; 1 Lento, Allegro moderato; 2 Presto, Allegro non troppo; 3 Adagio; 4 Largo, Allegro con fuoco. Saint-Saens—Symphonic poem, "Le Rouet d'Omphale, op. 31. Weber—Overture to "Abu Hassan" (first time). Brahms—Three Hungarian dances, Nos. 15, 17, 21, Allegretto, Allegretto grazioso, Vivace. Scored for orchestra by Albert Parlow and Antonin Dvorak.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCIX., NO. 82.

SUNDAY, MARCH 22, 1896.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Contrast of Gayety with Gloomy Seriousness.

Rubenstein's "Dramatic" Symphony Almost Depressingly Wearisome, but Beautifully Played—Saint-Saens' Tuneful Symphonic Poem—Spirited Weber Overture.

The programme for the 19th of this season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, which was given in Music Hall last evening, was:

Symphony No. 4, in D-minor, "Dramatic,".....Rubinstein
Symphonic poem, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel".....Saint-Saens
Overture, "Abu Hassan".....Weber
Hungarian dances, Nos. 15, 17 and 21..Brahms

Of Rubinstein's six symphonies, the "Dramatic" is one of the most ambitious and the least attractive. It takes over an hour in the performance, and its gloomy seriousness is unbroken except by the scherzo, of which the themes are melodious and flowing, and the instrumentation delightfully piquant. The development of each movement is carried to such unusual length and with so much of dry profundity that the work is almost depressingly wearisome, and despite its scholarly harmonic treatment and its rich and solid instrumentation it fails to interest as a whole. It lacks the melodiousness, the breadth and the fine contrasts in effect that mark his "Ocean" symphony, and its prevailing sombreness of color and its excess of labored pedagogy repel the hearer and leave him cold and fatigued. It had been played here twice before, but on neither occasion did it make a favorable impression, by reason of its inordinate length, its frequent vagueness and its monotony of sentiment. It was carefully read, and beautifully played, but on the whole was endured rather than enjoyed, except in regard to the scherzo, which drew forth the only hearty manifestation of pleasure that rewarded the performance.

The grace, the tunefulness and the clearness of the familiar Saint-Saens symphonic poem which followed came as a grateful relief after the spun-out gloom of the symphony. It was exquisitely interpreted by Mr. Paur and was played by the orchestra with incomparable delicacy.

The Weber overture is the veriest of lively trifles, of which the gaiety and the tunefulness still charm, despite the aspect of quaintness that has settled on it. It has little except the spirit and fire of the violin passages toward the close, that recall the composer of the overtures to "Oberon," "Preciosa," Der Freyschutz" and "Euryanthe," but then it was written only to usher in a one-act comic operetta, and sprightliness and humor were all that was demanded. These it has in all necessary fulness. It was brilliantly played and was well worth the hearing.

The Brahms dances were scored for orchestra by Dvorak, and were heard in this version for the first time at these concerts. The instrumentation is characteristic and colors and accents the dances with impressive effect. Mr. Paur read them in a manner that brought out all that was in them. Not a point was lost that could emphasize and bring out clearly the varying moods of the music.

There will be no rehearsal or concert this week. The next rehearsal will take place on Thursday afternoon, April 2, the change from Friday being made to provide the opportunity for the arrangement of the stage for the Handel and Haydn concert on the evening of that day. The programme will be: Overture, "L'Hotellerie Portugaise," Cherubini; symphony in C minor, by Gustav Strub, a member of the Symphony orchestra, and Overture "Genoveva," Schumann. Mrs. Georg Henschel will be the soloist, and will sing two arias not yet announced.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY, MARCH 22, 1896.
(Copyright 1896, Post Publishing Company.)

SYMPHONY CONCERT ATTRACTIONS.

The nineteenth symphony last night presented four composers, opening with Rubinstein's fourth symphony ("Dramatic"), the playing of which occupied over an hour.

It presents a number of figures skilfully arranged, interwoven and developed, though in many cases very frequently repeated. As a piece of musical construction it shows a master hand, but its extreme length and general heaviness make it rather dreary. It was read, however, intelligently, and was liberally applauded.

Following it came "Omphale's Spinning Wheel," by Saint-Saens, a dainty thing, full of pleasing melodies and light enough to contrast strongly with what preceded, and the fact that it was exquisitely played added much to its enjoyment.

Von Weber's overture to "Abu Hassan" was also a bright, lively and light composition. It is in one movement and occupies but a few minutes in playing.

Three of Brahms's Hungarian dances closed the programme. They were the more familiar ones, Nos. 15, 17 and 21, and ended in a breezy and light manner a programme drearily enough begun.

There was no soloist, which may account for the comparatively small attendance.

There will be no concert next week, but at that of the following week Mrs. Georg Henschel will sing and the C minor symphony by Gustav Strube will be heard for the first time.

The Official Paper of the City.

MONDAY MORNING, MAR. 23, 1896.

Rubinstein's "Dramatic Symphony" as Heard in Boston.

With Methuselah as auditor, and an eternity to play it in, Rubinstein's "Dramatic Symphony" might be effective, but it is a trifle long for the ordinary three-score-and-ten individual. It might rather be called the "Spasmodic Symphony" for it is built up of a whole host of fragmentary thoughts which are not fused into homogeneity. Its bold chief theme makes a good impression at the outset, and the tender second theme gives just that pairing of the Gentle with the Strong, which seems to be the aesthetic union demanded in every true art-work. It is also a commendable fact that the composer has not called every unusual instrument to his aid but expresses his thought within the limits of classical scoring, only the usual Beethoven forces being required in this work. But here praise must stop, or at least pause to take breath, for the elaboration of the themes is carried to an inordinate length, the first movement alone being nearly 25 minutes long. There are many bold and semi-barbaric touches; one does not need to cratch the Russian to find the Tartar here, and the final cadence pushes the violins to a high position above even the highest orchestral peaks of Beethoven.

The Scherzo is original and very bizarre, and become a splendid study of skilful scoring. Its spasmodic character gives the impression of an epileptic fit set to music, but there are some striking touches in its measures, notably the march-like theme which again struck the keynote of barbaric effect. A better test of the ensemble of an orchestra could scarcely be found, and the fact that this Scherzo was performed without a flaw speaks forcibly for the standard which our orchestra has attained under the leadership of Mr. Paur.

The Adagio is far less effective and seems very conventional, although leading up to a good climax just before the coda, but this same coda closes with some remarkably weak flute sequences, and the whole movement shows that Rubinstein requires bizarreris to make his effects; the reader may recall Thackeray's picture of Louis XIV. without his robes and great wig—that is the symphonic Rubinstein when shorn of his musical surprises and eccentricities, and that was the Rubinstein of this Adagio.

The Finale dealt in syncopations at wholesale, as the first movement had done, and it also gave much reiteration of quaint and original figures. The development was an exhibition rather of the strainings than the strains of music, although there was much knowledge displayed. One bit of canonic work, a species of Fugato, began furiously upon the bassoon and was carried through the woodwind with fine effect; the bassoon deserves especial mention for excellent work in this. The horns also deserve praise in connection with this finale. There was an endless use of sequence in this movement, as indeed throughout the symphony, but the coda was inspiring, triumphant and majestic.

It is just possible that we have judged the symphony too harshly, for it has certainly gained by repeated hearing and a study of the score; that a symphony taking an hour in the performance should not leave the impression of dulness is in itself much, and it was one of the finest exhibitions of technique and ensemble that our orchestra has ever given. But woe be to this work if it ever is attempted by any lesser organization!

Possibly as a recognition of the beginning of the bicycling season "The Wheel of Omphale" was now given, although the make of the wheel was not mentioned on the programme; it ran most smoothly and came to its end without a punctured tire. The audience seemed heartily to appreciate the beauty of a direct and intelligible melody, and the cellos groaned with Hercules and the oboes chattered with Omphale right interestingly. The work was shaded to perfection and the constant reiteration of the spinning figure was pretty enough to make one exclaim with Ophelia,—"Oh, how the wheel becomes it!"

The work was a good buffer between the fierceness of the Rubinstein symphony and the jollity of Weber's "Abu Hassan" overture. The latter stood like Saul among the prophets in a gathering of ultra-modern works, but its brightness proved that spontaneity cannot lose its charm even in a complex age. It was delightfully interpreted.

Less effective was the reading of the Brahms-Dvorak Hungarian dances which sounded formal and square-cut. Of course they presented the formulae with which we are now somewhat familiar. To make a Hungarian dance it is necessary to begin with a degree of agony as if too much Tokay had left a period of deepest depression; when the gloom is at its deepest there comes a musical hiccough and — presto the work ends with delirium tremens! Quick changes and utter abandon to the caprice of the moment must characterize the work, and we doubt whether any Teuton in the world can give this music just as the Hungarians enjoy it. The present writer recalls strolling orchestras of gypsies, heard near Buda-Pesth, which could give such compositions in a manner beyond that of any symphony orchestra of the world. Not a scrap of printed or written music was amongst the musicians; the leader, who directed solely by his performance upon the violin, arose and began the sorrowful Lassa nalone; tender and brooding harmonies were improvised by the rest of the band and the ensemble was as if one great instrument were playing; gradually they dropped out again and the tearful violin was alone once more; then came the little whip-snap of an upward progression, a slight pause, and suddenly all were off like a set of racers. The end was generally a perfect whirlwind, a species of dancing dervish intoxication, but never did there seem to be any scrambling or any disturbance of the unity of the performance. And at the end of it when the little saucer was passed around for contributions it was chiefly copper that filled it and the dropping in of a silver coin was evidently a rare enough occurrence to cause comment.

The last of the three Hungarian dances of this concert was the most dashing and the shortest of all. It seemed to be a [illegible] movement [illegible] most satisfactory of [illegible]

[106]

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, MARCH 22, 1896.

Uninteresting Program at Symphony Concert.

"Chimes of Normandy" to be Sung at the Castle Sq Theater.

Mr and Mrs Henschel—Paderewski's Return—Harmonic Happenings.

The 19th symphony program of the season could not be called very interesting. Rubinstein's "Dramatic" symphony occupied about two-thirds of the time, and the remaining half hour was devoted to Saint-Saens' poem, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel," Weber's overture to "Abu Hassan" and three Hungarian dances by Brahms. Admirers of Rubenstein do not rank his "Dramatic" symphony among his higher compositions, for although the orchestration is elaborate and complex at times there is a lack of coherency about the work which makes it uninteresting, and the frequent repetitions of many pages of the score are really wearisome. This is specially so in the second and fourth movements.

The triplet passages by the strings and the cantabile phrases by the clarinets were beautifully played in the first movement, and the concluding development, with the fusilade of changes from quarter to sixteenth notes, gave ample evidence of the grand ensemble work of the men, for the work by each contingent was as of one player and without a trace of indecision or cloudiness. The dance melody of the second movement was like a melodic oasis in a desert of uninteresting repetitions; the latter scholarly, of course, but to the average auditor reiterated unnecessarily.

The third part of the symphony is rather gloomy and meaningless, and possesses but little with which to inspire players or auditors. The figures given to the horns and clarinets were admirably played, and the interpretation of the whole movement was creditable to the orchestra. In the fourth part the sharp contrasts were conscientiously observed.

The Saint-Saens' poem was a welcome supplement to the Rubinstein's symphony, and the charmingly delicate rhythm of the composition appeared to put every one in good humor. Its irregularity of form, the tripping measures given to the strings, while a sonorous background is furnished by the basses, and the artistic harmonic contrasts are undeniably pleasing, and the men of the orchestra fairly reveled in the dainty work given them. The interpretation aroused the greatest enthusiasm of the concert.

The humor of Weber's overture was deliciously brought out, the pompous themes with mock solemnity by the basses and double basses and the lighter passages by the violins and companion instruments. The three Hungarian dances were splendidly played, especially the 21st, and the performance of this trio was brilliant in every way.

There will be no concert this week. The next rehearsal will be given Thursday afternoon, April 2, to enable the Handel and Haydn society to prepare for the concert Friday evening. Mrs Georg Henschel will be the soloist at the next symphony. The numbers for the orchestra will be as follows: Overture, "Der Portugiesische Gasthof," L. Cherubini; symphony in C minor, op 11 (MS.), Gustav Strube; overture, "Genoveva," Schumann.

Gazette

enjoys. That Boston's merchants appreciate this fact is shown by the advertising columns of the Gazette, as compared with those of other weekly society papers.

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 22.

The Symphony Concert.

The nineteenth concert of the season was given in Music Hall, last night by the Symphony orchestra. The following is the programme:

Symphony No. 4, D minor.....Rubenstein
Symphonic Poem, A-major, op. 31.....Saint-Saëns
Overture, "Abu Hassan".....Weber
Three Hungarian Dances.....Brahms-Dvorak.

This is a good programme and it received a most artistic interpretation. The Rubenstein symphony loses neither in strength nor beauty by age though the impatient might object that it is a trifle long. Rubenstein remains the master of modern masters, in the largeness and boldness of his ideas, in genuine fiery feeling and in impetuosity of attack. We all know that Rubenstein was lacking in patience thereby differing from his great contemporaries who carve their work inch by inch and labor lovingly over it until it receives its highest finish. On the other hand Rubenstein gives us some delightfully pleasant and restful moments, stimulating the nerves by contrasts, rather than exhausting them by monotonous excitement. The adagio of this "Dramatic" symphony is a fine example of both these merits; it is a glimpse of the pure beauty that the old masters were so proud of dealing with, and one listens to it with an emotion in which there is no trace of pain. It is possible that in his love of beauty for beauty's sake Rubenstein was old fashioned; but the present generation of music lovers, at least, will excuse him for it has not yet reached the condition of being fully satisfied with noise developed on a scientific basis.

The Saint-Saëns work was played with the utmost grace and brilliancy by the orchestra, and one listened to it in pleased content, as to the conversation of a clever man who gives novelty to commonplaces by uttering them in the form of epigrams. As to the Hungarian dances, what Brahms says and Dvorak approves of cannot be wrong. There is a charming, stately liveliness in these dances, suggesting a love poem by Ben Jonson translated into sonorous Greek The "Abu Hassan" overture is charming, and it was charmingly played by the orchestra.

Boston Journal.
SUNDAY, MARCH 22, 1896.

Rubinsteins Long, Tedious 4th Symphony.

Yet He Once Said It Was His Favorite Work.

Announcements of the Next Two Weeks—Notes.

The program of the Symphony Concert was as follows:

Symphony No. 4, in D minor, "Dramatic".....Rubinstein
Symphonic poem, "Omphale's Spinning-Wheel".....Saint-Saens
Overture to "Abu Hassan".....Weber
Three Hungarian dances (Nos. 15, 17 and 21).....Brahms
(Scored for orchestra by Dvorak.)

Rubinstein once said in Berlin that of all his symphonies he was fondest of the "Dramatic." He said this at the rehearsal of the symphony, which he conducted Nov. 12, '83. He also remarked that the slow movement was "poor stuff," but the other movements pleased him. Thus he differed in self-estimation from the old minister in Orange County, Vermont, who, when he was about to retire from his charge, concluded his farewell in these memorable words: "My brethren, I have preached many, many sermons: few have pleased God, and none have pleased me."

Truly the scherzo is interesting and original, peculiar in its use of the wood-wind; but the other movements are more attractive to the eyes of the reader of the score than to the ears of the hearer; for the instrumentation is generally so arranged that passages which look as though they should be effective sound strangely commonplace and crude. Passages of importance are given to the wood-wind which are entirely covered by the strings; or elaborate figures are introduced that would only be prominent when played on a piano. Nor is the thought always lofty enough or beautiful enough to shine through the shabby dress.

Rubinstein was right about the slow movement; it is poor stuff, and its sentiment is too often the sentimentalism of the salon. The first movement and the finale are over-elaborated, that is, in Rubinstein's way, and spun out to an appalling length; this symphony was, indeed, written for Russia, where nights are longest. The effect is frittered away by constant repetition. As in certain other large works of Rubinstein, there is the impression of eagerness to begin and pleasure taken in the stretching of the first movement; but when it comes to the labor of development, and omitting and revising, the interest departs and the rest is unhappily the result of perfunctory facility.

There were so many ideas in the composer's head that the moment he began a symphony, he worked ambitiously until the thought of an opera, or a concerto or a piece of chamber music harassed him, and it is as though he said, "I must hurry this thing up; there's something else to be done." An irregular, comparatively untrained genius, this Rubinstein; who, a marvel of industry, yet lacked intense application and had not the gift of rigid self-examination.

The symphony was well played, and the task was not an easy one. The Scherzo was especially well given. The first flute made a false entrance in the slow movement, and there was a trifling raggedness of attack in the finale; but, as I have said, the symphony is full of difficulties. On the whole, it was played admirably.

* * *

The other numbers of the program do not call for extended comment. Saint-Saëns's delightful symphonic poem, with the whirr of the wheel, the voice of the mocking Omphale and the impotent rage of the enamored Hercules, is well known here and warmly appreciated. Perhaps it never gave such keen delight as last evening, when it came directly after the labored and muddily scored symphony.

Weber's opera, "Abu Hassan," tells of our old friend in the "Arabian Nights," who, after he had married the slave of Zobeide, lived riotously, and tried to cheat his creditors and gain gifts from Caliph by feigning death. Is the short opera as hopelessly old-fashioned and tiresome as the short overture, with its 1811 idea of Eastern color in music?

The dances of Brahms played last night are not among his best.

PHILIP HALE.

SATURDAY, MARCH 21, 1896.

BOSTON STANDARD.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.—There is another most excellent program selected for tonight; one, too, which contains elements calculated to please all. We present it in full, as it deserves a hearing: Rubinstein—Symphony No. 4, in D minor, "Dramatic," op. 96; 1 Lento, Allegro moderato; 2 Presto, Allegro non troppo; 3 Adagio; 4 Largo, Allegro con fuoco. Saint-Saens—Symphonic poem, "Le Rouet d'Omphale, op. 31. Weber—Overture to "Abu Hassan" (first time). Brahms—Three Hungarian dances, Nos. 15, 17, 21, Allegretto, Allegretto grazioso, Vivace. Scored for orchestra by Albert Parlow and Antonin Dvorak.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCIX., NO. 82.
SUNDAY, MARCH 22, 1896.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Contrast of Gayety with Gloomy Seriousness.

Rubenstein's "Dramatic" Symphony Almost Depressingly Wearisome, but Beautifully Played—Saint-Saens' Tuneful Symphonic Poem—Spirited Weber Overture.

The programme for the 19th of this season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, which was given in Music Hall last evening, was:

Symphony No. 4, in D-minor, "Dramatic," Rubinstein
Symphonic poem, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel".....Saint-Saens
Overture, "Abu Hassan".....Weber
Hungarian dances, Nos. 15, 17 and 21..Brahms

Of Rubinstein's six symphonies, the "Dramatic" is one of the most ambitious and the least attractive. It takes over an hour in the performance, and its gloomy seriousness is unbroken except by the scherzo, of which the themes are melodious and flowing, and the instrumentation delightfully piquant. The development of each movement is carried to such unusual length and with so much of dry profundity that the work is almost depressingly wearisome, and despite its scholarly harmonic treatment and its rich and solid instrumentation it fails to interest as a whole. It lacks the melodiousness, the breadth and the fine contrasts in effect that mark his "Ocean" symphony, and its prevailing sombreness of color and its excess of labored pedagogy repel the hearer and leave him cold and fatigued. It had been played here twice before, but on neither occasion did it make a favorable impression, by reason of its inordinate length, its frequent vagueness and its monotony of sentiment. It was carefully read, and beautifully played, but on the whole was endured rather than enjoyed, except in regard to the scherzo, which drew forth the only hearty manifestation of pleasure that rewarded the performance.

The grace, the tunefulness and the clearness of the familiar Saint-Saens symphonic poem which followed came as a grateful relief after the spun-out gloom of the symphony. It was exquisitely interpreted by Mr. Paur and was played by the orchestra with incomparable delicacy.

The Weber overture is the veriest of lively trifles, of which the gaiety and the tunefulness still charm, despite the aspect of quaintness that has settled on it. It has little except the spirit and fire of the violin passages toward the close, that recall the composer of the overtures to "Oberon," "Preciosa," Der Freyschutz" and "Euryanthe," but then it was written only to usher in a one-act comic operetta, and sprightliness and humor were all that was demanded. These it has in all necessary fulness. It was brilliantly played and was well worth the hearing.

The Brahms dances were scored for orchestra by Dvorak, and were heard in this version for the first time at these concerts. The instrumentation is characteristic and colors and accents the dances with impressive effect. Mr. Paur read them in a manner that brought out all that was in them. Not a point was lost that could emphasize and bring out clearly the varying moods of the music.

There will be no rehearsal or concert this week. The next rehearsal will take place on Thursday afternoon, April 2, the change from Friday being made to provide the opportunity for the arrangement of the stage for the Handel and Haydn concert on the evening of that day. The programme will be: Overture, "L'Hotellerie Portugaise," Cherubini; symphony in C minor, by Gustav Strub, a member of the Symphony orchestra, and Overture "Genoveva," Schumann. Mrs. Georg Henschel will be the soloist, and will sing two arias not yet announced.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY, MARCH 22, 1896.
(Copyright 1896, Post Publishing Company.)

SYMPHONY CONCERT ATTRACTIONS.

The nineteenth symphony last night presented four composers, opening with Rubinstein's fourth symphony ("Dramatic"), the playing of which occupied over an hour.

It presents a number of figures skilfully arranged, interwoven and developed, though in many cases very frequently repeated. As a piece of musical construction it shows a master hand, but its extreme length and general heaviness make it rather dreary. It was read, however, intelligently, and was liberally applauded.

Following it came "Omphale's Spinning Wheel," by Saint-Saens, a dainty thing, full of pleasing melodies and light enough to contrast strongly with what preceded, and the fact that it was exquisitely played added much to its enjoyment.

Von Weber's overture to "Abu Hassan" was also a bright, lively and light composition. It is in one movement and occupies but a few minutes in playing.

Three of Brahms's Hungarian dances closed the programme. They were the more familiar ones, Nos. 15, 17 and 21, and ended in a breezy and light manner a programme drearily enough begun.

There was no soloist, which may account for the comparatively small attendance.

There will be no concert next week, but at that of the following week Mrs. Georg Henschel will sing and the C minor symphony by Gustav Strube will be heard for the first time.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, MAR. 23, 1896.

Rubinstein's "Dramatic Symphony" as Heard in Boston.

With Methuselah as auditor, and an eternity to play it in, Rubinstein's "Dramatic Symphony" might be effective, but it is a trifle long for the ordinary threescore-and-ten individual. It might rather be called the "Spasmodic Symphony" for it is built up of a whole host of fragmentary thoughts which are not fused into homogeneity. Its bold chief theme makes a good impression at the outset, and the tender second theme gives just that pairing of the Gentle with the Strong, which seems to be the aesthetic union demanded in every true art-work. It is also a commendable fact that the composer has not called every unusual instrument to his aid but expresses his thought within the limits of classical scoring, only the usual Beethoven forces being required in this work. But here praise must stop, or at least pause to take breath, for the elaboration of the themes is carried to an inordinate length, the first movement alone being nearly 25 minutes long. There are many bold and semi-barbaric touches; one does not need to cratch the Russian to find the Tartar here, and the final cadence pushes the violins to a high position above even the highest orchestral peaks of Beethoven.

The Scherzo is original and very bizarre, and become a splendid study of skilful scoring. Its spasmodic character gives the impression of an epileptic fit set to music, but there are some striking touches in its measures, notably the march-like theme which again struck the keynote of barbaric effect. A better test of the ensemble of an orchestra could scarcely be found, and the fact that this Scherzo was performed without a flaw speaks forcibly for the standard which our orchestra has attained under the leadership of Mr. Paur.

The Adagio is far less effective and seems very conventional, although leading up to a good climax just before the coda, but this same coda closes with some remarkably weak flute sequences, and the whole movement shows that Rubinstein requires bizarrerie to make his effects; the reader may recall Thackeray's picture of Louis XIV. without his robes and great wig—that is the spmyhonic Rubinstein when shorn of his musical surprises and eccentricities, and that was the Rubinstein of this Adagio.

The Finale dealt in syncopations at wholesale, as the first movement had done, and it also gave much reiteration of quaint and original figures. The development was an exhibition rather of the strainings than the strains of music, although there was much knowledge displayed. One bit of canonic work, a species of Fugato, began furiously upon the bassoon and was carried through the woodwind with fine effect; the bassoon deserves especial mention for excellent work in this. The horns also deserve praise in connection with this finale. There was an endless use of sequence in this movement, as indeed throughout the symphony, but the coda was inspiring, triumphant and majestic.

It is just possible that we have judged the symphony too harshly, for it has certainly gained by repeated hearing and a study of the score; that a symphony taking an hour in the performance should not leave the impression of dulness is in itself much, and it was one of the finest exhibitions of technique and ensemble that our orchestra has ever given. But woe be to this work if it ever is attempted by any lesser organization!

Possibly as a recognition of the beginning of the bicycling season "The Wheel of Omphale" was now given, although the make of the wheel was not mentioned on the programme; it ran most smoothly and came to its end without a punctured tire. The audience seemed heartily to appreciate the beauty of a direct and intelligible melody, and the cellos groaned with Hercules and the oboes chattered with Omphale right interestingly. The work was shaded to perfection and the constant reiteration of the spinning figure was pretty enough to make one exclaim with Ophelia,—"Oh, how the wheel becomes it!"

The work was a good buffer between the fierceness of the Rubinstein symphony and the jollity of Weber's "Abu Hassan" overture. The latter stood like Saul among the prophets in a gathering of ultra-modern works, but its brightness proved that spontaneity cannot lose its charm even in a complex age. It was delightfully interpreted.

Less effective was the reading of the Brahms-Dvorak Hungarian dances which sounded formal and square-cut. Of course they presented the formulae with which we are now somewhat familiar. To make a Hungarian dance it is necessary to begin with a degree of agony as if too much Tokay had left a period of deepest depression; when the gloom is at its deepest there comes a musical hiccough and — presto the work ends with delirium tremens! Quick changes and utter abandon to the caprice of the moment must characterize the work, and we doubt whether any Teuton in the world can give this music just as the Hungarians enjoy it. The present writer recalls strolling orchestras of gypsies, heard near Buda-Pesth, which could give such compositions in a manner beyond that of any symphony orchestra of the world. Not a scrap of printed or written music was amongst the musicians; the leader, who directed solely by his performance upon the violin, arose and began the sorrowful Lassa nalone; tender and brooding harmonies were improvised by the rest of the band and the ensemble was as if one great instrument were playing; gradually they dropped out again and the tearful violin was alone once more; then came the little whip-snap of an upward progression, a slight pause, and suddenly all were off like a set of racers. The end was generally a perfect whirlwind, a species of dancing dervish intoxication, but never did there seem to be any scrambling or any disturbance of the unity of the performance. And at the end of it when the little saucer was passed around for contributions it was chiefly copper that filled it and the dropping in of a silver coin was evidently a rare enough occurrence to cause comment.

The last of the three Hungarian dances of this concert was the most dashing and the shortest of all; it seemed to be a Friska movement (the rapid movement above described) and was the most satisfactory of the three. These dances made a light dessert to what might otherwise have been rather an indigestible banquet.

Louis C. Elson.

[106]

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 22, 1896.

The nineteenth symphony programme began with Rubinstein's hour-long fourth symphony, in D minor, opus 95. It is called "Dramatic;" but why, it would not be easy to determine, unless that be because of the continuous activity and the pervading energy which prevail in it and give it the general effect of an intense effort on the part of the composer to infuse influentially into the minds of his hearers a sense of vitality, progress, and accomplishment. In a certain way whatever has this essential suggestion—that it might illustrate, accompany or encourage a deed done—is dramatic, even if it does not undertake to indicate or portray a precise action or even define a kind of action. In such a manner this rarely heard symphony is indeed dramatic, for it is pervaded by a spirit of earnestness which never relaxes and it is ever seeking some new fashion of expression or emphasis. It is absolutely affluent in melodic ideas; it is not content with the themes and counter themes which are generously provided for each movement, but is constantly dropping brief new phrases into the current and leaving them there to float on! beautification of the strong, swift, ever changing stream. One might easily fancy that there is no figure of speech, no variety of rhythm, no unexpectedness of emphasis which these movements do not include in the many surprises, contrasts and devices which follow one another too fast for enumeration. The general effect of the symphony is of beauty rather than of force, although there are vehement moments to redeem it from any suspicion of weakness or effeminacy. Rubinstein, it would seem, must have written these many pages at some epoch when his mind overflowed with fancy, his mood was buoyant, his temper equable and averse to rough insistence, his hand light and his pen facile. One finds in each movement some things which do not seem to belong in it by any formal classification—such as the soothing horn obbligato in the opening allegro, the delicious little dainty dance for a quintette of strings in the middle of the presto, or the gentle episode for the wooden wind in the final allegro con fuoco; yet each when it comes seems just what the ear and the feeling wanted at that particular instant, even though academic judgment should say that some principle of formal development had been ignored or set at nought. And when the windy sweeps, the great, grave chords and the heavy syncopations are used, they give vigor and solidity enough to balance and steady all the possible excess of grace and geniality.

After so long a symphony and one which really takes hold so firmly on attention and sensitiveness, Mr. Paur wisely put a half an hour of light music, dependent chiefly upon elasticity of touch, facility of execution and vivaciousness of style. His selections were: Saint Saens's "Omphale's Spinning Wheel," Weber's "Abu Hassan" overture, and three of Brahms's shortest Hungarian dances in the vivid orchestration of Dvorak, the last of which he took up with tremendous velocity.

The playing was altogether good. The odd changes of rhythm, figure and accent in the symphony were met and mastered dexterously and squarely, and the lighter music was treated gayly, lucidly and cheerily.

No concert next week; but when the next week comes round, Mrs. Henschel will sing two arias, and the orchestra will play a MS. symphony by Mr. Strube, together with Schumann's "Genoveva" and Cherubini's "Portuguese Inn" overture.

MONDAY, MARCH 23, 1896.

BOSTON STANDARD.

The symphony concert Saturday night was a most satisfactory one, both as to selections and interpretation. Rubenstein's 4th (dramatic) symphony, despite its great and perhaps unnecessary length, was rendered so perfectly as to relieve what might, in less able hands, have proved a tedious performance. But in the treatment it received from our matchless orchestra there was no sentiment of weariness engendered. The "Spinning Wheel," one of the pleasantest of all the musical concertos with which Saint-Saens has enriched contemporary music, made a most charming contrast, adding a new delight to both. The Von Weber "Abu Hasson" overture was another of this same order, and the Suite of Brahm Hungarian Dances (numbers 15, 17 and 21) closed the program most happily. Paur was in unusual force, and earned all the plaudits given.

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S LAST CONCERT.

Of the Boston Symphony Society's final concert at the Metropolitan Opera House one can only speak in terms of the very warmest admiration.

The programme consisted exclusively of compositions by Richard Wagner—an experiment that has often been made here before, but never so artistically as last evening. Mr. Emil Paur had for the most chosen only such music as lends itself quite as effectively to the concert room as it does to the operatic stage. The "Rienzi" overture, the preludes to the first and third acts of "Lohengrin," the "Siegfried" Idyll, "Eine Faust Ouverture," the Waldweben from "Siegfried," the prelude to the "Meistersinger" and the prize song from that opera and the Liebesllied from the "Walkuere"—all these are quite as beautiful when listened to as absolute music as they are with stage accessories.

It was simply the perfection of orchestral playing that one heard last evening. Such tonal beauty—"Klangschoenheit," as the Germans have it—has not been listened to in a long while. The strings sounded simply inexcatting, and the brass and wood winds were hardly less fine. This orchestra, thank Heaven, is not given to playing mezzo forte, but knows something of the value of dynamic shading.

Mr. Ben Davies, I regret to say, did not sing the original text. For the rest he sang as the great big artist that he is. And Mr. [illegible] with tremendous fervor.

[illegible] Boston Symphonists! You will [illegible] forgotten, for last night you [illegible] musicsingers, all of you!

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 25, 1896.

The program of the nineteenth Symphony concert was:

Dramatic Symphony (No. 4, D minor).....Rubinstein
Omphale's Spinning Wheel.....Saint-Saëns
Overture, Abu Hassan.....Weber
Hungarian Dances, Nos. 15, 17, 21.....Brahms

You know Rubinstein showed an unaccountable partiality toward his dramatic symphony. If you look over the score, you say "This page must be very effective; notice the use of the woodwind; what singular passages." Yes, but at the concert you do not hear them, for they are buried by the strings. The scherzo is undeniably a masterpiece—a long masterpiece. The first movement and the finale are long—terribly long—and they are not masterpieces. There is ingenious detail, but the tiresome repetitions, the interminable spinning out, the pages of dull padding—music for a Russian night. Rubinstein himself at Berlin, in '83, called the slow movement "poor stuff"; I shall not contradict him. Yet the cheap sentimentalism pleased the audience last night, for the movement was the only one that was followed by hearty applause. Would this symphony sound better if it were rescored? I doubt it, for the thematic material of the first movement and the finale is for the most part neither strong nor beautiful, and the slow movement is beyond remedy.

The symphony was, with the exception of a few slips in attack, finely played, and Saint-Saëns' fantastic orchestral wit was keenly relished, so admirable was the performance. The introduction of Weber's overture, with its 1811 idea of Oriental color, was an instance of misdirected piety, and the dances of Brahms chosen are not among his best.

PHILIP HALE.

1,388.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra plays to-morrow evening at the Metropolitan Opera House. It will be the fifth and last concert of this season, the forty-seventh performance of the band in this city and the 1,388th performance since the orchestra was organized.

1,388 concerts! Just consider what that figure means and the numerous rehearsals, myriad of rehearsals, that cluster about this figure.

Conductor Paur announces a Wagner program selected for the exploiting of such music of the master as best scunds in the ooncert room. Here is the scheme:

Rienzi, overture.
Lohengrin, preludes to Acts I. and III.
Siegfried, idyll, in E major.
A Faust overture in D minor.
Siegfried, Waldweben.
Die Meistersinger, Walther's Prize Song.
Die Meistersinger, prelude.
Die Walküre, spring song.
Die Walküre, Ride of the Valkyries.
Soloist, Mr. Ben Davies.

The 1,389th concert is to be given in Brooklyn next Friday, and the March itinerary of the orchestra ends in Philadelphia next Saturday with the 1,390th concert.

What a record!

And what a lesson!

The moral is rehearse, rehearse, and again rehearse!

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

For the sake of variety there was an orchestral concert in the Metropolitan Opera House last night—the fifth in six days, including Sunday, when a whole day was vouchsafed concert-goers for rest and refreshment, undisturbed by the scrapers of strings and the blowers of brass. The concert was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Emil Paur, and if anybody were to say that there may have been a special purpose in the obvious efforts made by the conductor to exploit his organization, we would not be so ungracious as to contradict him. It looked very much that way, and also as if our visitors from the East were quite willing to court comparison with out visitors from the West. Fortunately, the conviction that comparisions are odious is so deeply set as to have become a rule of action here, else it might be the duty of The Tribune to say that Mr. Paur and his men routed Mr. Thomas and his men, horse, foot and dragoons, in such short order that there did not even seem to be an engagement. In richness and homogeneity of tone (inthe separate choirs and between them), in vitality, elasticity and variety of utterance, in everything that goes to make up good playing, the Bostonians are so much the superiors of their Western rivals that if we were to indulge in such a reprehensible thing as comparison—which we eschew in obedience to the wise saw already quoted. The temptation is strong, but "this is what we never do," as Nanki-Poo and Yum-Yum remark.

It is pleasanter, and perhaps quite as profitable for instruction, if not reproof, to say that last night's concert was far and away the most brilliant orchestral affair that New-York has enjoyed this season. There were passages in which Mr. Kneisel and his contingent in the band seemed to have been transformed each into a Volker—the famous fiddler of the Nibelungen Lay, the reverse of whose bow was a shining sword. How the phrases did cut and flash through the superb body of sound given out by the other choirs! Small wonder that the audience was kept in a state of gladsome excitement from beginning to end; that there were recalls for Mr. Paur after every number, and half a dozen for Mr. Ben Davies, the Welsh tenor, after he had sung the love song from "Die Walküre." It was a Wagner concert with nine numbers and the enthusiasm broke out with the first number—the "Rienzi" overture—and was continued in each brief intermission, rolling now high, now lower, like the huge waves of the sea. The orchestra played superbly, Mr. Paur conducted finely, and Mr. Davies sang the Prize Song from "Die Meistersinger" even better than the love song.

[illegible]

MONDAY, [illegible]

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the nineteenth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall, last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Rubinstein: Symphony No. 4, in D minor, "Dramatic," opus 95.
Saint-Saens: Symphonic Poem No. 1, "Le Rouet d'Omphale," opus 31.
Weber: Overture to "Abu Hassan."
Brahms: Three Hungarian Dances (Nos. 15, 17 and 21).
(Scored for orchestra by Albert Parlow and Antonin Dvorak.)

Rubinstein's "Dramatic" symphony was last given here on Dec. 9, 1893—that is, two seasons ago. To offer this anaconda of a symphony—it takes an hour and four minutes in passing a given point—to a human audience oftener than once in ten years, is a piece of what in Berlin is called "Unverfrorenheit," and in Boston-on-the-Charles, "cheek." What sin has our public committed, that it should thus be asked to do penance in endless Rubinstein? Last season, there was some sense in giving even the whole of the "Ocean;" Rubinstein had just died, and an "In Memoriam" programme has other objects in view than pure enjoyment. But, when the "Ocean" was at last over, most of us felt that we had done the handsome thing by Rubinstein once for all, and need not trouble ourselves about him any more. But no; four months later came the "Russian" symphony (another boa-constrictor), and now the "Dramatic" turns up again! Probably someone will say that we really must have something by Rubinstein every year. But we cannot see why we should; the man is dead and buried, and would not notice it if we left him out for a year or so. There is no reason for continually visiting his tediousness upon his survivors.

Last Saturday evening not all the lollipops of Saint-Saens and Weber could take the bitter of that terrible symphony out of our mouths. It was only with the Brahms dances that we began to find our musical palate in working order again. Of the Weber overture we will say that it is a bright, sparkling draught of—aerated water; warranted not to produce headache. We do not remember hearing the Brahms dances before; that is, these particular ones. They are infinitely bright and taking, although neither Parlow nor Dvorak has especially distinguished himself in his instrumentation of them. The No. 15 brings back to us a tune which has long been familiar in one of Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsodies, and one which is ever inspiring and delightful. Brahms's treatment of it seems to us, if anything, rather better, more coherent and enjoyable, than Liszt's.

The next programme (for Thursday afternoon, April 2, and Saturday evening, April 4), is: Cherubini, overture to "L'Hotellerie Portuguaise;" Massenet, aria from "Esclarmonde;" Gustav Strube, symphony in C minor, opu 11, (MS., first time); Henschel, song with orchestra, "Spring;" Schumann, overture to "Genoveva," opus 81. Mrs. Georg Henschel will be the singer. There will be no rehearsal nor concert this week.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Last Concert of Its Season Given at the Metropolitan Opera House.

The final concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's tenth season in New-York took place last night in the Metropolitan Opera House. In ordinary times this city would hardly be able to endure such an outpour of orchestral music as that which has been descending upon it since the Thomas Orchestra arrived a few days ago. But last night the Opera House held a large audience, which was filled with enthusiasm. There is nothing uncommon in these days in a visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, so it must have been the Wagner programme which excited public interest. The once hated composer of diminished sevenths and chromatic chords which refused to resolve in perfect cadences has become "lord of the ascendant." Wagner actually pays, even in the concert room.

We have to thank Mr. Paur for arranging a most delightful programme of Wagnerian works, which fairly bear separation from dramatic surroundings. Two numbers of his list are concert pieces pure and simple, and a third is a display overture, though it belongs to an opera. The list last night consisted of the "Rienzi" overture, the preludes to the first and third acts of "Lohengrin," a "Faust" overture, the "Siegfried Idyll," the "Waldweben," Walter's prize song, and the vorspiel from "Die Meistersinger," Siegmund's love song, and the "Ride of the Valkyries" from "Die Walküre."

The entire performance of the orchestral part of this comprehensive programme was as near perfection as it is reasonable to expect human work to be. It is beyond question that the Boston Orchestra has lost some of that machinelike precision which characterized its playing under the rigorous rule of Wilhelm Gericke. Yet even in precision it is almost beyond criticism. An attentive ear could catch last night a trifling lack of unity in the strings in the "Lohengrin" vorspiel, but that was atoned for by the luscious yet transparent quality of the tone. How those strings soared and floated in those ethereal upper harmonies! What an atmosphere they created! And how triumphant was the brilliancy of their declamatory utterance in the introduction to the third act and in the "Faust" overture!

It would be easy to write many lines about the breadth and solidity of the strings of this orchestra, the mellow, fluent singing of the wood, and the forceful purity of the brass; but it is not necessary to particularize in speaking of an orchestra of virtuosi. What is better to remember is the admirable balance of tone which makes the orchestra so rich in its total quality, and, above that, the splendid fire of its sweeping style, its glorious flexibility, its variety of delicate nuancing, and its admirable suggestion of reserve power. Such a concert as that of last night must give a thrill of genuine enjoyment to the most blasé concert goer, and leave to the commentator nothing but a fruitless search after adjectives that will not sound rhapsodic.

The soloist of the entertainment was Mr. Ben Davies, who sang his two songs in English with a lovely quality of tone and with abundance of enthusiasm. The audience vainly tried to get repetitions of these numbers and of the introduction to the third act of "Lohengrin."

[illegible] Full almost to the point of surfeit has been the present musical season in New York, it was not with feelings of genuine regret that all true lovers of orchestral music last night bade farewell for a season to the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This splendid organization fails to find in our city a support that is in any way commensurate with its manifest and unrivalled merit. Opinions may differ as to the relative merits of Mr. Gericke, Mr. Nikisch, or Mr. Paur, but the Boston orchestra is ever the same, from conductor unto conductor, and under whatever conditions of leadership still remains the standard by which all other like musical bodies must be measured in this country. By years of association these Boston men have attained not only a precision and unanimity of purpose not surpassed in the world perhaps, but there shines through all this work the light of individual enthusiasm and pure devotion to high ideals, so that they compel invariably admiration and respect.

For the last concert of the present season Mr. Paur chose to present a programme consisting entirely of excerpts from the works of Wagner, and that the choice was wise was attested by the size of the audience, which was very large. The opening selection was the overture to "Rienzi," which, heard beside the later works of the composer, seems quite bald in its simplicity. Then followed the preludes to the first and third acts of "Lohengrin," familiar in our ears as household words, and in the former of which to a man closing his eyes the music of the strings seemed to float on air, so delicate the touch of the bows and so free the tone from the faintest suspicion of a scrape. Next the "Siegfried Idyll" took us deep into the forest and in the "Waldweben" we heard the manifold voices of the woods, the birds, the brooks, the rustling leaves, and all the sweet sounds that nature loves and which Wagner has painted in music so true that it seems nature herself who speaks to us. All this beauty was illustrated by the orchestra with marvellous technical skill and poetic feeling. The two Siegfried bits were separated by the "Faust" overture, that vivid piece of dramatic writing, and then came Mr. Ben Davies, the soloist of the evening, who sang Walther's prize song with beautiful sympathetic quality of voice and a fine simplicity of style—after which the "Meistersinger" prelude was rendered in a truly noble manner, with dignity, breadth, and beautiful expression.

Succeeding to this Mr. Davies gave the "Spring Song" from "Die Walküre" even better than he had previously done the Prize Song. His pure tenor voice and sound manly method gave the liveliest pleasure to the audience, who recalled him again and again. So truly admirable a voice and method as Mr. Davies possesses are rarities, and are by the same token so much the more enjoyable.

The concert was brought to a brilliant termination by the "Ride of the Valkyries." In this, as in all that the Boston Orchestra undertakes, its virtues stand out in high relief, overshadowing any minor defects almost to the point of complete obliteration.

Boston Transcript.

SATURDAY, MARCH 28, 1896.

The Symphony Orchestra in New York.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is meeting with extraordinary success during its present tour of the Eastern cities. On Thursday evening its final concert in New York was given at the Metropolitan Opera House, the programme including the Overture to Rienzi, preludes to first and third acts of Lohengrin, the Siegfried Idyll, the overture to "Die Meistersinger" and the "Ride of the Valkyries." Mr. Krehbiel, of the Tribune, writes enthusiastically in praise of the performance:

"The concert was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Emil Paur, and if anybody were to say that there may have been a special purpose in the obvious efforts made by the conductor to exploit his organization, we would not be so ungracious as to contradict him. It looked very much that way, and also as if our visitors from the East were quite willing to court comparison with our visitors from the West. Fortunately, the convction that comparisons are odious is so deeply set as to have become a rule of action here, else it might be the duty of the Tribune to say that Mr. Paur and his men routed Mr. Thomas and his men, horse, foot and dragoons, in such short order that there did not even seem to be an engagement. In richness and homogeneity of tone (in the separate choirs and between them), in vitality, elasticity and variety of utterance, in everything that goes to make up good playing, the Bostonians are so much the superiors of their Western rivals that if we were to indulge in such a reprehensible thing as comparison—which we eschew in obedience to the wise saw already quoted. The temptation is strong, but 'this is what we never do,' as Nanki-Poo and Yum-Yum remark. It is pleasanter, and perhaps quite as profitable for instruction, if not reproof, to say that last night's concert was far and away the most brilliant orchestral affair that New York has enjoyed this season. There were passages in which Mr. Kneisel and his contingent in the band seemed to have been transformed each into a Volker—the famous fiddler of the Nibelungen Lay, the reverse of whose bow was a shining sword. How the phrases did cut and flash through the superb body of sound given out by the other choirs! Small wonder that the audience was kept in a state of gladsome excitement from beginning to end; that there were recalls for Mr. Paur after every number, and half a dozen for Mr. Ben Davies, the Welsh tenor, after he had sung the love song from 'Die Walküre.'"

[107]

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 22, 1896.

The nineteenth symphony programme began with Rubinstein's hour-long fourth symphony, in D minor, opus 95. It is called "Dramatic;" but why, it would not be easy to determine, unless that be because of the continuous activity and the pervading energy which prevail in it and give it the general effect of an intense effort on the part of the composer to infuse influentially into the minds of his hearers a sense of vitality, progress, and accomplishment. In a certain way whatever has this essential suggestion—that it might illustrate, accompany or encourage a deed done—is dramatic, even if it does not undertake to indicate or portray a precise action or even define a kind of action. In such a manner this rarely heard symphony is indeed dramatic, for it is pervaded by a spirit of earnestness which never relaxes and it is ever seek ing some new fashion of expression or emphasis. It is absolutely affluent in melodic ideas; it is not content with the themes and counter themes which are generonsly provided for each movement, but is constantly dropping brief new phrases into the current and leaving them there to float on i beautification of the strong, swift, ever changir g stream. One might easily fancy that there is no figure of speech, no variety of rhythm, no unexpectedness of emphasis which these movements do not include in the many surprises, contrasts and devices which follow one another too fast for enumeration. The general effect of the symphony is of beauty rather than of force, although there are vehement moments to redeem it from any suspicion of weakness or effeminacy. Rubinstein, it would seem, must have written these many pages at some epoch when his mind overflowed with fancy, his mood was buoyant, his temper equable and averse to rough insistence, his hand light and his pen facile. One finds in each movement some things which do not seem to belong in it by any formal classification—such as the soothing horn obbligato in the opening allegro, the delicious little dainty dance for a quintette of strings in the middle of the presto, or the gentle episode for the wooden wind in the final allegro con fuoco; yet each when it comes seems just what the ear and the feeling wanted at that particular instant, even though academic judgment should say that some principle of formal development had been ignored or set at no ught. And when the windy sweeps, the great, grave chords and the heavy syncopations are used, they give vigor and solidity enough to balance and steady all the possible excess of grace and geniality.

After so long a symphony and one which really takes hold so firmly on attention and sensitiveness, Mr. Paur wisely put a half an hour of light music, dependent chiefly upon elasticity of touch, facility of execution and vivaciousness of style. His selections were: Saint Saens's "Omphale's Spinning Wheel," Weber's "Abu Hassan" overture, and three of Brahms's shortest Hungarian dances in the vivid orchestration of Dvorak, the last of which he took up with tremendous velocity.

The playing was altogether good. The odd changes of rhythm, figure and accent in the symphony were met and mastered dexterously and squarely, and the lighter music was treated gayly, lucidly and cheerily.

No concert next week; but when the next week comes round, Mrs. Henschel will sing two arias, and the orchestra will play a MS. symphony by Mr. Strube, together with Schumann's "Genoveva" and Cherubini's "Portuguese Inn" overture.

MONDAY, MARCH 23, 1896.

BOSTON STANDARD.

The symphony concert Saturday night was a most satisfactory one, both as to selections and interpretation. Rubenstein's 4th (dramatic) symphony, despite its great and perhaps unnecessary length, was rendered so perfectly as to relieve what might, in less able hands, have proved a tedious performance. But in the treatment it received from our matchless orchestra there was no sentiment of weariness engendered. The "Spinning Wheel," one of the pleasantest of all the musical concertos with which Saint-Saens has enriched contemporary music, made a most charming contrast, adding a new delight to both. The Von Weber "Abu Hasson" overture was another of this same order, and the Suite of Brahm Hungarian Dances (numbers 15, 17 and 21) closed the program most happily. Paur was in unusual force, and earned all the plaudits given.

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S LAST CONCERT.

Of the Boston Symphony Society's final concert at the Metropolitan Opera House one can only speak in terms of the very warmest admiration.

The programme consisted exclusively of compositions by Richard Wagner—an experiment that has often been made here before, but never so artistically as last evening. Mr. Emil Paur had for the most chosen only such music as lends itself quite as effectively to the concert room as it does to the operatic stage. The "Rienzi" overture, the preludes to the first and third acts of "Lohengrin," the "Siegfried" Idyll, "Eine Faust Ouverture," the Waldweben from "Siegfried," the prelude to the "Meistersinger" and the prize song from that opera and the Liebeslied from the "Walkuere"—all these are quite as beautiful when listened to as absolute music as they are with stage accessories.

It was simply the perfection of orchestral playing that one heard last evening. Such tonal beauty—"Klangschoenheit," as the Germans have it—has not been listened to in a long while. The strings sounded simply intoxicating, and the brass and wood winds were hardly less fine. This orchestra, thank Heaven, is not given to playing mezzo forte, but knows something of the value of dynamic shading.

Mr. Ben Davies, I regret to say, did not use the original text. For the rest he sang like the great big artist that he is. And Mr. Paur conducted with tremendous fervor.

A bientot, ye Boston Symphonists! You will not be readily forgotten, for last night you played like mastersingers, all of you!

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 25, 1896.

The program of the nineteenth Symphony concert was:

Dramatic Symphony (No. 4, D minor).....Rubinstein
Omphale's Spinning Wheel.....Saint-Saëns
Overture, Abu Hassan.....Weber
Hungarian Dances, Nos. 15, 17, 21.....Brahms

You know Rubinstein showed an unaccountable partiality toward his dramatic symphony. If you look over the score, you say "This page must be very effective; notice the use of the woodwind; what singular passages." Yes, but at the concert you do not hear them, for they are buried by the strings. The scherzo is undeniably a masterpiece—a long masterpiece. The first movement and the finale are long—terribly long—and they are not masterpieces. There is ingenious detail, but the tiresome repetitions, the interminable spinning out, the pages of dull padding—music for a Russian night. Rubinstein himself at Berlin, in '83, called the slow movement "poor stuff"; I shall not contradict him. Yet the cheap sentimentalism pleased the audience last night, for the movement was the only one that was followed by hearty applause. Would this symphony sound better if it were rescored? I doubt it, for the thematic material of the first movement and the finale is for the most part neither strong nor beautiful, and the slow movement is beyond remedy.

The symphony was, with the exception of a few slips in attack, finely played, and Saint-Saëns' fantastic orchestral wit was keenly relished, so admirable was the performance. The introduction of Weber's overture, with its 1811 idea of Oriental color. was an instance of misdirected piety, and the dances of Brahms chosen are not among his best.

PHILIP HALE.

1,388.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra plays to-morrow evening at the Metropolitan Opera House. It will be the fifth and last concert of this season, the forty-seventh performance of the band in this city and the 1,388th performance since the orchestra was organized.

1,388 concerts! Just consider what that figure means and the numerous rehearsals, myriad of rehearsals, that cluster about this figure.

Conductor Paur announces a Wagner program selected for the exploiting of such music of the master as best scunds in the ooncert room. Here is the scheme:

Rienzi, overture.
Lohengrin, preludes to Acts I. and III.
Siegfried, idyll, in E major.
A Faust overture in D minor.
Siegfried, Waldweben.
Die Meistersinger, Walther's Prize Song.
Die Meistersinger, prelude.
Die Walküre, spring song.
Die Walküre, Ride of the Valkyries.
Soloist, Mr. Ben Davies.

The 1,389th concert is to be given in Brooklyn next Friday, and the March itinerary of the orchestra ends in Philadelphia next Saturday with the 1,390th concert.

What a record!

And what a lesson!

The moral is rehearse, rehearse, and again rehearse!

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

For the sake of variety there was an orchestral concert in the Metropolitan Opera House last night—the fifth in six days, including Sunday, when a whole day was vouchsafed concert-goers for rest and refreshment, undisturbed by the scrapers of strings and the blowers of brass. The concert was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Emil Paur, and if anybody were to say that there may have been a special purpose in the obvious efforts made by the conductor to exploit his organization, we would not be so ungracious as to contradict him. It looked very much that way, and also as if our visitors from the East were quite willing to court comparison with out visitors from the West. Fortunately, the conviction that comparisions are odious is so deeply set as to have become a rule of action here, else it might be the duty of The Tribune to say that Mr. Paur and his men routed Mr. Thomas and his men, horse, foot and dragoons, in such short order that there did not even seem to be an engagement. In richness and homogeneity of tone (inthe separate choirs and between them), in vitality, elasticity and variety of utterance, in everything that goes to make up good playing, the Bostonians are so much the superiors of their Western rivals that if we were to indulge in such a reprehensible thing as comparison—which we eschew in obedience to the wise saw already quoted. The temptation is strong, but "this is what we never do," as Nanki-Poo and Yum-Yum remark. It is pleasanter, and perhaps quite as profitable for instruction, if not reproof, to say that last night's concert was far and away the most brilliant orchestral affair that New-York has enjoyed this season. There were passages in which Mr. Kneisel and his contingent in the band seemed to have been transformed each into a Volker—the famous fiddler of the Nibelungen Lay, the reverse of whose bow was a shining sword. How the phrases did cut and flash through the superb body of sound given out by the other choirs! Small wonder that the audience was kept in a state of gladsome excitement from beginning to end; that there were recalls for Mr. Paur after every number, and half a dozen for Mr. Ben Davies, the Welsh tenor, after he had sung the love song from "Die Walküre." It was a Wagner concert with nine numbers and the enthusiasm broke out with the first number—the "Rienzi" overture—and was continued in each brief intermission, rolling now high, now lower, like the huge waves of the sea. The orchestra played superbly, Mr. Paur conducted finely, and Mr. Davies sang the Prize Song from "Die Meistersinger" even better than the love song.

Boston Transcript.

MONDAY, MARCH 23, 1896.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the nineteenth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall, last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Rubinstein: Symphony No. 4, in D minor, "Dramatic," opus 95.
Saint-Saens: Symphonic Poem No. 1, "Le Rouet d'Omphale," opus 31.
Weber: Overture to "Abu Hassan."
Brahms: Three Hungarian Dances (Nos. 15, 17 and 21).
(Scored for orchestra by Albert Parlow and Antonin Dvorak.)

Rubinstein's "Dramatic" symphony was last given here on Dec. 9, 1893—that is, two seasons ago. To offer this anaconda of a symphony—it takes an hour and four minutes in passing a given point—to a human audience oftener than once in ten years, is a piece of what in Berlin is called "Unverfrorenheit," and in Boston-on-the-Charles, "cheek." What sin has our public committed, that it should thus be asked to do penance in endless Rubinstein? Last season, there was some sense in giving even the whole of the "Ocean;" Rubinstein had just died, and an "In Memoriam" programme has other objects in view than pure enjoyment. But, when the "Ocean" was at last over, most of us felt that we had done the handsome thing by Rubinstein once for all, and need not trouble ourselves about him any more. But no; four months later came the "Russian" symphony (another boa-constrictor), and now the "Dramatic" turns up again! Probably someone will say that we really must have something by Rubinstein every year. But we cannot see why we should; the man is dead and buried, and would not notice it if we left him out for a year or so. There is no reason for continually visiting his tediousness upon his survivors.

Last Saturday evening not all the lollipops of Saint-Saens and Weber could take the bitter of that terrible symphony out of our mouths. It was only with the Brahms dances that we began to find our musical palate in working order again. Of the Weber overture we will say that it is a bright, sparkling draught of—aerated water; warranted not to produce headache. We do not remember hearing the Brahms dances before; that is, these particular ones. They are infinitely bright and taking, although neither Parlow nor Dvorak has especially distinguished himself in his instrumentation of them. The No. 15 brings back to us a tune which has long been familiar in one of Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsodies, and one which is ever inspiring and delightful. Brahms's treatment of it seems to us, if anything, rather better, more coherent and enjoyable, than Liszt's.

The next programme (for Thursday afternoon, April 2, and Saturday evening, April 4), is: Cherubini, overture to "L'Hotellerie Portuguaise;" Massenet, aria from "Esclarmonde;" Gustav Strube, symphony in C minor, opu 11, (MS., first time); Henschel, song with orchestra, "Spring;" Schumann, overture to "Genoveva," opus 81. Mrs. Georg Henschel will be the singer. There will be no rehearsal nor concert this week.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Last Concert of Its Season Given at the Metropolitan Opera House.

The final concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's tenth season in New-York took place last night in the Metropolitan Opera House. In ordinary times this city would hardly be able to endure such an outpour of orchestral music as that which has been descending upon it since the Thomas Orchestra arrived a few days ago. But last night the Opera House held a large audience, which was filled with enthusiasm. There is nothing uncommon in these days in a visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, so it must have been the Wagner programme which excited public interest. The once hated composer of diminished sevenths and chromatic chords which refused to resolve in perfect cadences has become "lord of the ascendant." Wagner actually pays, even in the concert room.

We have to thank Mr. Paur for arranging a most delightful programme of Wagnerian works, which fairly bear separation from dramatic surroundings. Two numbers of his list are concert pieces pure and simple, and a third is a display overture, though it belongs to an opera. The list last night consisted of the "Rienzi" overture, the preludes to the first and third acts of "Lohengrin," a "Faust" overture, the "Siegfried Idyll," the "Waldweben," Walter's prize song, and the vorspiel from "Die Meistersinger," Siegmund's love song, and the "Ride of the Valkyries" from "Die Walküre."

The entire performance of the orchestral part of this comprehensive programme was as near perfection as it is reasonable to expect human work to be. It is beyond question that the Boston Orchestra has lost some of that machinelike precision which characterized its playing under the rigorous rule of Wilhelm Gericke. Yet even in precision it is almost beyond criticism. An attentive ear could catch last night a trifling lack of unity in the strings in the "Lohengrin" vorspiel, but that was atoned for by the luscious yet transparent quality of the tone. How those strings soared and floated in those ethereal upper harmonies! What an atmosphere they created! And how triumphant was the brilliancy of their declamatory utterance in the introduction to the third act and in the "Faust" overture!

It would be easy to write many lines about the breadth and solidity of the strings of this orchestra, the mellow, fluent singing of the wood, and the forceful purity of the brass; but it is not necessary to particularize in speaking of an orchestra of virtuosi. What is better to remember is the admirable balance of tone which makes the orchestra so rich in its total quality, and, above that, the splendid fire of its sweeping style, its glorious flexibility, its variety of delicate nuancing, and its admirable suggestion of reserve power. Such a concert as that of last night must give a thrill of genuine enjoyment to the most blasé concert goer, and leave to the commentator nothing but a fruitless search after adjectives that will not sound rhapsodic.

The soloist of the entertainment was Mr. Ben Davies, who sang his two songs in English with a lovely quality of tone and with abundance of enthusiasm. The audience vainly tried to get repetitions of these numbers and of the introduction to the third act of "Lohengrin."

Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

Full almost to the point of surfeit as has been the present musical season in New York, it was yet with feelings of genuine regret that all true lovers of orchestral music last night bade farewell for a season to the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This splendid organization fails to find in our city a support that is in any way commensurate with its manifest and unrivalled merit. Opinions may differ as to the relative merits of Mr. Gericke, Mr. Nikisch, or Mr. Paur, but the Boston orchestra is ever the same, from conductor unto conductor, and under whatever conditions of leadership still remains the standard by which all other like musical bodies must be measured in this country. By years of association these Boston men have attained not only a precision and unanimity of purpose not surpassed in the world perhaps, but there shines through all this work the light of individual enthusiasm and pure devotion to high ideals, so that they compel invariably admiration and respect.

For the last concert of the present season Mr. Paur chose to present a programme consisting entirely of excerpts from the works of Wagner, and that the choice was wise was attested by the size of the audience, which was very large. The opening selection was the overture to "Rienzi," which, heard beside the later works of the composer, seems quite bald in its simplicity. Then followed the preludes to the first and third acts of "Lohengrin," familiar in our ears as household words, and in the former of which to a man closing his eyes the music of the strings seemed to float on air, so delicate the touch of the bows and so free the tone from the faintest suspicion of a scrape. Next the "Siegfried Idyll" took us deep into the forest and in the "Waldweben" we heard the manifold voices of the woods, the birds, the brooks, the rustling leaves, and all the sweet sounds that nature loves and which Wagner has painted in music so true that it seems nature herself who speaks to us. All this beauty was illustrated by the orchestra with marvellous technical skill and poetic feeling. The two Siegfried bits were separated by the "Faust" overture, that vivid piece of dramatic writing, and then came Mr. Ben Davies, the soloist of the evening, who sang Walther's prize song with beautiful sympathetic quality of voice and a fine simplicity of style—after which the "Meistersinger" prelude was rendered in a truly noble manner, with dignity, breadth, and beautiful expression.

Succeeding to this Mr. Davies gave the "Spring Song" from "Die Walküre" even better than he had previously done the Prize Song. His pure tenor voice and sound manly method gave the liveliest pleasure to the audience, who recalled him again and again. So truly admirable a voice and method as Mr. Davies possesses are rarities, and are by the same token so much the more enjoyable.

The concert was brought to a brilliant termination by the "Ride of the Valkyries." In this, as in all that the Boston Orchestra undertakes, its virtues stand out in high relief, overshadowing any minor defects almost to the point of complete obliteration.

Boston Transcript.

SATURDAY, MARCH 28, 1896.

The Symphony Orchestra in New York.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is meeting with extraordinary success during its present tour of the Eastern cities. On Thursday evening its final concert in New York was given at the Metropolitan Opera House, the programme including the Overture to Rienzi, preludes to first and third acts of Lohengrin, the Siegfried Idyll, the overture to "Die Meistersinger" and the "Ride of the Valkyries." Mr. Krehbiel, of the Tribune, writes enthusiastically in praise of the performance:

"The concert was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Emil Paur, and if anybody were to say that there may have been a special purpose in the obvious efforts made by the conductor to exploit his organization, we would not be so ungracious as to contradict him. It looked very much that way, and also as if our visitors from the East were quite willing to court comparison with our visitors from the West. Fortunately, the convction that comparisons are odious is so deeply set as to have become a rule of action here, else it might be the duty of the Tribune to say that Mr. Paur and his men routed Mr. Thomas and his men, horse, foot and dragoons, in such short order that there did not even seem to be an engagement. In richness and homogeneity of tone (in the separate choirs and between them), in vitality, elasticity and variety of utterance, in everything that goes to make up good playing, the Bostonians are so much the superiors of their Western rivals that if we were to indulge in such a reprehensible thing as comparison—which we eschew in obedience to the wise saw already quoted. The temptation is strong, but 'this is what we never do,' as Nanki-Poo and Yum-Yum remark. It is pleasanter, and perhaps quite as profitable for instruction, if not reproof, to say that last night's concert was far and away the most brilliant orchestral affair that New York has enjoyed this season. There were passages in which Mr. Kneisel and his contingent in the band seemed to have been transformed each into a Volker—the famous fiddler of the Nibelungen Lay, the reverse of whose bow was a shining sword. How the phrases did cut and flash through the superb body of sound given out by the other choirs! Small wonder that the audience was kept in a state of gladsome excitement from beginning to end; that there were recalls for Mr. Paur after every number, and half a dozen for Mr. Ben Davies, the Welsh tenor, after he had sung the love song from 'Die Walküre.'"

[107]

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCIX., NO. 89.
SUNDAY, MARCH 29, 1896.

MR. PAUR AND HIS ORCHESTRA

Generously Praised by the Critics of New York.

Last Concert in Gotham a Brilliant Affair—"Lucia di Lammermoor" at

On Thursday evening last the Boston Symphony orchestra gave the last of its New York concerts for this season in the Metropolitan Opera House before an audience that went wild with enthusiasm. Mr. Paur presented a programme devoted wholly to Wagner, as follows: The "Rienzi" overture, the preludes to the first and third acts of "Lohengrin," the "Faust" overture, the "Siegfried Idyll," the "Waldweben," Walter's prize song, and the vorspiel from "Die Meistersinger," Siegmund's love song, and the "Ride of the Valkyries" from "Die Walkure." The critics, next morning, were remarkably generous in the quality and the quantity of the praise they bestowed on both Mr. Paur and the orchestra. M. Krehbiel, in the Tribune, drew a comparison between the Boston orchestra and that of Theodore Thomas, which had been giving concerts in New York. He said: "If anybody were to say that there may have been a special purpose in the obvious efforts made by the conductor to exploit his organization, we would not be so ungracious as to contradict him. It looked very much that way, and also as if our visitors from the East were quite willing to court comparison with our visitors from the West. Fortunately, the conviction that comparisons are odious is so deeply set as to have become a rule of action here, else it might be the duty of the Tribune to say that Mr. Paur and his men routed Mr. Thomas and his men, horse, foot and dragoons, in such short order that there did not even seem to be an engagement. In richness and homogeneity of tone (in the separate chors and between them), in vitality, elasticity and variety of utterance, in everything that goes to make up good playing, the Bostonians are so much the superiors of their western rivals that if we were to indulge in such a reprehensible thing as comparison—which we eschew in obedience to the wise saw already quoted. It is pleasanter, and perhaps quite as profitable for instruction, if not reproof, to say that last night's concert was far and away the most brilliant orchestral affair that New York has enjoyed this season. Small wonder that the audience was kept in a state of gladsome excitement from beginning to end; that there were recalls for Mr. Paur after every number. It was a Wagner concert with nine numbers, and the enthusiasm broke out with the first number—the "Rienzi" overture—and was continued in each brief intermission, rolling now high, now lower, like the huge waves of the sea. The orchestra played superbly, Mr. Paur conducted finely."

Mr. Henderson said in the Times: "We have to thank Mr. Paur for arranging a most delightful programme of Wagnerian works, which fairly bear separation from dramatic surroundings. The entire performance of the orchestral part of this comprehensive programme was as near perfection as it is reasonable to expect human work to be. It would be easy to write many lines about the breadth and solidity of the strings of this orchestra, the mellow, fluent singing of the wood, and the forceful purity of the brass; but it is not necessary to particularize in speaking of an orchestra of virtuosi. What is better to remember is the admirable balance of tone which makes the orchestra so rich in its total quality, and, above that, the splendid fire of its sweeping style, its glorious flexibility, its variety of delicate nuancing, and its admirable suggestion of reserve power. Such a concert as that of last night must give a thrill of genuine enjoyment to the most blase concert goer, and leave to the commentator nothing but a fruitless search after adjectives that will not sound rhapsodic."

The Sun said: "The Boston Symphony orchestra still remains the standard by which all other like musical bodies must be measured in this country. By years of association these men have attained not only a precision and unanimity of purpose not surpassed in the world, perhaps, but there shines through all this work the light of individual enthusiasm and pure devotion to high ideals, so that they compel invariably admiration and respect. In all that the Boston orchestra undertakes its virtues stand out in high relief, overshadowing any minor defects almost to the point of complete obliteration."

The other papers commented on the concert in the same vein of enthusiastic admiration. There was a jarring note here and there, as when one critic wrote: "Of course one could not but regret that such a programme given with such an orchestra could not have been conducted by a Seidl," while now and then there was a tendency to bestow all the praise on the orchestra, forgetful of the fact that whatever there was of worth in the interpretations of the music must be passed to the credit of the conductor. An orchestra may consist of the most intelligent and most gifted of players, but they compose as a whole an instrument on which their conductor plays; and such an orchestra, led by an inefficient conductor, will, as has been sufficiently and convincingly emphasized in Boston, have little opportunity afforded it to show its mettle.

The Philadelphia Press.
TUESDAY, MARCH 24, 1896.

A NIGHT WITH WAGNER.

Boston Symphony Orchestra's Final Concert at the Academy.

The nearest the Boston Symphony Orchestra came to a symphony last evening was through its rendition of "A Faust Overture," which is a transmogrified first movement of a Faust Symphony once projected by the great Richard of Bayreuth, and, thank heaven, never finished. However, the symphony was not missed, as the night with Wagner, which Mr. Paur gave us, made up a striking programme, some features of which were superb. The programme was well balanced, had a variety in its Wagnerian unity which was poles apart from any monotonousness, and the general impression, due largely to the stirring reading of the finale, the "Ride of the Valkyries," was stunning.

There was noticeable about certain of Mr. Paur's readings, however, particularly in the "Tannhauser" overture and somewhat, but less so in the "Siegfried Idyll," a rather too great sweetness of tone. Too much nicety, in fact. One felt there were certain effects in the overture, for instance, that needed to be roughened up to be fully impressive. In other words, Mr. Paur's rendering was smoothly correct, instrumentally perfect, but without the vital touch of spontaneity. In the "Meistersinger" prelude, and the "Ride of the Valkyries," however, the readings were finely effective. As a contrast, doubtless, "The Faust overture," which is odd, but not convincingly suggestive of its title, was sandwiched in between the "Siegfried Idyll," so-called, and that other idyllic composition from "Siegfried," the lovely forest music. In the "Waldweben" Mr. Paur's smooth methods had their chance, and the dreamy rustlings were well rendered and quite poetically. Another poetic enjoyment of the evening was Mr. Ben Davies' interpretation of the "Prize Song" in the "Meistersinger" and the "Spring Song" in "Die Walkure." Mr. Davies is a delightful singer and he handles his fine tenor voice splendidly. He proved once more, as Jean De Reszke proved two weeks ago, that the musical declamation of Wagner can be sung in tune and time and with impressive lyric effect. Of course, as the "Prize Song" is thoroughly lyrical and of a cantabile character, that is, cantabile for Wagner, Mr. Davies did not have much to do but accentuate its effects, but in the "Spring Song," which is a typical Wagnerian composition, and in the mouths of many singers rather monotonous, Mr. Davies was triumphant, and the result was a vocal treat.

While last night's concert was the finale of the Monday night concerts, on Saturday afternoon will be held the last of the popular concerts, and Mr. Paur has arranged an unusually popular programme, which contains much charming music, music which to hear rendered by this great orchestra should be considered a privilege. The programme follows: Overture, "Der Freischutz," Weber; Sylvia ballet music, Delibes; waltz, "Wine, Women and Song," Strauss; polka, "Singer's Joy," Strauss; overture, "Fra Diavolo," Tuber; Rondo Cappriccio, for the violin, "Saint Saens;" Timothy Adamowski, soloist; songs by Lillian Blauvelt.

BOSTON HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCIX., NO. 87.
FRIDAY, MARCH 27, 1896.

WARMEST ADMIRATION

Greets the Work of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York.

[Special Dispatch to the Boston Herald.]

NEW YORK, March 26, 1896. Of the Boston Symphony orchestra's final concert in the Metropolitan Opera House one can only speak in the terms of the very warmest admiration. The programme consisted exclusively of compositions by Richard Wagner—an experiment that has often been made here before, but never so artistically successful as this evening. Mr. Emil Paur had for the most chosen only such music as lends itself quite as effectively to the concert rooms as it does to the operatic stage.

The "Rienzi" overture, the preludes to the first and third acts of "Lohengrin," the "Siegfrild" Idyll, "Eine Faust Overture," the "Waldweben" from "Siegfried," the prelude to the "Meistersinger" and the prize song from that opera, and the Lieberslied from the "Walkure"—all these are quite as beautiful when listened to as absolute music as they are with stage accessories—"Klangschoenheit" as the Germans have it. The strings sounded superbly, and the brass and woodwinds were hardly less fine.

This orchestra is not given to playing mezzoforte, but knows something of the value of dynamic shading.

Mr. Ben Davies did not use the original text. For the rest he sang like the great artist that he is, and Mr. Paur conducted with tremendous fervor.

LEDGER AND TRANSCRIPT
Philadelphia, Tuesday, March 24, 1896.

Academy of Music—The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

At the first blush, if it be appropriate to speak of a blush in connection with the rugged, unfeminine Wagner, one might suppose that a symphony concert programme made up entirely of his works would be too ponderous and monotonous to suit the exigencies of a whole evening's entertainment. Certainly such a scheme—not exploited for the first time, by the way—seems a trifle farfetched, the advisability of devoting the whole performance to any one composer, excepting at a celebration in his honor, not being very apparent unless, possibly, to his most slavish and unreasonable admirers. However, seeing that last night's offering of the Boston Orchestra was essentially Wagnerian, it must be admitted that the results, owing to judicious selection, proved interesting and even attractive. In this instance Mr. Paur showed himself in a more favorable light than he has sometimes done as a programme builder, provided, of course, that we waive the question as to the wisdom of banishing all masters but one by this process of exclusion. For instead of showing us the great German iconoclast in his more formidable moods, as he might very readily have decreed, the conductor had sufficient tact and comparative lightness of spirit to put before the audience the following list:

"Tannhäuser," Overture.
"Siegfried," Idyll.
A "Faust" Overture, (D Minor).
"Siegfried," "Forest Sounds."
"Die Meistersinger," Walther's Prize Song.
"Die Meistersinger," Prelude.
"Die Walküre," Spring Song.
"Die Walküre," "Ride of the Walkyries."

For this diplomatic arrangement a thousand thanks, Herr Paur. You have not always been so skillful in your choice of numbers, but that is neither here nor there. Rather let it be said that this concert—the final one of the season—passed off artistically and successfully, although there were times when Mr. Paur failed to give his men all necessary freedom, and thus produced a sense of over-refinement and a want of vigor. This was more particularly notable in the "Tannhäuser" overture, which had an exquisite presentation as to some passages, but which lacked in others breadth of effect and real sonority. One could not but contrast this rather subdued treatment (suggesting the old régime of Nikisch, that apostle of pianissimo) with the more forcible ideals of a Thomas, a Seidl or a Damrosch. Yet, when all is said, the overture was played in a fashion that revealed not a few of its beauties, and any disappointment as to the execution must have been soon forgotten. The second number, the "Siegfried" idyll, was, of course, much better suited to the orchestra's metier (or perhaps it would be more correct to say the conductor's metier), and nothing could have surpassed, in its own dreamy way, the finish and poetic insight with which it was invested—an insight showing us how, on rare occasions, Wagner could unbend sufficiently to deck his oftimes formidable muse in a wealth of melodic, almost sensuous, raiment. To the ultra Wagnerian, indeed, the idyll may seem a trifle, but who shall dare predict that it will not be played when "Tristan and Isolde" is forgotten and the "Gotterdämmerung" means but a dream?

Perhaps of the remaining orchestral excerpts the lovely "Forest Sounds" (Waldweben) from "Siegfried" had the most delightful exposition, for herein the wonderful finesse and delicacy of the Boston organization found just the illustration to bring out these matchless qualities. What a wondrous piece of descriptive writing the Waldweben is, to be sure, taking an imaginative listener, as it were, many a league back into the woods and picturing up a myriad of sylvan ideas which can for the nonce transform even your prosaic concert-goer (and there are several such) into a poet. Thus the orchestra proved very happy in this little dash of musical Elysium, and did nothing during the close of the evening to efface so charming an impression, the examples from the "Meistersinger" and "Die Walkure" being adequate rather than remarkable.

Ben Davies, as the soloist, was heard in Walter's prize song from the "Meistersinger" (by-the-way, why did the prelude from the opera follow this number rather than precede it?), and also gave the Spring Song from the "Walkure." He has a voice which falls melodiously on the ear, and it is a voice, too, which he used last evening with much art, notably in his second contribution. As a result, Mr. Davies was warmly applauded. The audience was a large one, and the house would probably have been crowded had the weather been of a more symphonic character.

The orchestra will give its last Philadelphia concert for the season at the Academy next Saturday afternoon, when Mme. Lillian Blauvelt and Mr. T. Adamowski will be the soloists. The programme will include the overture to "Der Freischutz" and "Fra Diavalo," three "Hungarian Dances," by Brahms, Strauss's "Wine, Woman and Song" waltz and "Singers' Joy" polka and Delibes's lovely "Sylvia" ballet music. Mr. Adamowski will play a "Rondo Capreccioso," by Saint-Sæns, and Mme. Blauvelt will sing songs by Schumann, Liszt, Mendelssohn, Rubinstien and Delibes, with pianoforte accompaniments. This will be recognized as a very attrative scheme.

The Times
TWELVE PAGES
PHILADELPHIA, MARCH 24, 1896.

Academy of Music.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's closing concert of its eleventh Philadelphia season was devoted entirely to Wagner. The programme included the "Tannhaeuser" overture, and the "Faust" overture; the idyll and the Waldweben from "Siegfried;" the prelude and the prize song of "Die Meistersinger" and the spring song and the great "ride" from "Die Walkuere." Mr. Paur does all of this music notably well, though the first and the last we have heard played with warmer color and stronger accentuation. The delicacy of the orchestra was charmingly displayed in the lovely forest sounds, and the poetic prelude of the "Meistersinger" was exquisitely played. Ben Davies was the tenor soloist. The orchestra will be heard once more in a popular concert at the Academy on Saturday afternoon.

The Philadelphia Inquirer
TUESDAY - - - - - - MARCH 24, 1896

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

A Wagner Program at the Academy of Music Last Night.

The fifth concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Paul Paur conductor, was given last night at the Academy of Music. It was a Wagner night, and the following was the program:

"Tannhauser." Overture.
"Siegfried." Idyll.
A Faust Overture.
"Siegfried." "Forest Sounds."
"Die Meistersinger." "Walther's Prize Song."
"Die Meistersinger." Prelude.
"Die Walkure." Spring Song.
"Die Walkure." "Ride of the Walkyries."

Soloist, Mr. Ben Davies.

It was the romantic and, if it may not be treason to say so, the really musical side of Wagner which the orchestra presented last night. For, even in the warcries of the Walkyries there is a note of human passion which sounds above the shrieking storm, while the Siegfried "Idyll" and the "Forest Sounds," from the same opera, are full of exquisite tenderness and joy, the rich wine of poetry bubbling through the measures, and the sunshine of midsummer piercing the shade of the whispering pines. The "Tannhauser" overture was played with wonderful variety of color. The strings were brilliant, the trombones and trumpets never overbearing and the wood winds and reeds firm in touch, and yet expressive and delicate. The passionate figures which are woven all through the overture were both suggestive and inspiring, and the various parts were completely homogeneous in point of effect. That, in fact, may be said to have been the dominant characteristic of the orchestra in all of its work last night. It was tempered in its energy, it created that atmosphere of repose which must surround most all great works, its nuances were delicate, and everything was, in fact, emotional and tender. In "Forest Sounds" the long sustained notes with which the music begins, the rustling of the strings and the blithe bird-song motive were each given a most exquisite rendering. The "Miestersinger" prelude was played with great buoyancy and enthusiasm, and it was noticeable for the clearness and individuality that were given to each separate theme or phrase. Without trying to listen too keenly it was possible to hear four or five distinct motives traveling along independently and free of the other voices, and yet the whole was blended together in a rich and brilliant mass of musical mosaic. Mr. Ben Davies sang the "Prize Song" and the "Spring Song" with much expression and tender shading. The "Spring Song," especially in its opening measures, sounds more like a composition by Purcell than by Wagner, and it admirably suited the pure and vibrant quality of Mr. Davies' voice.

Herald 3/25

LAST SYMPHONY CONCERT.

To Be Given by the Boston Orchestra Tonight.

Tonight the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the last concert of the season at the Music Hall. For the occasion a Wagner programme has been arranged by Director Paur, which includes many of the famous gems from the pen of the German master, and principal among the selections to be given is "A Faust Overture in D Minor," which will probably be heard for the first time in this city.

The soloist is Mr. Ben Davies, an English tenor of renown, who has become famous as an interpreter of oratorio as well as operatic characters. He will sing "Walther's Prize Song," from "Die Meistersinger," and the "Spring Song," from "Die Walkure." The concert opens with the "Tannhauser" overture, and concludes with the "Ride of the Valkyries."

The management of the orchestra feels very much encouraged because of the continued success of the concerts in this city. This year an additional concert was added to the series for Baltimore, and it may be that this number will even be increased next season.

RECORD, TUESDAY
ENING, MARCH 24

A Wagnerian Contretemps.

A peculiarly interesting Wagner programme was rendered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last evening to signalize the farewell concert of the eleventh Philadelphia season. Seldom, it is safe to say, has such a queer selection of the "Art Work of the Future" been placed together in a concert patchwork. The general character was by no means typical in the broad sense, although oddly representative of some of the most fantastic phases of the great German maestro's genius. This is not to say that the programme did not include some of Wagner's most effective music; it opened, on the contrary, with the famous "Tannhauser" overture, included the delightfully picturesque "Forest sounds" (Waldweben) from "Siegfried," and concluded with the stormy and wild "Ride of the Walkyries." But plainly no adequate representation of the distinctively great Wagnerian "concert-stuecke" (programme music) had been contemplated by Herr Paur; indeed, the ordinary concert exigencies would perhaps have prevented any such plan. As it was, this uniquely temperamental conductor had evidently sought to present Wagner in certain of his most conspicuously popular moods, and in this he must be acknowledged to have succeeded to a musically amusing and suggestive degree. The "Tannhaeuser" overture, with its sublime wrestling of the pilgrim's chorus and the Venusberg siren choir, was counterbalanced by the "Meistersinger" prelude, with its Beckmesser drollery culminating in what has been fittingly styled "cat music;" the "Meistersinger" contest being truly a burlesque upon the Wartburg minstrelsy. In sharp contrast to these two sides of a characteristic Wagnerian medallion and in equally distinct spirit to each other were the highly descriptive "Forest Sounds," with its echoing bird song, and the fierce storm gallop of the warrior maids of Walhalla. Compared to these large architectures, the musical framework of the little "Siegfried" idyll, written for a childlike orchestra, and even the "Faust" overture with its sombre harmonies seemed to be of a diminutive sort. These rather unfamiliar works were composed—the one, of Nibelung themes as a birthday gift to his wife in celebration of their young son, Siegfried, and the other, of two main themes to characterize the drifting Faust, a melancholy strain mingled with a tenderly yearning strain. The two songs selected for the evening and sung in an impressively sweet tenor by the soloist, Mr. Ben Davies, added emphatically to the peculiar tone of the programme. They were Walther's prize song from "Die Meistersinger" and Siegmund's love song from "Die Walkure," which is so nearly an old-style Italian aria as to have made one not over-Wagnerian listener of its performance once regret that Siegmund could not come forward to the footlights and sing it in the regulation Italian style. Both songs were by Mr. Davies sung in English, furthermore. And to cap the climax of this remarkable Wagner evening the concert was over at 9.40 P. M.

The North American

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

TUESDAY, MARCH 24, 1896.

MUSIC AT THE ACADEMY.

Last Concert for the Season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The fifth and last evening concert for the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at the Academy of Music last night. Although the storm naturally had some effect upon the attendance, there was a large audience present, and the rendering of the programme, which consisted exclusively of Wagner's music, was greatly enjoyed. As a Wagnerian conductor, Mr. Paur is at his best, and no interpretation could have been more sympathetic, illuminative, lucid, brilliant and poetic than his interpretation last evening of the various numbers in the interesting arrangement presented. The delivery of the "Siegfried" idyll and of the "Waldwaben" was exquisitely delicate and clear, while the power and brilliancy which distinguished the playing of the "Tannhauser" and "Meistersinger" overtures and the "Ride of the Valkyries" were remarkable. Mr. Ben Davies, a good tenor and a singer of distinction, was the soloist. He has a clear, true, resonant voice, and an excellent method, and his singing of the "Prize Song" from "Die Meistersinger" and the "Spring Song" from "Die Walkure," though too much in the English oratorio manner to be Wagnerian, was pleasantly effective, and elicited much applause. The orchestra will give its closing concert next Saturday afternoon, when the following attractive programme will be performed:

Weber.....Overture, "Freischuetz"

Songs with pianoforte.

Schumann.....
a. .....
b. .....
c. Mendelssohn.....Fruhlingslied, Op. 47, No. 8
Brahms.....Three Hungarian Dances, Nos 15, 17, 19
Saint-Saens.....Rondo Capriccioso for Violin
Auber.....Overture, "Fra Diavolo"
Delibes.....Ballet Music, "Sylvia"

Songs with Pianoforte.

a. Rubinstein.....
b. Delibes.....
Strauss.....a. Waltz, "Wine, Woman and Song"
b. Polka, "Singer's Joy"

Mme. Lillian Blauvelt and Mr. T. Adamowski will be the soloists.

...Orchestra.

Mr. Ben Davis, the well-known English tenor, will be the soloist at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall Wednesday night. The concert will be the last which the orchestra will give here this season. The programme will be Wagnerian and the two selections by Mr. Davis, the "Prize Song" from "Die Meistersinger" and the "Spring Song" from "Die Walkure," will be the gems of the evening. An interesting and useful list of the works that have been performed this season will be found in the analytical programmes, which have grown to be a feature of these concerts.

Music Hall.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. | WAGNER PROGRAMME.

MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.
FIFTH AND LAST CONCERT
WEDNESDAY EVE., MARCH 25, AT 8.15.

PROGRAMME:

Overture, "Tannhauser," "Preludes to Acts 1 and 3," and "Lohengrin's Legend," from Act 3, from "Lohengrin;" "A Faust Overture;" "Idyll," from "Siegfried;" "Overture" and "Prize Song," from "Die Meistersinger;" "Vorspiel and Liebestod," from "Tristan and Isolde;" "Spring Song" and "Ride of the Walkyries." from "Die Walkure."

SOLOIST, MR. BEN DAVIES.

Tickets now on sale at Albert's, 13 North Charles street.

MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. | Davies

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.
FIFTH AND LAST CONCERT,
WEDNESDAY EVENING, MARCH 25, at 8:15.
WAGNER PROGRAMME

Tannhauser Overture. Lohengrin. Preludes Acts I and III. Siegfried, Idyll. A Faust Overture. Siegfried. Walweben. Die Meistersinger, Prize-Song. Die Meistersinger. Prelude. Die Walkure, Spring-Song. Die Walkure. Ride of Valkyries.

Tickets Now on Sale at Albert's, 13 N. Charles street. mh21-d&S

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.

Wagnerian Concert by the Bostonese—Sousa's Band.

The fifth and last concert announced by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Music Hall next Wednesday evening, will be made up entirely of Wagner selections. It is safe to say that the "Tannhauser" and "Faust" overtures, the preludes to acts one and three of "Lohengrin" and the "Siegfried Idyll" lose none of their charm or effectiveness when presented in a concert, while no more beautiful illustrations of descriptive music can be found than the "Ride of the Walkyries" and the "Waldweben" from "Siegfried." The soloist will be Mr. Ben Davies, the famous English tenor, whose selection will be the ever beautiful "Prize Song" from "Die Meistersinger," and the "Spring Song" from "Die Walkure."

Sousa will bring his military band to the Music Hall tomorrow night. Mr. Sousa is assisted on his tour by two charming young artists—the one, Miss Myrta French, a soprano of unquestionable superiority, and the other the brilliant daughter of General Basil Duke, without doubt one of the finest solo violinists her sex has yet produced. She is a pupil of the celebrated Joachim.

MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. | WAGNER PROGRAMME.

MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.
FIFTH AND LAST CONCERT.
WEDNESDAY EVE., MARCH 25, AT 8:15.
PROGRAMME:

Overture, "Tannhauser," "Preludes to Acts 1 and 3," and "Lohengrin's Legend," from Act 3, from "Lohengrin;" "A Faust Overture;" "Idyll," from "Siegfried;" "Overture" and "Prize Song," from "Die Meistersinger;" "Vorspiel and Liebestod," from "Tristan and Isolde;" "Spring Song" and "Ride of the Walkyries," from "Die Walkure."

SOLOIST, MR. BEN DAVIES.

Tickets now on sale at Albert's, 13 North Charles street. mh20-d&Stf

---

Boston Symphony Concert.

The last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place on Wednesday night at the Music Hall. Mr. Ben Davies, the noted English tenor will be the soloist.

...MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. | DAVIES.

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.
FIFTH AND LAST CONCERT,
WEDNESDAY EVENING, MARCH 25, AT 8.15.

WAGNER PROGRAMME:

Tannhauser, Overture. Lohengrin, Preludes Acts I. and III. Siegfried, Idyll. A Faust Overture. Siegfried, Waldweben. Die Meistersinger, Prize-Song. Die Meistersinger, Prelude. Die Walkure, Spring Song. Die Walkure, Ride of Valkyries.

Tickets now on sale at Albert's, 13 North Charles street.

Symphony's Last Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its last concert in Baltimore for this season at Music Hall next Wednesday night. The soloists will be the noted English tenor, Ben Davies. The programme will be Wagnerian. The two selections to be given by the soloist will be from "Die Meistersinger" and "Die Walkure." The programme in full will be as follows:

Overture, "Tannhauser," "Preludes to Acts 1 and 3," and "Lohengrin's Legend," from Act 3, from "Lohengrin;" "A Faust Overture;" "Idyll," from "Siegfried;" "Overture" and "Prize Song," from "Die Meistersinger;" "Vorspiel and Liebestod," from "Tristan and Isolde;" "Spring Song" and "Ride of the Walkyries," from "Die Walkure."

The Orchestra is expected to arrive in Baltimore Tuesday. The usual Kneisel concert will be given at Music Hall Tuesday afternoon by the Kneisel Quartette and Mr. Harold Randolph of Baltimore. Tuesday evening the orchestra will go over to Washington for its regular concert there, returning to Baltimore at midnight.

—MUSIC HALL—

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA | DAVIES.

MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.
FIFTH AND LAST CONCERT.
WEDNESDAY EVE., MARCH 25, AT 8.15.
WAGNER PROGRAMME:

Tannhauser, Overture. Lohengrin, Preludes Acts I. and III. Siegfried, Idyll. A Faust Overture. Siegfried, Waldweben. Die Meistersinger, Prize-Song. Die Meistersinger, Prelude. Die Walkure, Spring-Song. Die Walkure, Ride of Valkyries.

Tickets Now on Sale at Albert's, 13 North Charles street.

Last Symphony Concert.

The fifth and last concert of this season's series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is announced for next Wednesday evening, March 25, at the Music Hall.

Ordinarily, the announcement of a programme devoted entirely to the works of Wagner is attended with the selection of one or more numbers unfitted for the concert stage, because of the compulsory lack of stage accessories; but in this case Conductor Paur seems to have avoided this error. The programme will include the "Tannhauser" and "A Faust" overtures; the preludes to acts one and three of "Lohengrin," and to "Die Meistersinger;" the "Idyll" and "Waldweben" from "Siegfried," and the "Ride of the Walkyries."

The soloist will be Mr. Ben Davies, the well-known English tenor, who will sing the "Prize Song" from "Die Meistersinger" and the "Spring Song" from "Die Walkure."

The above programme is one which every lover of the best in music, whether or not a Wagner enthusiast, will be sure to enjoy, and the concert will no doubt be a fitting close to the musical season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this city.

To Celebrate Pilgrims' Day.

MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. | WAGNER PROGRAMME.

MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.
FIFTH AND LAST CONCERT.
WEDNESDAY EVE., MARCH 25, AT 8.15.
PROGRAMME:

Overture, "Tannhauser," "Preludes to Act 1 and 3," and "Lohengrin's Legend," from Act 3, from "Lohengrin;" "A Faust Overture;" "Idyll," from "Siegfried;" "Overture" and "Prize Song," from "Die Meistersinger;" "Vorspiel and Liebestod," from "Tristan and Isolde;" "Spring Song" and "Ride of the Walkyries," from "Die Walkure."

SOLOIST, MR. BEN DAVIES.

Tickets Now on Sale at Albert's, 13 North Charles street.

Herald 19

SYMPHONY TO COME AGAIN.

Assistant Manager Comee Arranging Dates for Next Season.

The final concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was attended by a large audience last night, which expressed frequent approval of the Wagner programme. The soloist, Mr. Ben Davies, the English tenor, was well received and gave two numbers with power and expression. On the whole the orchestra has reason to feel complimented with its Baltimore season. That it does feel pleased with the appreciation of its efforts is proved by the fact that Assistant Manager Comee is already engaging dates for next season at Music Hall. The orchestra will come back essentially the same. Conductor Paur will be retained and the personnel of the organization will hardly be changed at all.

Joseffy to Play Here.

Wednesday evening, January 22, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its third performance of this season, the 1,354th performance, and its 36th in this city. Of unusual interest to the patrons of these concerts will be the announcement that Mr. Rafael Joseffy, after five years of retirement from the concert field, will make his reappearance. Mr. Joseffy will be remembered as the leading pianist in this country at the time of his withdrawal, and, as he has not allowed his great talent to lie idle, it is safe to assume that he will at once resume his old position as one of the greatest favorites among all our soloists.

Mr. Joseffy was born in Miskolcz, Hungary, in 1853. He had for his first teacher in Leipzic the famous Moscheles, and for his second the equally great Tausig. Joseffy's great genius enabled him to accomplish in a brief time what talent can acquire only with years of hardest study, and he became famous after but a single trip through Holland and Germany.

Mr. Joseffy, some months ago, appeared with the Thomas Orchestra in Chicago, and scored a most remarkable triumph. Two weeks ago, in the regular series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Providence, R. I., which was Mr. Joseffy's initial performance with this orchestra since his re-entering the concert field, another brilliant success was recorded.

The Music Thieves.

MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. | WAGNER PROGRAMME.

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.
FIFTH AND LAST CONCERT,
Wednesday Evening, March 25th, at 8.15.

PROGRAMME:

Overture, "Tannhauser," "Preludes to Acts 1 and 3," and "Lohengrin's Legend," from Act 3, from "Lohengrin;" "A Faust Overture;" "Idyll," from "Siegfried;" "Overture" and "Prize Song," from "Die Meistersinger;" "Vorspiel and Liebestod," from "Tristan and Isolde;" "Spring Song" and "Ride of the Walkyries," from "Die Walkure."

SOLOIST, MR. BEN DAVIS.

Tickets now on sale at Albert's, 13 North Charles street.

Boston Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall.

The fifth and last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place at Music Hall on next Wednesday evening under the direction of Mr. Emil Paur, conductor. It will be essentially a Wagner program, and the soloist for the occasion will be Mr. Ben Davies, the famous English tenor, who will be heard in Baltimore for the first time. Mr. Davies has been the craze in London for the past two seasons and his voice is said to be of exquisite purity and volume. The superb organization will give the following program: Overture, "Tannhauser," "Preludes to Acts 1 and 3," and "Lohengrin's Legend," from Act 3, from "Lohengrin;" "A Faust Overture;" "Idyll," from "Siegfried;" "Overture" and "Prize Song," from "Die Meistersinger;" "Vorspiel and Liebestod," from "Tristan and Isolde;" "Spring Song" and "Ride of the Walkyries" from "Die Walkure." Tickets at Albert's.

MUSIC HALL—BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.—This thoroughly brilliant organization will give its fifth and last concert this season at the Music Hall, Wednesday, March 25, beginning 8.15 P. M., under the direction of its leader, Mr. Emil Paur. A carefully selected program has been arranged embracing the following: Overture, "Tannhauser," "Preludes to Acts 1 and 3," and "Lohengrin's Legend," from Act 3, from "Lohengrin;" "A Faust Overture;" "Idyll," from "Siegfried;" "Overture" and "Prize Song," from "Die Meistersinger;" "Vorspiel and Liebestod," from "Tristan and Isolde;" "Spring Song" and "Ride of the Walkyries," from "Die Walkure." Soloist, Mr. Ben Davis. All lovers of music will scarcely let this opportunity pass to once more hear this aggregation of talent e'er their season closes as far as this city is concerned. Procure tickets at Albert's, 13 N. Charles street.

MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. | WAGNER PROGRAMME.

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor
FIFTH AND LAST CONCERT,
Wednesday Evening, Mar. 25, at 8.15

PROGRAMME—"Tannhauser," "Preludes to Acts 1 and 3," and "Lohengrin's Legend," from Act 3, from "Lohengrin;" "A Faust Overture;" "Idyll," from "Siegfried;" "Overture" and "Prize Song," from "Die Meistersinger;" "Vorspiel and Liebestod," from "Tristan and Isolde;" "Spring Song" and "Ride of the Walkyries," from "Die Walkure."

SOLOIST, MR. BEN DAVIES.

Tickets now on sale at Albert's, 13 North Charles street.

Mus 22nd

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Rafael Joseffy, the Pianist, to Appear As the Soloist.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's third concert for this season in Baltimore, at Music Hall tonight, will be an occasion of unusual interest on account of the reappearance of Rafael Joseffy, pianist, after several years' retirement from the platform.

Joseffy is preferred by many to Paderewski as having more warmth of expression. Joseffy was born in Miskolcz, Hungary, in 1853. Moscheles, in Leipzic, was his first teacher, and the equally well-known Tausig, his second. He became celebrated with but a single trip through Holland and Germany. On the occasion of his appearance in Vienna, a well-known critic said: "With equal force he produces the peculiar effects of the classic Bach, the tender Chopin, the sentimental Mendelssohn and the impetuous Liszt."

When Joseffy came to America it was with an already established reputation as one of the greatest pianists in the world. He made his first appearance this season with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its regular series of concerts at Providence, R. I., two weeks ago. The applause was prolonged, Mr. Joseffy being recalled five times.

Tonight's concert will be the Orchestra's 1354th. The programme will be as follows:

Beethoven, Symphony No. 3, "Eroica;" Brahms, Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 2; Berlioz, a, Minuet of Will-o'-the-Wisps; b, Waltz of Sylphs; from "The Damnation of Faust;" Beethoven, Overture, "Egmont."

Prof. Richard Burmeister of the Peabody will give a dinner to Rafael Joseffy, the Kneisel Quartette and Mr. Emil Paur tonight after the concert. The dinner will be given at his home, 918 North ... street.

[109]

E PHILADELPHIA
RECORD, TUESDAY
ORNING, MARCH 24

A Wagnerian Contretemps.

A peculiarly interesting Wagner programme was rendered by the Bostor Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last evening to signalize the farewell concert of the eleventh Philadelphia season. Seldom, it is safe to say, has such a queer selection of the "Art Work of the Future" been placed together in a concert patchwork. The general character was by no means typical in the broad sense, although oddly representative of some of the most fantastic phases of the great German maestro's genius. This is not to say that the programme did not include some of Wagner's most effective music; it opened, on the contrary, with the famous "Tannhaeuser" overture, included the delightfully picturesque "Forest sounds" (Waldweben) from "Siegfried," and concluded with the stormy and wild "Ride of the Walkyries." But plainly no adequate representation of the distinctively great Wagnerian "concert-stuecke" (programme music) had been contemplated by Herr Paur; indeed, the ordinary concert exigencies would perhaps have prevented any such plan. As it was, this uniquely temperamental conductor had evidently sought to present Wagner in certain of his most conspicuously popular moods, and in this he must be acknowledged to have succeeded to a musically amusing and suggestive degree. The "Tannhaeuser" overture, with its sublime wrestling of the pilgrim's chorus and the Venusberg siren choir, was counterbalanced by the "Meistersinger" prelude, with its Beckmesser drollery culminating in what has been fittingly styled "cat music;" the "Meistersinger" contest being truly a burlesque upon the Wartburg minstrelsy. In sharp contrast to these two sides of a characteristic Wagnerian medallion and in equally distinct spirit to each other were the highly descriptive "Forest Sounds," with its echoing bird song, and the fierce storm galop of the warrior maids of Walhalla. Compared to these large architectures, the musical framework of the little "Siegfried" idyll, written for a childlike orchestra, and even the "Faust" overture with its sombre harmonies seemed to be of a diminutive sort. These rather unfamiliar works were composed—the one, of Nibelung themes as a birthday gift to his wife in celebration of their young son, Siegfried, and the other, of two main themes to characterize the drifting Faust, a melancholy strain mingled with a tenderly yearning strain. The two songs selected for the evening and sung in an impressively sweet tenor by the soloist, Mr. Ben Davies, added emphatically to the peculiar tone of the programme. They were Walther's prize song from "Die Meistersinger" and Siegmund's love song from "Die Walkure," which is so nearly an old-style Italian aria as to have made one not over-Wagnerian listener of its performance once regret that Siegmund could not come forward to the footlights and sing it in the regulation Italian style. Both songs were by Mr. Davies sung in English, furthermore. And to cap the climax of this remakable Wagner evening the concert was over at 9.40 P. M.

The North American

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

TUESDAY, MARCH 24, 1896.

MUSIC AT THE ACADEMY.

Last Concert for the Season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The fifth and last evening concert for the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at the Academy of Music last night. Although the storm naturally had some effect upon the attendance, there was a large audience present, and the rendering of the programme, which consisted exclusively of Wagner's music, was greatly enjoyed. As a Wagnerian conductor, Mr. Paur is at his best, and no interpretation could have been more sympathetic, illuminative, lucid, brilliant and poetic than his interpretation last evening of the various numbers in the interesting arrangement presented. The delivery of the "Siegfried" idyll and of the "Waldwaben" was exquisitely delicate and clear, while the power and brilliancy which distinguished the playing of the "Tannhauser" and "Meistersinger" overtures and the "Ride of the Valkyries" were remarkable. Mr. Ben Davies, a good tenor and a singer of distinction, was the soloist. He has a clear, true, resonant voice, and an excellent method, and his singing of the "Prize Song" from "Die Meistersinger" and the "Spring Song" from "Die Walkure," though too much in the English oratorio manner to be Wagnerian, was pleasantly effective, and elicited much applause. The orchestra will give its closing concert next Saturday afternoon, when the following attractive programme will be performed:

Weber.....Overture, "Freischuetz"
Songs with pianoforte.
a. Schumann.....
b. Liszt.....
c. Mendelssohn.....
Brahms..Three Hungarian Dances, Nos 15, 17, 19
Saint-Saens.....Rondo Capriccioso for Violin
Auber.....Overture, "Fra Diavolo"
Delibes.....Ballet Music, "Sylvia"
Songs with Pianoforte.
a. Rubinstein.....
b. Delibes.....
Strauss... { a. Waltz, "Wine, Woman and Song"
b. Polka, "Singer's Joy"

Mme. Lillian Blauvelt and Mr. T. Adamowski will be the soloists.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Ben Davis, the noted English tenor, will be the soloist at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall Wednesday night. The concert will be the last which the orchestra will give here this season. The programme will be Wagnerian and the two selections by Mr. Davis, the "Prize Song" from "Die Meistersinger" and the "Spring Song" from "Die Walkure," will be the gems of the evening. An interesting and useful list of the works that have been performed this season will be found in the analytical programmes, which have grown to be a feature of these concerts.

Music Hall.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. | WAGNER PROGRAMME.

MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.
FIFTH AND LAST CONCERT
WEDNESDAY EVE., MARCH 25, AT 8.15.

PROGRAMME:

Overture, "Tannhauser," "Preludes to Acts 1 and 3," and "Lohengrin's Legend," from Act 3, from "Lohengrin;" "A Faust Overture;" "Idyll," from "Siegfried;" "Overture" and "Prize Song," from "Die Meistersinger;" "Vorspiel and Liebstod," from "Tristan and Isolde;" "Spring Song" and "Ride of the Walkyries," from "Die Walkure."

SOLOIST, MR. BEN DAVIES.

Tickets now on sale at Albert's, 13 North Charles street. ‡

MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. | Davies

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.
FIFTH AND LAST CONCERT,
WEDNESDAY EVENING, MARCH 25, at 8:15.
WAGNER PROGRAMME

Tannhauser Overture. Lohengrin. Preludes Acts I and III. Siegfried, Idyll. A Faust Overture. Siegfried, Walweben. Die Meistersinger, Prize-Song. Die Meistersinger. Prelude. Die Walkure, Spring-Song. Die Walkure. Ride of Valkyries.

Tickets Now on Sale at Albert's, 13 N. Charles street. mh21-4t&S

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.

Wagnerian Concert by the Bostonese—Sousa's Band.

The fifth and last concert announced by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Music Hall next Wednesday evening, will be made up entirely of Wagner selections. It is safe to say that the "Tannhauser" and "Faust" overtures, the preludes to acts one and three of "Lohengrin" and the "Siegfried Idyll" lose none of their charm or effectiveness when presented in a concert, while no more beautiful illustrations of descriptive music can be found than the "Ride of the Walkyries" and the "Waldweben" from "Siegfried." The soloist will be Mr. Ben Davies, the famous English tenor, whose selection will be the ever beautiful "Prize Song" from "Die Meistersinger," and the "Spring Song" from "Die Walkure."

Sousa will bring his military band to the Music Hall tomorrow night. Mr. Sousa is assisted on his tour by two charming young artists—the one, Miss Myrta French, a soprano of unquestionable superiority, and the other the brilliant daughter of General Basil Duke, without doubt one of the finest solo violinists her sex has yet produced. She is a pupil of the celebrated Joachim.

MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. | WAGNER PROGRAMME.

MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.
FIFTH AND LAST CONCERT.
WEDNESDAY EVE., MARCH 25, AT 8:15.
PROGRAMME:

Overture, "Tannhauser," "Preludes to Acts 1 and 3," and "Lohengrin's Legend," from Act 3, from "Lohengrin"; "A Faust Overture"; "Idyll," from "Siegfried"; "Overture" and "Prize Song," from "Die Meistersinger"; "Vorspiel and Liebestod," from "Tristan and Isolde"; "Spring Song" and "Ride of the Walkyries," from "Die Walkure."

SOLOIST, MR. BEN DAVIES.

Tickets now on sale at Albert's, 13 North Charles street. mh20-d&Stf

---

Boston Symphony Concert.

The last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place on Wednesday night at the Music Hall. Mr. Ben Davies, the noted English tenor will be the soloist.

Mus SYMPHONY TO COME AGAIN. 3/24

Assistant Manager Comee Arranging Dates for Next Season.

The final concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was attended by a large audience last night, which expressed frequent approval of the Wagner programme. The soloist, Mr. Ben Davies, the English tenor, was well received and gave two numbers with power and expression. On the whole the orchestra has reason to feel complimented with its Baltimore season. That it does feel pleased with the appreciation of its efforts is proved by the fact that Assistant Manager Comee is already engaging dates for next season at Music Hall. The orchestra will come back essentially the same. Conductor Paur will be retained and the personnel of the organization will hardly be changed at all.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA | DAVIES.

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.
FIFTH AND LAST CONCERT
WEDNESDAY EVENING, MARCH 25, AT 8.15.
WAGNER PROGRAMME:

Tannhauser, Overture. Lohengrin, Preludes Acts I. and III. Siegfried, Idyll. A Faust Overture. Siegfried, Waldweben. Die Meistersinger, Prize-Song. Die Meistersinger, Prelude. Die Walkure, Spring Song. Die Walkure, Ride of Valkyries.

Tickets now on sale at Albert's, 13 North Charles street.

Symphony's Last Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its last concert in Baltimore for this season at Music Hall next Wednesday night. The soloists will be the noted English tenor, Ben Davies. The programme will be Wagnerian. The two selections to be given by the soloist will be from "Die Meistersinger" and "Die Walkure." The programme in full will be as follows:

Overture, "Tannhauser," "Preludes to Acts 1 and 3," and "Lohengrin's Legend," from Act 3, from "Lohengrin;" "A Faust Overture;" "Idyll," from "Siegfried;" "Overture" and "Prize Song," from "Die Meistersinger;" "Vorspiel and Liebestod," from "Tristan and Isolde;" "Spring Song" and "Ride of the Walkyries," from "Die Walkure."

The Orchestra is expected to arrive in Baltimore Tuesday. The usual Kneisel concert will be given at Music Hall Tuesday afternoon by the Kneisel Quartette and Mr. Harold Randolph of Baltimore. Tuesday evening the orchestra will go over to Washington for its regular concert there, returning to Baltimore at midnight.

—MUSIC HALL—

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESRTA | DAVIES.

MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.
FIFTH AND LAST CONCERT.
WEDNESDAY EVE., MARCH 25, AT 8.15.
WAGNER PROGRAMME:

Tannhauser, Overture. Lohengrin, Preludes Acts I. and III. Siegfried, Idyll. A Faust Overture. Siegfried, Waldweben. Die Meistersinger, Prize-Song. Die Meistersinger, Prelude. Die Walkure, Spring-Song. Die Walkure. Ride of Valkyries.

Tickets Now on Sale at Albert's, 13 North Charles street.

Last Symphony Concert.

The fifth and last concert of this season's series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is announced for next Wednesday evening, March 25, at the Music Hall.

Ordinarily, the announcement of a programme devoted entirely to the works of Wagner is attended with the selection of one or more numbers unfitted for the concert stage, because of the compulsory lack of stage accessories; but in this case Conductor Paur seems to have avoided this error. The programme will include the "Tannhauser" and "A Faust" overtures; the preludes to acts one and three of "Lohengrin," and to "Die Meistersinger;" the "Idyll" and "Waldweben" from "Siegfried," and the "Ride of the Walkyries."

The soloist will be Mr. Ben Davies, the well-known English tenor, who will sing the "Prize Song" from "Die Meistersinger" and the "Spring Song" from "Die Walkure."

The above programme is one which every lover of the best in music, whether or not a Wagner enthusiast, will be sure to enjoy, and the concert will no doubt be a fitting close to the musical season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this city.

To Celebrate Pilgrims' Day.

MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. | WAGNER PROGRAMME.

MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.
FIFTH AND LAST CONCERT.
WEDNESDAY EVE., MARCH 25, AT 8.15
PROGRAMME:

Overture, "Tannhauser," "Preludes to Act 1 and 3," and "Lohengrin's Legend," from Act 3, from "Lohengrin;" "A Faust Overture;" "Idyll," from "Siegfried;" "Overture" and "Prize Song," from "Die Meistersinger;" "Vorspiel and Liebestod," from "Tristan and Isolde;" "Spring Song" and "Ride of the Walkyries," from "Die Walkure."

SOLOIST, MR. BEN DAVIES.

Tickets Now on Sale at Albert's, 13 North Charles street.

Herald 14

Joseffy to Play Here.

Wednesday evening, January 22, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its third performance of this season, the 1,354th performance, and its 36th in this city. Of unusual interest to the patrons of these concerts will be the announcement that Mr. Rafael Joseffy, after five years of retirement from the concert field, will make his reappearance. Mr. Joseffy will be remembered as the leading pianist in this country at the time of his withdrawal, and, as he has not allowed his great talent to lie idle, it is safe to assume that he will at once resume his old position as one of the greatest favorites among all our soloists.

Mr. Joseffy was born in Miskolcz, Hungary, in 1853. He had for his first teacher in Leipzic the famous Moscheles, and for his second the equally great Tausig. Joseffy's great genius enabled him to accomplish in a brief time what talent can acquire only with years of hardest study, and he became famous after but a single trip through Holland and Germany.

Mr. Joseffy, some months ago, appeared with the Thomas Orchestra in Chicago, and scored a most remarkable triumph. Two weeks ago, in the regular series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Providence, R. I., which was Mr. Joseffy's initial performance with this orchestra since his re-entering the concert field, another brilliant success was recorded.

The Music Thieves.

MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. | WAGNER PROGRAMME.

MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.
FIFTH AND LAST CONCERT,
Wednesday Evening, March 25th, at 8.15.

PROGRAMME:

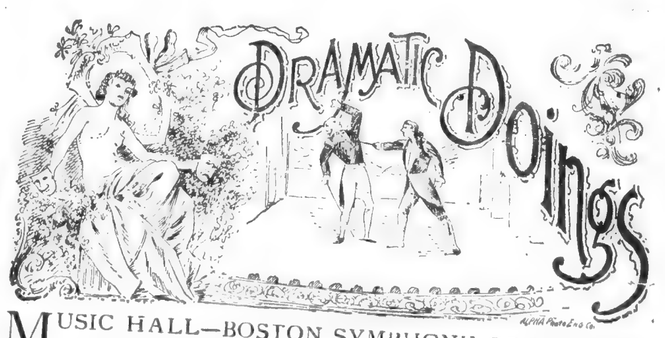
Overture, "Tannhauser," "Preludes to Acts 1 and 3," and "Lohengrin's Legend," from Act 3, from "Lohengrin"; "A Faust Overture"; "Idyll," from "Siegfried"; "Overture" and "Prize Song," from "Die Meistersinger"; "Vorspiel and Liebestod," from "Tristan and Isolde"; "Spring Song" and "Ride of the Walkyries," from "Die Walkure."

SOLOIST, MR. BEN DAVIS.

Tickets now on sale at Albert's, 13 North Charles street.

Boston Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall.

The fifth and last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place at Music Hall on next Wednesday evening under the direction of Mr. Emil Paur, conductor. It will be essentially a Wagner program, and the soloist for the occasion will be Mr. Ben Davies, the famous English tenor, who will be heard in Baltimore for the first time. Mr. Davies has been the craze in London for the past two seasons and his voice is said to be of exquisite purity and volume. The superb organization will give the following program: Overture, "Tannhauser," "Preludes to Acts 1 and 3," and "Lohengrin's Legend," from Act 3, from "Lohengrin;" "A Faust Overture;" "Idyll," from "Siegfried;" "Overture" and "Prize Song," from "Die Meistersinger;" "Vorspiel and Liebestod," from "Tristan and Isolde;" "Spring Song" and "Ride of the Walkyries" from "Die Walkure." Tickets at Albert's.



MUSIC HALL—BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.—This thoroughly brilliant organization will give its fifth and last concert this season at the Music Hall, Wednesday, March 25, beginning 8.15 P. M., under the direction of its leader, Mr. Emil Paur. A carefully selected program has been arranged embracing the following: Overture, "Tannhauser," "Preludes to Acts 1 and 3," and "Lohengrin's Legend," from Act 3, from "Lohengrin;" "A Faust Overture;" "Idyll," from "Siegfried;" "Overture" and "Prize Song," from "Die Meistersinger;" "Vorspiel and Liebestod," from "Tristan and Isolde;" "Spring Song" and "Ride of the Walkyries," from "Die Walkure." Soloist, Mr. Ben Davis. All lovers of music will scarcely let this opportunity pass to once more hear this aggregation of talent e'er their season closes as far as this city is concerned. Procure tickets at Albert's, 13 N Charles street.

MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. | WAGNER PROGRAMME.

MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR
FIFTH AND LAST CONCERT,
Wednesday Evening, Mar. 25, at 8 15

PROGRAMME—"Tannhauser," "Preludes to Acts 1 and 3," and "Lohengrin's Legend," from Act 3, from "Lohengrin;" "A Faust Overture;" "Idyll," from "Siegfried;" "Overture" and "Prize Song," from "Die Meistersinger;" "Vorspiel and Liebestod," from "Tristan and Isolde;" "Spring Song" and "Ride of the Walkyries," from "Die Walkure."

SOLOIST, MR. BEN DAVIES.

Tickets now on sale at Albert's, 13 North Charles street.

Mus 22nd

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Rafael Joseffy, the Pianist, to Appear As the Soloist.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's third concert for this season in Baltimore, at Music Hall tonight, will be an occasion of unusual interest on account of the reappearance of Rafael Joseffy, pianist, after several years' retirement from the platform.

Joseffy is preferred by many to Paderewski as having more warmth of expression. Joseffy was born in Miskolcz, Hungary, in 1853. Moscheles, in Leipzic, was his first teacher, and the equally well-known Tausig, his second. He became celebrated with but a single trip through Holland and Germany. On the occasion of his appearance in Vienna, a well-known critic said: "With equal force he produces the peculiar effects of the classic Bach, the tender Chopin, the sentimental Mendelssohn and the impetuous Liszt."

When Joseffy came to America it was with an already established reputation as one of the greatest pianists in the world. He made his first appearance this season with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its regular series of concerts at Providence, R. I., two weeks ago. The applause was prolonged, Mr. Joseffy being recalled five times.

Tonight's concert will be the Orchestra's 1354th. The programme will be as follows:

Beethoven, Symphony No. 3, "Eroica;" Brahms, Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 2; Berlioz, a, Minuet of Will-o'-the-Wisps; b, Waltz of Sylphs; from "The Damnation of Faust;" Beethoven, Overture, "Egmont."

Prof. Richard Burmeister of the Peabody will give a dinner to Rafael Joseffy, the Kneisel Quartette and Mr. Emil Pauer tonight after the concert. The dinner will be given at his home, 918 North Calvert street.

---

[109]

Mar 3 '25

LAST SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Ben Davies the Soloist—Review of the Season's Work.

Mr. Ben Davies will be the soloist of the last concert for this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall tonight. The orchestra arrived in town yesterday as usual and went over to Washington last night to give its regular concert there. It returned last night after the concert and is staying at the Carrollton Hotel. The programme of Wagner numbers selected for tonight is as follows:

"Tannhauser," overture; "Lohengrin," preludes to Acts I. and III.; "Siegfried," idyl, in E major; a Faust overture, in D minor; "Siegfried," "Waldweben;" "Die Meistersinger," Walther's prize-song; "Die Meistersinger," prelude; "Die Walkure," spring-song; "Die Walkure," "Ride of the Valkyries."

Mr. F. R. Comee, assistant manager, said this morning:

"The concert tonight will be the 38th given by the orchestra in Baltimore. It will be the 1387th given by the orchestra since its organization, 15 years ago. At the opening of the present season the orchestra had given a total of 1305 concerts. With the few remaining, to be given in Boston, the total at the end of the season will be 1404. Of the 99 concerts this season, 48 were given in Boston, the home of the Symphony, in two separate series of 24 Friday afternoon public rehearsals and 24 Saturday-night concerts. Ten concerts have been given under the auspices of Harvard College in the Sanders Theatre, which is a part of the Harvard Memorial Hall. Six have been given in Providence, R. I., two series of five each in Philadelphia, five each in the Metropolitan Opera House, New York; the Academy of Music, Brooklyn; Metzerott Hall, Washington, and Music Hall, Baltimore.

"Fall River and Springfield, Mass., Portland, Me., have each had one concert, and two special concerts have been given in Boston, one with Paderewski and one for the benefit of the family of a member of the orchestra, who was stricken and became unable to earn a living.

"The attendance has been better than ever this season and the large and uniform receipts are the best indications of the appreciation of good music manifested by Baltimoreans. The fact that this orchestra was organized by Mr. Henry L. Higginson of Boston and has always been a private enterprise, precludes the publishing of exact figures as to the financial receipts of the season. An average of nearly 100 concerts a year since its organization given in a number of the larger cities of the country, will give some idea of the enormous amount of money necessary to sustain so large an organization of first-class musical artists.

"The soloists of the season have been Jndricek, violin; Joseffy, piano; Campanari, baritone; Ternina, soprano, and tonight, Davies, tenor. The list of works played has included those of the following composers:

"Beethoven, Berlioz, Brahms, Bruch, Handel, Haydn, Liszt, Leoncavallo, Mendelssohn, Mozart, Richard Strauss, Tschaikowsky, Verdi, Wagner, Weber."

The series of concerts by the Kneisel Quartette concluded at Music Hall yesterday afternoon with a programme which was one of the best of the season. Three additional members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Messrs. W. F. Kraft and G. Strube, violins, and F. Keller, double bass, lent their assistance in the rendition of an arrangement by S. Bachrich of one of Handel's concerti grossi.

American 3/26

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.

Last of the Boston Symphony Concerts This Season.

The eleventh season of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was closed last night at Music Hall by a remarkably fine performance. The evening was devoted entirely to Wagner's music. The selections were: Overture to Tannhauser; preludes to the first and third acts of Lohengrin; the "Siegfried Idyll;" the Faust overture; "Waldweben," from Siegfried; prelude to The Meister-Singers Ride of the Valkyries, for the orchestra, and Walter's Prize Song from the Meistersingers, and the Spring Song from "Die Walkuere," sung by Mr. Ben Davies. The work of the orchestra throughout was on the highest plane. One becomes more and more aware of the grandeur, depth and beauty of Wagner's works when they are performed by such a matchless body of players under Mr. Paur's guidance. Where there was so much excellence it is not proper to specialize. One may be excused, however, for referring to the beautiful rendition of the prelude to the first act of Lohengrin. It is doubtful if anybody of strings in the world could produce a finer effect. Throughout the playing of it the house was so quiet that it seemed one could have, in fact, almost heard the sound of a pin if one had been dropped. The words of the poet came to mind instinctively:

"The beating of our own hearts
Was all the sound we heard."

That is all, except that of the orchestra. Mr. Davies, who is well-known as an accomplished singer, gave his songs with fine taste and expression. His voice is strong, clear and sweet and excellently developed in the lower register. He was recalled again and again, and Mr. Paur was applauded to the echo. The concerts of this orchestra have now become one of the greatest enjoyments of the winter. It is to be hoped that the managers next season will give Baltimore at least double the number. Last night's concert was the thirty-eighth given in this city, and the 1,387th performance of the orchestra since its organization.

[110]

Brooklyn Daily Eagle

SATURDAY EVENING, MARCH 28, 1896.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The last of the season's concerts under direction of the Brooklyn Institute and by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at the Academy of Music last evening. The attendance was gratifying, albeit a couple of hundred seats might have been filled to the general advantage. Mr. Paur had arranged for the occasion a rather formal and conservative programme, embracing the "Pastoral" symphony, a couple of Handel songs, part of the Mendelssohn violin concerto, the "Freischuetz" overture and the prize song from "The Master Singers;" the Wagner number being after these years of use worthy to pass among the accepted perfections. The only thing that savored of novelty was a set of three Hungarian dances, the paraphrases of Dvorak upon themes by the terrible Brahms, who in this instance really has something to say and expresses it in action and music instead of mathematics and metaphysics. At first the orchestra was sluggish and the first two numbers of the symphony were played in a rather mechanical fashion; yet it is hard to invest these realisms of Beethoven with high beauty. They verge on imitation, which is never art. He gives us the fact where we listen for the spirit. This is not characteristic of the man, for it occurs only in this symphony, and in but a little of that. If one would hear how natural beauty may be told in music, let him listen to the waldweben of "Siegfried" or to the storm in this same symphony, which is, both as a picture and a performance, beyond the scene by the brook. Without grossness or fury, indeed, with such a temperance as we would find in no composer of the last half century, the circumstance of the tempest is related and in a way that is impressive. The passage of wind and rain, the coming and recession of the thunders, the startling flash of lightning, are suggested instead of copied, and the imagination is not restrained by obvious disparities between the real and the semblant. There is nothing finer, in its way, in music, than the clearing of the storm, the rumbling off of the thunder, the clear, peaceful song that follows. It is always as if a veritable air of heaven had passed through the hot room, taking its foulness and bringing scents of fields and a distant warble from the woods. In playing this storm the orchestra regained the spirit that was expected of it, and through the rest of the evening kept the performance at its usual standard. The Brahms dances, strange to say, have lost a little of their strength and wildness under the doctoring of Dr. Dvorak, but perhaps they have gained in acceptance to the popular ear by an increased fluency and smoothness. Usually it is as well to let a man speak for himself, if he has anything to say, and while it is legitimate to make orchestral pieces from piano literature, and vice versa, there is a certain peril in transcriptions, albeit, Brahms has made himself subject to them by doing some transcribing of his own, as in the case of Haydn's "Chorale St. Anthoni." The overture to "Der Freischuetz" was begun in a dragging manner as to tempo, but this is a not infrequent habit with Mr. Paur, as it enables him to heighten contrasts when he enters the dramatic part of a work. The Mendelssohn concerto, at least the andante and finale—the allegro is better worth while than the finale—was played by Mr. Timotheus Adamonski, who sits just behind kappelmeister Kneisel, looks like a good American and is one of three members of the violin corps that play solos. This artist has a smooth style, not very strong, but highly agreeable, and he plays with feeling, but without excess of sentiment. It was good to hear the sweet and tender music of this number so capably interpreted. He might have spared time to play the whole concerto. Ben Davies, the tenor from the other side, who made his first appearance here in grand concert on this occasion, was received with enthusiasm. He is a solid and satisfactory singer, a stalwart fellow with a manly voice, in spite of its high range, and the bearing of an army officer. The stiffness of his spine makes him bow perky, but that would have been a small matter if he had not been compelled to come out and bow so often. He sings with a pure chest tone that is nearly even in all its range and that is clear and far carrying in spite of the fact that his voice is not one phenomenal for mere volume. His singing is a lesson in voice management. He gave the "Deeper and Deeper, Still" with its addendum of "Waft Her, Angels,"—good, honest old Handel,—every line of it, sturdy, musical, free from gimcracks, and afterward sang the prize song with a fine smoothness and expression. He ought to be heard in opera, if he can act. At the end of the concert Mr. Paur was recalled twice and acknowledged the applause. It is a satisfaction to know that he has been re-engaged for next season and will play here under the auspices of the Brooklyn institute. During the season just closed, he has offered the following pieces:

Arditi, waltz song—"Se saran Rose," Mme. Melba
Auber ..... Overture, "Carlo Broschi"
Beethoven
Symphony No. 3, in E flat major, "Eroica."
Symphony No. 6, in F major, "Pastoral."
Berlioz
Minuet of "Will-o'-the-Wisps."
"Waltz of Sylphs."
From "The Damnation of Faust."
Brahms
Symphony No. 4, in E minor.
Concerto for pianoforte No. 2 ..Mr. Josefy
Brahms-Dvorak .....Three Hungarian Dances
Donizetti—Mad scene from "Lucia," Mme. Melba
Dvorak—"Waldesruhe" .....Mr. Schroeder
Gluck, aria, "Che faro" "Orpheus," Mme. Scalchi
Godard ..Orchestral Suite from "Jocelyn," No. 1
Gounod.....Aria from "La Reine de Saba," Mr. D'Aubigne.
Handel—Largo.
Recitative and aria, "Deeper and Deeper," and "Waft Her, Angels".....Mr. Davies
Aria—"With Verdure Clad".....Mme. Blauvelt
Klengel.....Capriccio, Op. 8, Mr. Schroeder
Leoncavallo.....Prologue, "I Pagliacci," Mr. Campanari.
Liszt.....Hungarian rhapsody No. 2.
Mendelssohn
Andante and Finale from concerto for violin, Mr. Adamowski.
Mozart—"Turkish March."
Aria, "Voi, che sapete," from "Marriage of Figaro" .....Mme. Blauvelt
Richard Strauss—Preludes to Acts I and II of "Guntram."
A. Thomas—Ophelie's mad scene (Act IV., scene 2) from "Hamlet".....Mme. De Vere-Sapio
Tschaikowsky....Symphony No. 6, in B minor, "Pathetique."
Tschaikowsky .....Overture "1812"
Verdi —Quartet from "Rigoletto,"
Mme. Melba, Mme. Scalchi, Mr. D'Aubigne, Mr. Campanari.
Monologue from "Falstaff".....Mr. Campanari
Viotti....Concerto for Violin, No. 22 in A minor, Mr. Kneisel.
Wagner
Overture, "Rienzi."
Prelude, "Tannhaeuser," Act III.
Prelude, "Lohengrin," Act III.
Walther's "Preislied" from "Die Meistersinger" .....Mr. Davies
Weber ..... Overture, "Freischuetz"

THE STANDARD UNION

SATURDAY EVENING, MARCH 28, 1896

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

It was fortunate for the Chicago Orchestra that it came before rather than after that from Boston. Last night the latter marched into the Academy, nearly one hundred strong, and easily carried all before it. It is not a matter of conductors—certainly Thomas is as good as Paur—it is that superb, that magnificent band. Where is there another like it, in promptness, in decision, in finish, in abundance of resource, in glorious tone effects? Certainly not in this country, and as a perfect instrument to be played upon at will by whomsoever happens to be its master; we doubt if it is surpassed by any similar organization in the world. Conductors may come and conductors may go, but that orchestra goes on forever, a living example of the value of incessant labor, the power of constant drill. To be sure there are, in its ranks, superior artists, who make themselves felt individually, as well as add immensely to the general effect. But with all this, and above all this, there is a vital force, a wonderful unity, which moves the most difficult harmonies as the wind does its waves. When this orchestra from Boston has the floor, that of Chicago is simply forgotten.

Yet it must be remembered that the one is a veteran in the musical world, the other but little more than a lusty babe, Then the impression of last night was accentuated by a well-balanced programme, neither long, heavy nor redundant. Mr. Paur is improving as a maker of programmes, while Mr. Thomas seems to have gone the other way. The Pastoral Symphony is not so great as the immortal seventh, and Paur is not such a Beethoven authority as Thomas, but that idyl of country life went gladly and well, and few had ever heard it, done better. Mr. Paur seemed in fine feather, and his men played with that spirit which is apt to mark a farewell, since this is the last we shall have of this organization till another season. Besides the Pastoral Symphony there were three Brahms—Dvorak Hungarian dances, given with great regard for their terpsichorean rhythm, the last taking on a flavor of Lisztian wildness; and the overture to "Der Freischuetz," one of those compositions which the Boston Orchestra, under Paur, interpret extremely well, with its brilliant climaxes and strong contrasts of light and shade. The spirited performance thawed even a Brooklyn Institute audience, which is ever noticeable for its coldness and decorum, and made Mr. Paur's reappearance a thing more desirable than a swift arrival home. Indeed, the concert was so well arranged as to be over in less than two hours, leaving all in the frame of mind to linger and do honor to the host, rather than rush for the door.

The Academy was jammed, and the applause was like thunder, and it is probable that everybody longed for a bit more. A great art to create that impression at the close of an evening.

The soloists were Mr. Adamowski, of the Orchestra, and Ben Davies. Mr. Adamowski gave the Andante and Finale from Mendelssohn's Concerto for the violin with that finish which the composition demands. His touch is somewhat superficial, but delicate and refined, and in full accord with the character of Mendelssohn's music. The Finale displayed the artist's finger facility, which is considerable, while the Andante was rendered with flowing sweetness. In Mendelssohn there is always charm, but he never stirs us, and the same might be said of Mr. Adamowski himself, as contrasted with his famous colleague among the first violins.

The distinguished English tenor, Ben Davies, appeared to best advantage in the Recitative and Aria from Handel. His voice is of the robust type, he uses it with confidence and skill, and in the Handel music he made a favorable impression. The enthusiasm which marked his presentation of this old concert war-horse is only another proof of the vitality which obtains with the Handel and Haydn compositions in England to this day. But the Prize Song from "Die Meistersinger" was taken at altogether too rapid a tempo, and every particle of expression eliminated from it entirely. The orchestra had difficulty in keeping up with the soloist, and flew through that beautiful accompaniment at breakneck speed. It seemed a pity to thus spoil what ought to have proved one of the gems of the evening.

It is announced—so great has been the success of the Boston Orchestra under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute and Philharmonic Society—that there will be a similar series of five concerts next winter. It is interesting to note that this is the fifteenth season of the Orchestra, the eighth in Brooklyn, and that last night's was the 1,389th performance. A great record this, and it is safe to say that none is more proud of this splendid band than the people of Greater New York, and that they regret sadly that they cannot have it for their very own.

IN HARMONY'S REALM.

Items of Interest to the Local Lyric World.

Herald 3/29

LAST BOSTON ORCHESTRA CONCERT

Auspicious Close of a Successful Season in Baltimore—Some Facts Regarding the Work of Thomas' Chicago Orchestra in New York—A Bit of Comparison—Other Matters Musical.

No doubt the musical people of Baltimore are sorry that the Boston Symphony Orchestra season is over. The fifth and last performance was Wednesday evening and closed with a halo of glory for this splendid organization.

The visit of this orchestra to Baltimore, prefaced as it were by the Kneisel Quartette concerts, is the only rift in the cloud that hangs over the instrumental doings of this vicinity. But for the Boston people good orchestral performances here would be as rare as snow in August. And it is to be hoped that manager Comee will increase the number of concerts next year, although he hardly took kindly to the idea when approached upon this subject on Wednesday night. He expressed some doubt as to whether it would prove a paying venture.

While Director Paur is hardly looked upon by local musicians as an ideal man for the place, the orchestra nevertheless is all there, and people are only too glad to avail themselves of the rare opportunity offered to hear good music well given, as they have evidenced this and other seasons. There has been some complaint that the programmes have not exactly been up to the Boston Symphony Orchestra standard, and this is said to have affected the sale of season tickets this year. This, perhaps, is true to a certain extent, but it must be remembered that Paur is neither a Gericke nor a Nikisch, and too much must not be expected of the man.

The Kneisel Quartette concerts are worthy of a better attendance than has been noticed at the performances given this year. Such chamber music is a revelation to the natives, who could hardly rake up a quartette from among the local musicians with a fine tooth comb capable of playing properly a simple sonatine arranged for four instruments.

The greatest objection to be found with the concerts is the late hour announced for them to begin. Baltimoreans are practical people and the majority of those who attend the concerts take lunch at noon and dinner at 6. The concerts should begin at 3 o'clock instead of 4 P. M., which is an unseemly hour, and as many of the patrons are ladies who come without escorts, they object to remaining out after dark. This defect remedied, the concerts will probably be better attended.

4
Herald 3/29

RAFAEL JOSEFFY

At Music Hall Tonight with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Rafael Joseffy, the piano soloist, will come to Baltimore today with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and will play here for the first time in five years. His part in tonight's concert will be Johannes Brahms's concerto No. 2 for the pianoforte, which he played in Boston Saturday night, his first appearance in that city in the last six years.

Mr. Joseffy was heartily welcomed back to Boston and his playing of the concerto was warmly applauded. In speaking of it the Boston Herald said: "Its performance by Mr. Joseffy was masterly in every sense of the word. His style has gained suprisingly in virility, maturity and dignity, and in all that relates to what is best, most satisfying and most admirable in pianoforte-playing his performance was the most noteworthy that has been heard in Music Hall this season."

Tonight's programme will also include Beethoven's Symphony No. 8, in E flat major, "Eroica," Op. 55; Berlioz's "Minuet of Will o' the Wisps" and the "Waltz of Sylphs," from the "Damnation of Faust," and Beethoven's overture to "Egmont," Op. 84.

Herald 3/29

Boehdeel, cello.

Third Symphony Concert.

Tonight the third concert of the series will be given in the Music Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The programme arranged is no doubt the best given here by the organization this season, and the appearance here once more of Joseffy, the famous pianist, lends additional interest to the event. He is to present the Brahms Concerto No. 2 in B flat major, with which he has been winning new laurels wherever the master work has been played by him. The concert will begin with Beethoven's Heroic Symphony and conclude with the Egmont Overture by the same composer.

A NIGHT OF WAGNER.

Last Concert of the Season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Evokes Enthusiasm in the Music Hall.

Probably at no other time during the season were the patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts so enthusiastic as they appeared last night. The applause that greeted each number was not of the desultory kind, as has been characteristic upon occasions this year, when the programmes were not up to the standard, but the attestations of pleasure came from all parts of the Music Hall, and spontaneously.

It was a Wagner night, and the people were even more familiar with the selections given, because of the recent productions in this city by the Damrosch Opera Company of almost every one of the operas represented upon the programme. There was also given a Wagner novelty in the shape of a Faust overture in D minor, one of the master's earlier works, and intended as the first movement of a Faust symphony. It is a rather broad work, and purely a Faust tone picture in every respect. The orchestration is elaborate, full of the motifs peculiar to Wagner, and worked out in a succession of vivid musically picturesque themes. The overture was enthusiastically received, and will bear frequent repetition in Baltimore.

While Mr. Paur can hardly be termed an ideal conductor of Wagner, lacking both aggressiveness in control of the concerted movemtns, as well as lack of depth in reading the sentiments, he, nevertheless, interpreted the selections with spirit, and was enthusiastically applauded again and again. He was particularly successful in conducting the "Tannhauser" overture, and "Siegfried," termed an idyll, in E major, which proved another novel feature of the programme.

In keeping with the splendid orchestral presentations was the work of Mr. Ben Davies, the soloist of the evening. Much was expected of him, and no one was disappointed. It is rare that we hear a tenor voice so full of pathos, of such a range, and musical in every register. It is a voice of such flexible timber that in high or low tones the vibrations fall pleasantly upon the ear. Mr. Davies has his voice under splendid control, singing with good taste, and plenty of self-assurance. His selections were "Walther's Prize Song," from "Die Meistersinger," and the "Spring Song," from "Die Walkure." The former gave the singer ample opportunity for a display of scholarly vocalization, and he was tendered an ovation.

The concert was the last of a most successful season, and these monthly musical treats will be sadly missed until they begin again next year.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.

Boston Symphony Orchestra's Third Concert—The Program.

The third concert this season of this eminent organization, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the conductorship of Mr. Emil Paur, will take place next Wednesday, January 22, at the Music Hall. A very interesting feature at this concert will be the reappearance of the famous pianist Mr. Rafael Joseffy who for the past five years remained in retirement, and who only at the requests of many influential musicians has decided to appear in a few public concerts again. The program is a very interesting one and is as follows:

Beethoven.....Symphony No. 3, "Eroica."
Brahms.....Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 2.
Berlioz.....a. Minuet of Will-o'-the-Wisp.
b. Waltz of Sylphs.
From "The Damnation of Faust."
Beethoven.....Overture, "Egmont."
Soloist, Mr. Rafael Joseffy.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Rafael Joseffy to Appear As the Piano Soloist.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its third concert of this season at Music Hall next Wednesday evening. Mr. Emil Paur will conduct and Rafael Joseffy will be the soloist. This noted pianist has not been playing in public for a number of years. His reappearance will make the coming symphony concert one of the most notable of the season. The programme will be as follows: Beethoven, Symphony No. 3, "Eroica;" Brahms, Concerto for Pianoforte No. 2; Berlioz, a. Minuet of Will-o'-the-Wisps; b. Waltz of Sylphs, from "The Damnation of Faust;" Beethoven, Overture, "Egmont."

Rafael Joseffy's Reappearance.

The third concert this season, Wednesday evening, January 22, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be the one thousand three hundred and fifty-fourth performance by this now famous organization and its thirty-sixth performance in this city, will be memorable chiefly for the reappearance of the eminent piano virtuoso, Mr. Rafael Joseffy.

Sun 3/26

N, BALTIMORE, THURSI

A WAGNER CONCERT.

End of a Notable Series Given Here This Season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The last concert of the season here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which was given last night at Music Hall, was devoted entirely to Wagner.

During the season nothing by this composer had been played by the orchestra until last night, and the unqualified success of the concert shows in a convincing manner the wisdom of the choice.

The arrangement of a Wagnerian orchestral concert is a matter that calls for judgment of a high order because of the fact that, with two or three exceptions, Wagner never intended that his works should be performed except in connection with his music dramas. The interest in a concert of this sort is, therefore, largely the result of the associations with the operas themselves, which the numbers recall, and such a programme would not be fully appreciated if it were not listened to with the larger works in mind.

The programme given last night was as follows:

Overture to "Tannhauser," preludes to acts one and two of "Lohengrin," "Siegfried Idyll," a Faust overture, the "Waldweben," from "Siegfried," Walther's prize song from "Die Meistersinger," the prelude to "Die Meistersinger," the spring song from "Die Walkuere" and "The Ride of the Valkyries," from "Die Walkuere."

The whole concert went off with spirit and enthusiasm. The Tannhauser and the Meistersinger overtures received a performance such as has probably never been equaled before in this city. The Faust overture seemed at times to drag somewhat, and was the least interesting part of the programme, but this was doubtless due to the fact that it is but a fragment.

The soloist of the evening was Mr. Ben Davies, the Welsh tenor, who has made an enviable reputation in England and more recently in this country. He sang the same numbers as were given by Herr Anton Schott at one of the concerts last year, Walther's prize song and Siegmund's spring song, and created a favorable, although not especially striking impression.

An examination of the programme of the five concerts given here by the orchestra this year shows a remarkable variety as to composers. From the nature of the case it has been necessary to present works differing widely in style and treatment, but this has in many respects been advantageous rather than injurious. Several novelties have been introduced, some successful, others unworthy of a place on the programmes of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In all cases, however, the director has shown a commendable desire to keep abreast of the times. An effort has been made to suit the varied tastes of all lovers of the concerts, by playing, besides the strictly classical selections, a number of lighter pieces, to which the audiences have, as a rule, taken very kindly.

Many would have liked to have heard more of Beethoven, some had hoped to hear something of Schumann, but it is hard to see how it would have been possible to please a larger body of people than has been done this season. The relatively large proportion of vocal soloists has also been much appreciated by the concert-goers.

The work of the orchestra has been, on the whole, considerably in advance of what was done last year—in fact, nothing can be said of the orchestra except that its work has been uniformly admirable and has shown the results of Director Paur's more complete acquaintance with the performers and with their requirements than formerly.

BROOKLYN TIMES

MARCH 28. 1896.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony orchestra closed its eighth season in Brooklyn last night with a concert of a bright and joyous character. Hearing this orchestra immediately following the Chicago (Thomas) orchestra on Thursday night brings one face to face with the natural and inevitable tendency to comparison, but this theme will better serve as a subject for special treatment rather than that there should be any incidental discussion of it here.

Mr. Paur had chosen for an opening number Beethoven's sixth symphony, known as the "Pastoral," always so grateful in its appeal. The reading of Mr. Paur seems to give more emphasis to the sparkling joyousness of the work than to the rural sentiment—the subdued poetic suggestion. The orchestra responded with the superb quality of tone and volume that gives such character and vitality to their efforts. Dvorak's arrangement of Brahm's three Hungarian dances, Nos. 19, 15 and 21 also were finely given and the audience was much taken with them. The concert closed with Weber's "Freischuetz" overture, to the interpretation of which was given rather more than ordinary force and character.

Solo features of the concert were the singing of Ben Davies, the Welsh tenor and the violin playing of Timothee Adamowski, a member of the orchestra. Mr. Davies' selections were Handel's recitative and aria, "Deeper and Deeper," and "Waft Her, Angels," and the prize song from Wagner's "Mastersingers." He made a favorable impression here two years ago in the presentation of the "Stabat Mater" by the Oratorio club, but gave last night a more profound intimation of the high value of his artistic attainments. His voice is full, even and mellow and he has obviously been trained in a school that produces the most desirable results for concert purposes. He was recalled several times after each solo, but politely and firmly declined an encore. Mr. Adamowski's skill as a violinist was made clear to the audience through the medium of the andante and finale from the well-known Mendelssohn concerts. His tone was not very large, but was clear and true, and his playing was marked by a most agreeable display of musical appreciation and refinement.

The concert was very largely attended, and there was a freer show of enthusiasm than has generally been seen at these concerts, Mr. Paur being twice recalled from behind the scenes after the final number. The joint management of these concerts by the Brooklyn institute and the Philharmonic society has proved so satisfactory that arrangements have already been made for a series of five concerts next season under the same auspices.

Following is a list of the orchestral selections performed by the orchestra in Brooklyn this season:

Overture, "Carlo Broschi,".....Auber
Symphony No. 3, in E flat major, "Eroica," opus 55; symphony No. 6, in F major, "Pastoral," opus 68. Beethoven.
(a) "Minuet of Will-o'-the-Wisps;" (b) "Waltz of Sylphs;" from "The Damnation of Faust," opus 24.....Berlioz Symphony No. 4, in E minor, opus 98. Brahms.
"Three Hungarian Dances, Nos. 19, 15, and 21. .....Brahms-Dvorak
Orchestral Suite from "Jocelyn," No. 1. Godard.
(First time.)
Largo .....Handel
"Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 2,".....Liszt
(Scored by Karl Muller-Berghaus.)
"Turkish March,".....Mozart
Preludes to acts I. and II. of "Guntram," opus 25 .....Richard Strauss
(First time.)
Symphony No. 6, in B minor, "Pathetique," opus 74. .....Tschaikowsky
(First time.)
Overture, "1812."".....Tchaikowsky
(First time.)
Overture, "Rienzi;" prelude, "Tannhaeuser," act III; prelude "Lohengrin," act III.....Wagner
Overture, "Freischutz,".....Weber

The Sun.

FRIDAY, MARCH 27, 1896.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

Full almost to the point of surfeit as has been the present musical season in New York, it was yet with feelings of genuine regret that all true lovers of orchestral music last night bade farewell for a season to the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This splendid organization fails to find in our city a support that is in any way commensurate with its manifest and unrivalled merit. Opinions may differ as to the relative merits of Mr. Gericke, Mr. Nikisch, or Mr. Paur, but the Boston orchestra is ever the same, from conductor unto conductor, and under whatever conditions of leadership still remains the standard by which all other like musical bodies must be measured in this country. By years of association these Boston men have attained not only a precision and unanimity of purpose not surpassed in the world perhaps, but there shines through all this work the light of individual enthusiasm and pure devotion to high ideals, so that they compel invariably admiration and respect.

For the last concert of the present season Mr. Paur chose to present a programme consisting entirely of excerpts from the works of Wagner, and that the choice was wise was attested by the size of the audience, which was very large. The opening selection was the overture to "Rienzi," which, heard beside the later works of the composer, seems quite bald in its simplicity. Then followed the preludes to the first and third acts of "Lohengrin," familiar in our ears as household words, and in the former of which to a man closing his eyes the music of the strings seemed to float on air, so delicate the touch of the bows and so free the tone from the faintest suspicion of a scrape. Next the "Siegfried Idyll" took us deep into the forest and in the "Waldweben" we heard the manifold voices of the woods, the birds, the brooks, the rustling leaves, and all the sweet sounds that nature loves and which Wagner has painted in music so true that it seems nature herself who speaks to us. All this beauty was illustrated by the orchestra with marvellous technical skill and poetic feeling. The two Siegfried bits were separated by the "Faust" overture, that vivid piece of dramatic writing, and then came Mr. Ben Davies, the soloist of the evening, who sang Walther's prize song with beautiful sympathetic quality of voice and a fine simplicity of style—after which the "Meistersinger" prelude was rendered in a truly noble manner, with dignity, breadth, and beautiful expression.

Succeeding to this Mr. Davies gave the "Spring Song" from "Die Walküre" even better than he had previously done the Prize Song. His pure tenor voice and sound manly method gave the liveliest pleasure to the audience, who recalled him again and again. So truly admirable a voice and method as Mr. Davies possesses are rarities, and are by the same token so much the more enjoyable.

The concert was brought to a brilliant termination by the "Ride of the Valkyries." In this, as in all that the Boston Orchestra undertakes, its virtues stand out in high relief, overshadowing any minor defects almost to the point of complete obliteration.

THE MAIL AND EXPRESS,
[illegible], New York.

FRIDAY EVENING, MARCH 27, 1896.

IN THE WORLD OF MUSIC.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's Last Concert of the Season.

The final Boston Symphony concert at the Metropolitan Opera House last night was one of the best concerts New Yorkers have had the privilege of hearing this season from any of the four orchestras that have played here. Mr. Paur was on his mettle and, though his movements were far from graceful, the results he obtains are so admirable that one can hardly quarrel with his methods of directing. He led with enthusiasm and energy last night and his men responded with an esprit du corps that could not have been more unanimous.

The programme was drawn entirely from the works of Wagner, and began properly enough with the "Rienzi" overture, which was played with the pomposity that much of it demands. The prelude to "Lohengrin" was performed with an exquisite delicacy and refinement, though with sufficient vigor and force, and the climax was reached after a gradual ascent whose gradient was kept smooth and even. The strings, with their beauty and precision, were thoroughly satisfactory, and the brasses were clear and crisp in tone.

The highest plane of achievement was achieved in the "Siegfried Idyl," in which the musicians fairly outdid themselves. The "Waldweben," from "Siegfried," and the "Ride of the Valkyries" were finely rendered, while the prelude to "Die Meistersinger" was not far behind them in merit of reproduction. The prelude to Act III. of "Lohengrin" was buoyantly and effectively played, and "Eine Faust Ouverture," while less impressive than some of the other numbers, was yet given with marked individuality and character.

The soloist was Mr. Ben Davies, the English tenor, who has just returned here from London, where he sang less than two weeks ago. He sang the Prize Song from "Die Meistersinger" and the Spring Song from "Die Walkure," both in English. The Prize Song was not suited to his voice or style. Mr. Davies sang it in too matter-of-fact and uninspired a manner, as though it might have been a jolly hunting ditty or a declaramtory after-dinner effort. The high notes were not easy to him and the result was not very satisfactory. In the Spring Song Mr. Davies was far better. The prevailing tones are lower and the spirit of the music was more adapted to his temperament.

The accompaniments to the songs were played with proper restraint by the orchestra. In quality of tone, in unanimity and precision, and in delicacy of effect and fineness of shading the Boston Orchestra easily leads here. The contrast was even more forcibly presented last night after the playing of Mr. Thomas's Chicago Orchestra, which, it must be confessed, often seems crude by comparison.

[111]

The New-York Daily Tribune.
FOUNDED BY HORACE GREELEY.
FRIDAY, MARCH 27, 1896.

3.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

For the sake of variety there was an orchestral concert in the Metropolitan Opera House last night—the fifth in six days, including Sunday, when a whole day was vouchsafed concert-goers for rest and refreshment, undisturbed by the scrapers of strings and the blowers of brass. The concert was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Emil Paur, and if anybody were to say that there may have been a special purpose in the obvious efforts made by the conductor to exploit his organization, we would not be so ungracious as to contradict him. It looked very much that way, and also as if our visitors from the East were quite willing to court comparison with out visitors from the West. Fortunately, the conviction that comparisions are odious is so deeply set as to have become a rule of action here, else it might be the duty of The Tribune to say that Mr. Paur and his men routed Mr. Thomas and his men, horse, foot and dragoons, in such short order that there did not even seem to be an engagement. In richness and homogeneity of tone (inthe separate choirs and between them), in vitality, elasticity and variety of utterance, in everything that goes to make up good playing, the Bostonians are so much the superiors of their Western rivals that if we were to indulge in such a reprehensible thing as comparison—which we eschew in obedience to the wise saw already quoted. The temptation is strong, but "this is what we never do," as Nanki-Poo and Yum-Yum remark.

It is pleasanter, and perhaps quite as profitable for instruction, if not reproof, to say that last night's concert was far and away the most brilliant orchestral affair that New-York has enjoyed this season. There were passages in which Mr. Kneisel and his contingent in the band seemed to have been transformed each into a Volker—the famous fiddler of the Nibelungen Lay, the reverse of whose bow was a shining sword. How the phrases did cut and flash through the superb body of sound given out by the other choirs! Small wonder that the audience was kept in a state of gladsome excitement from beginning to end; that there were recalls for Mr. Paur after every number, and half a dozen for Mr. Ben Davies, the Welsh tenor, after he had sung the love song from "Die Walküre." It was a Wagner concert with nine numbers and the enthusiasm broke out with the first number—the "Rienzi" overture—and was continued in each brief intermission, rolling now high, now lower, like the huge waves of the sea. The orchestra played superbly, Mr. Paur conducted finely, and Mr. Davies sang the Prize Song from "Die Meistersinger" even better than the love song.

The New-York Recorder.
BY GEORGE W. TURNER.
FRIDAY, MARCH 27, 1896.

5.

ITS FINALE.

Fifth Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra a Triumph.

The fifth and last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last evening at the Metropolitan Opera House. Perhaps the number of other concerts this week may have acted as a deterrent, but those who missed the one of last night are, indeed, to be pitied.

The programme consisted entirely of selections from Wagner, and included the "Rienzi Overture," the preludes to the first and third acts of "Lohengrin," the "Siegfried Idyll" in E major, the "Faust Overture" in D minor, the "Siegfried Waldweben," the "Meistersinger Overture," and the "Ride of the Valkyries."

The orchestra is still the finest body of its kind on this side of the water, and last evening it fully justified its reputation. Despite a slip in the horn in the "Rienzi Overture" and one of the clarinet in the forest scene of "Siegfried," the various selections were rendered in a manner entirely beyond cavil. Of course, one could not but regret that such a programme given with such an orchestra, could not have been conducted by a Seidl. Still, Mr. Paur's readings, although affording no decided originality of conception, were essentially correct, even if they did not suggest the spirit of the compositions.

The orchestra did its best work in the "Siegfried Idyll," which it played just as Wagner intended it should be interpreted—that is, as a berceuse, having been arranged for his wife's birthday, shortly after the birth of his son. The "Lohengrin" prelude and the "Meistersinger" overtures were also especially well executed.

Ben Davies, the English tenor, was the soloist. It was his first appearance here this season. He contributed the prize song from "Die Meistersinger" and the spring song from "Die Walkure." Mr. Davies is a finished artist, and uses his rather slender voice with discretion and skill. In the first piece he was decidedly overweighted, but his splendid phrasing and the clever use of his organ helped to cover the vocal deficiencies. His rendition was inclined to be robustious rather than poetical. He was heard to better advantage in the second selection, which lay more within the range of his voice. Mr. Davies excels as a ballad singer, and it would be better if he remained in that field. He was repeatedly recalled, but, as is the rule at these concerts, no encores were granted.

The New-York Press.
NEW YORK, FRIDAY, MARCH 27, 1896.

GENIUS OF WAGNER.

Boston Symphony Audience Spellbound by Its Power.

Wagner's genius kept the large audience at the last concert of the Boston Symphony this season in the Metropolitan Opera House spellbound last evening, except when the different pieces came to an end, and then a storm of applause swept over the big auditorium.

The entire programme was devoted to the works of the great master.

It is an indisputable fact that Wagner is almost the only composer who is ever so honored, for there are few makers of music, living or dead, to whom we can listen for a whole evening without becoming weary.

The fine audience last night and its absorbed attention were a splendid tribute to the great genius, who comparatively a few years ago was laughed at, and dubbed in derision the "musician of the future."

Ben Davies, the well-known English tenor, was the soloist, and while he discovered no new effects in the exquisite "Prize Song" from "Die Meistersinger," and in the equally lovely "Spring Song" from "Die Walkure," brought out much of their ravishing beauty, and was applauded with enthusiasm.

Too often it is the case that in a Wagner programme some numbers are given which are not fitted for the concert stage, but Emil Paur, the conductor, made his selections for last night with admirable taste, and the evening was one of pure enjoyment.

The "Rienzi Overture" began the concert. Then came the preludes to the first and second acts of "Lohengrin," the "Siegfried Idyll" in E major, which, while having little connection with that great music-drama, is based largely on motives taken from it; "A Faust Overture" in D minor, which at first was intended by the composer to be the first movement of a "Faust" symphony; the delicious "Waldweben," or "forest sounds," from "Siegfried"; "Walther's Prize Song," the "Spring Song," and last, the thrilling "Ride of the Valkyries," from "Die Walkure."

The band, under Mr. Paur's leadership, seemed to feel that as it would not be heard again here until next winter it was necessary to play with especial care, and fairly outdid itself, which, considering its splendid reputation, is saying a good deal. Mr. Paur is a painstaking and most earnest conductor, but his reading of Wagner we cannot always approve. On the whole, however, the performance was a fit ending to an extremely successful season, and we promise a hearty welcome next fall to this fine band of players and trust that they will fiddle and blow harmoniously for many years to come.

The Press.
DAILY EDITION.
NEW YORK, FRIDAY, MARCH 27, 1896.

GENIUS OF WAGNER.

Boston Symphony Audience Spellbound by Its Power.

Wagner's genius kept the large audience at the last concert of the Boston Symphony this season in the Metropolitan Opera House spellbound last evening, except when the different pieces came to an end, and then a storm of applause swept over the big auditorium.

The entire programme was devoted to the works of the great master.

It is an indisputable fact that Wagner is almost the only composer who is ever so honored, for there are few makers of music, living or dead, to whom we can listen for a whole evening without becoming weary.

The fine audience last night and its absorbed attention were a splendid tribute to the great genius, who comparatively a few years ago was laughed at, and dubbed in derision the "musician of the future."

Ben Davies, the well-known English tenor, was the soloist, and while he discovered no new effects in the exquisite "Prize Song" from "Die Meistersinger," and in the equally lovely "Spring Song" from "Die Walkure," brought out much of their ravishing beauty, and was applauded with enthusiasm.

Too often it is the case that in a Wagner programme some numbers are given which are not fitted for the concert stage, but Emil Paur, the conductor, made his selections for last night with admirable taste, and the evening was one of pure enjoyment.

The "Rienzi Overture" began the concert. Then came the preludes to the first and second acts of "Lohengrin," the "Siegfried Idyll" in E major, which, while having little connection with that great music-drama, is based largely on motives taken from it; "A Faust Overture" in D minor, which at first was intended by the composer to be the first movement of a "Faust" symphony; the delicious "Waldweben," or "forest sounds," from "Siegfried"; "Walther's Prize Song," the "Spring Song," and last, the thrilling "Ride of the Valkyries," from "Die Walkure."

The band, under Mr. Paur's leadership, seemed to feel that as it would not be heard again here until next winter it was necessary to play with especial care, and fairly outdid itself, which, considering its splendid reputation, is saying a good deal. Mr. Paur is a painstaking and most earnest conductor, but his reading of Wagner we cannot always approve. On the whole, however, the performance was a fit ending to an extremely successful season, and we promise a hearty welcome next fall to this fine band of players and trust that they will fiddle and blow harmoniously for many years to come.

New York, Friday, March 27, 1896.

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which was given at the Metropolitan Opera-house last evening, served as an instructive object lesson as to the relative importance of conductor and orchestra. The Boston orchestra is admitted by all experts to be one of the best in the world, and in this country it has no equal in the string department (though the same cannot be said of its wood-wind and brass); yet last evening's concert was one of the least interesting and inspiring entertainments given in New York this winter; and why? Simply because the programme, which was devoted entirely to Wagner, was interpreted by a conductor who lacks inspiration, dramatic sense, and poetic spirit. Mr. Paur is a good, honest, solid German Kapellmeister; he is a schoolmaster who teaches music in the concert-hall as most professors teach Greek and Latin in our colleges—impressing on their victims the letter and grammar, but allowing the spirit to escape. Mechanically he has drilled his players to perfection, but what is mechanism without expression? A body without a soul. The Boston orchestra, with its present conductor, is like a beautiful rose that has no fragrance, like a Japanese melon that has no flavor.

The mechanical precision and mere sensuous beauty of tone of this orchestra have been dwelt on by local writers ad nauseam, and yet the musical public neglects its concerts while it crowds to suffocation those of our Philharmonic Society, which, in respect to the strings at any rate, is somewhat inferior to the Boston orchestra. Why this preference on the part of the most intelligent musical people in the city? Because they know that at the Philharmonic concerts they hear not only a first-class and carefully rehearsed orchestra playing mechanically well, but an orchestra which, thanks to Mr. Seidl, reveals the heart pulse and the very soul of the great classical and romantic composers. Expression is what attracts audiences to music, not machine-like precision. If Paderewski played on a second-rate piano, amateurs would still flock to hear him, knowing that under his fingers a second-rate piano sounds better and more soulful than a first-class instrument under most other fingers. On the other hand, do not second-rate artists often play here on the best instruments, and does not the public neglect them cruelly? Are any more words needed to show that the public cares infinitely more to know that it will have a Paderewski to play, or a Seidl, a Theodore Thomas, or a Nikisch to conduct, than to read critical disquisitions as to whether there is a hornist or a clarinetist who plays 5 per cent. better in one band than in another? Instead of quarrelling and splitting hairs we ought to be glad to see that so many good orchestras come to play to us; but we ought to insist that they should be conducted by men who care at least as much for the spirit of music as for its letter.

A few words in detail about yesterday's programme will enforce the moral of our æsthetic sermon. The "Rienzi" overture was too coarse and noisy; it should be toned down in the concert-hall. The introduction to act i. of "Lohengrin" was played most exquisitely by the violins, which produced a perfect halo of sound. But the climax was unskilfully approached; there was no Spannung, and the soul fled from the piece. The applause consequently was weak. How different from last year's performance of this piece by the Philharmonic Society, when the most refined and sedate musical audience in the city by its frantic enthusiasm simply compelled Mr. Seidl to repeat it! The introduction to act iii. of the same opera, on the other hand, as it calls for no special expression except joyous excitement, was so well done by Mr. Paur that the audience seemed eager for an encore.

Take again the exquisite "Siegfried Idyll." This was played so mechanically, so smoothly and coldly, so rigidly in tempo, that it fell perfectly flat, and there was but little applause. Yet who does not remember what storms of applause Mr. Seidl used to arouse with this piece when he played it at the memorable Lenox Lyceum concerts with an orchestra of only forty? What ravishing tone-colors he revealed, in a bewildering variety which the Boston orchestra did not even suggest! How admirably Mr. Seidl balanced the themes and placed them in proper perspective! How poetically he varied the tempo, the dynamics! How he lingered on that lovely horn solo which last evening passed almost unnoticed! Does any one who has had a chance to compare the Seidl and Paur performances of this piece doubt for a moment that for the enjoyment of Wagner's music it is infinitely more important to have the best Wagner conductor than the best orchestra?

Similar remarks might be made about other pieces on the programme, but enough has been said to establish the point at issue, and it will suffice to add the names of the other selections: "A Faust overture," Waldweben from "Siegfried," Prelude and Prize Song from "Meistersinger," Spring Song and Ride of the Valkyries from "Walküre." The two vocal numbers were excellently sung by Mr. Ben Davies, whose clear and pure tenor tones were as enjoyable as the smoothness and ease of his phrasing, and who was cordially applauded. Encores, luckily, are forbidden at these concerts, which have the further merit of never being too long. Yesterday's audience was the largest of the season.

The New York Recorder.
BY GEORGE W. TURNER.
FRIDAY, MARCH 27, 1896.

ITS FINALE.

Fifth Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra a Triumph.

The fifth and last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last evening at the Metropolitan Opera House. Perhaps the number of other concerts this week may have acted as a deterrent, but those who missed the one of last night are, indeed, to be pitied.

The programme consisted entirely of selections from Wagner, and included the "Rienzi Overture," the preludes to the first and third acts of "Lohengrin," the "Siegfried Idyll" in E major, the "Faust Overture" in D minor, the "Siegfried Waldweben," the "Meistersinger Overture," and the "Ride of the Valkyries."

The orchestra is still the finest body of its kind on this side of the water, and last evening it fully justified its reputation. Despite a slip in the horn in the "Rienzi Overture" and one of the clarinet in the forest scene of "Siegfried," the various selections were rendered in a manner entirely beyond cavil. Of course, one could not but regret that such a programme given with such an orchestra, could not have been conducted by a Seidl. Still, Mr. Paur's readings, although affording no decided originality of conception, were essentially correct, even if they did not suggest the spirit of the compositions.

The orchestra did its best work in the "Siegfried Idyll," which it played just as Wagner intended it should be interpreted—that is, as a berceuse, having been arranged for his wife's birthday, shortly after the birth of his son. The "Lohengrin" prelude and the "Meistersinger" overtures were also especially well executed.

Ben Davies, the English tenor, was the soloist. It was his first appearance here this season. He contributed the prize song from "Die Meistersinger" and the spring song from "Die Walkure." Mr. Davies is a finished artist, and uses his rather slender voice with discretion and skill. In the first piece he was decidedly overweighted, but his splendid phrasing and the clever use of his organ helped to cover the vocal deficiencies. His rendition was inclined to be robustious rather than poetical. He was heard to better advantage in the second selection, which lay more within the range of his voice. Mr. Davies excels as a ballad singer, and it would be better if he remained in that field. He was repeatedly recalled, but, as is the rule at these concerts, no encores were granted.

The New-York Herald.
NEW YORK, FRIDAY, MARCH 27, 1896.

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S LAST CONCERT.

Of the Boston Symphony Society's final concert at the Metropolitan Opera House one can only speak in terms of the very warmest admiration.

The programme consisted exclusively of compositions by Richard Wagner—an experiment that has often been made here before, but never so artistically as last evening. Mr. Emil Paur had for the most chosen only such music as lends itself quite as effectively to the concert room as it does to the operatic stage. The "Rienzi" overture, the preludes to the first and third acts of "Lohengrin," the "Siegfried" Idyll, "Eine Faust Ouverture," the Waldweben from "Siegfried," the prelude to the "Meistersinger" and the prize song from that opera and the Liebeslied from the "Walkuere"—all these are quite as beautiful when listened to as absolute music as they are with stage accessories.

It was simply the perfection of orchestral playing that one heard last evening. Such tonal beauty—"Klangschoenheit," as the Germans have it—has not been listened to in a long while. The strings sounded simply intoxicating, and the brass and wood winds were hardly less fine. This orchestra, thank Heaven, is not given to playing mezzo forte, but knows something of the value of dynamic shading.

Mr. Ben Davies, I regret to say, did not use the original text. For the rest he sang like the great big artist that he is. And Mr. Paur conducted with tremendous fervor.

A bientot, ye Boston Symphonists! You will not be readily forgotten, for last night you played like mastersingers, all of you!

[112]

The New York Times.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Last Concert of Its Season Given at the Metropolitan Opera House.

The final concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's tenth season in New-York took place last night in the Metropolitan Opera House. In ordinary times this city would hardly be able to endure such an outpour of orchestral music as that which has been descending upon it since the Thomas Orchestra arrived a few days ago. But last night the Opera House held a large audience, which was filled with enthusiasm. There is nothing uncommon in these days in a visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, so it must have been the Wagner programme which excited public interest. The once hated composer of diminished sevenths and chromatic chords which refused to resolve in perfect cadences has become "lord of the ascendant." Wagner actually pays, even in the concert room.

We have to thank Mr. Paur for arranging a most delightful programme of Wagnerian works, which fairly bear separation from dramatic surroundings. Two numbers of his list are concert pieces pure and simple, and a third is a display overture, though it belongs to an opera. The list last night consisted of the "Rienzi" overture, the preludes to the first and third acts of "Lohengrin," a "Faust" overture, the "Siegfried Idyll," the "Waldweben," Walter's prize song, and the vorspiel from "Die Meistersinger," Siegmund's love song, and the "Ride of the Valkyries" from "Die Walküre."

The entire performance of the orchestral part of this comprehensive programme was as near perfection as it is reasonable to expect human work to be. It is beyond question that the Boston Orchestra has lost some of that machinelike precision which characterized its playing under the rigorous rule of Wilhelm Gericke. Yet even in precision it is almost beyond criticism. An attentive ear could catch last night a trifling lack of unity in the strings in the "Lohengrin" vorspiel, but that was atoned for by the luscious yet transparent quality of the tone. How those strings soared and floated in those ethereal upper harmonies! What an atmosphere they created! And how triumphant was the brilliancy of their declamatory utterance in the introduction to the third act and in the "Faust" overture!

It would be easy to write many lines about the breadth and solidity of the strings of this orchestra, the mellow, fluent singing of the wood, and the forceful purity of the brass; but it is not necessary to particularize in speaking of an orchestra of virtuosi. What is better to remember is the admirable balance of tone which makes the orchestra so rich in its total quality, and, above that, the splendid fire of its sweeping style, its glorious flexibility, its variety of delicate nuancing, and its admirable suggestion of reserve power. Such a concert as that of last night must give a thrill of genuine enjoyment to the most blasé concert goer, and leave to the commentator nothing but a fruitless search after adjectives that will not sound rhapsodic.

The soloist of the entertainment was Mr. Ben Davies, who sang his two songs in English with a lovely quality of tone and with abundance of enthusiasm. The audience vainly tried to get repetitions of these numbers and of the introduction to the third act of "Lohengrin."

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 1, 1896.

Boston Symphony Concert.

THE fifth and last concert in New York this season of the Boston Symphony Ochestra took place last Thursday evening at the Metropolitan Opera House. It was an exclusively Wagner evening, embracing the principal numbers from the music drama available for the concert platform, and a more enthusiastically received program has not been presented this season.

It included the Rienzi overture and a Faust overture in D minor, the preludes to Acts I. and III. of Lohengrin, the Siegfried Idyll and the Waldweben, the Meistersinger Prelude, and the Ride of the Valkyries for orchestra. Ben Davies sang Walther's prize song and the spring song from the Walküre.

The unsurpassable homogeneity of tone and technical finish of this Boston band have become so common an admission that repetition is monotonous. But on this last occasion there was an obvious comparison incurred by reason of the recent eminent Wagner influx. It did seem, too, that in stepping on the Metropolitan platform the Boston band master and men were strung to a particularly sharp tension. The results were a performance from beginning to end not alone unexcelled but absolutely unapproachable in America to-day for purity, vigor, color and sweep. The orchestra has not given a concert of such unbroken excellence and brilliancy before this season.

The Rienzi overture, in sonority and climax, was a key to the performance. The Siegfried Idyll and Waldweben were most exquisitely and dolicately colored, but the piled up tonal masses in their imposing grandeur and absolute proportion seemed to find the band most proudly at home and dazzled and excited the house to the highest point of enthusiasm. In a word, the Boston Symphony seemed in a mood mostly aggressive, and bombarded the house with such gorgeous tone color and such shivering climaxes that there was no escape from the decision that, after hearing the organization play, other bands sound flat, dull and ill-balanced by comparison.

Mr. Paur's rhythmic effects were capital, and the building of climax was admirable. After the familiar, almost conventionalized Vienna overture and the prelude to Act III. of Lohengrin, handled so as to present novel beauties, the Boston band's work might well prove the despair of other bodies. The beauty of phrase, the glowing variety in the color scheme of the Rienzi overture, the tremendous impact of the tone, with its infallible beauty of quality unrolled a new canvas, and the same may be said of the Lohengrin prelude. The Faust overture was dramatically read. Throughout the entire program the mellowness of both wind choirs was never tarnished for a moment, the 'cellos pealed organwise and the violins sang through the whole with delightful clarity. We have had the Valkyrie Ride more than once of late, but it halted and rode mildly. The Boston performance was superb, a sweep through a storm of overwhelming intensity, a breathless progress which hurried the breath of the audience in sympathetic intensity to match.

Mr. Paur steadily refused encores, but was recalled again and again. He conducted with rare energy and enthusiasm.

A warm reception was accorded Mr. Ben Davies, who sang well, but emphasized more than ever the fact that he is no high C tenor. He reached A with enough effort, but makes up in volume and musical quality what he lacks in range. The audience was large.

PROVIDENCE.

PROVIDENCE, R. I., March 10, 1896.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a rather unsymphonic concert, and, with the exception of Goldmark's cheerful and melodic Rustic Wedding, the orchestral numbers were of but little interest.

SUNDAY, APRIL 5, 1896.

STRUBE'S SYMPHONY

Produced with Success in Music Hall.

The program of the 20th concert given last evening in Music Hall, Emil Paur, conductor, was as follows:

Ouverture-Fantasie, "Romeo and Juliet," Tschaikowsky
Song, with orchestra, "Mignon," .....Liszt
Symphony in C minor, op. 11 (MS.) Gustav Strube
I. Grave e molto moderato—Allegro moderato.
II. Adagio ma non troppo.
III. Scherzo: Allegro. Trio: Un poco piu moderato.
IV. Finale: Allegro vivace. (First time.)
Song, with orchestra, "Spring".....Henschel
Overture to "Genoveva".....Schumann

A sketch of Mr. Strube's career and an account of the circumstances attending the composition of his symphony appeared in the Journal last Sunday. It is not necessary therefore to speak now of the personality of the composer, except to remind the reader that Mr. Strube is 29 years old, and is one of the first violins of the Symphony orchestra.

While it is true that at a first hearing neither all the beauties nor the imperfections of a work are revealed to a hearer, it is also true that a fair idea of the imagination and the technique of the composer follows such a hearing. This idea may be modified slightly after more intimate acquaintance with the music, but the presence or the absence of individuality is felt at once. When it is present you feel it, though you may not like it. If it is absent, there is nothing to be said, except the customary and perfunctory courteous praise for industry and perseverance, which are qualities useful in carpentry, brick-laying, and other trades.

The impressions made by Mr. Strube's symphony are these: He is not an echo; he has a voice of his own. He has musical imagination. He has a well-developed technique in composition. There is the delightful exuberance of youth exulting in creation, and, although this fervor is at times a little boisterous, suggesting high animal spirits, it is, after all, refreshing, and a favorable omen for the future. Perhaps Mr. Strube at times forgets himself, and then talks too loud and too continuously, but he has something to say, and much of it is worth the hearing. At any rate, he does not stammer, he does not repeat solemnly respectable commonplaces. He is not choked by tradition, even though he is in the evening dress of approved symphonic form. He may go so far as to say things that create a flutter, as when eyeglasses are leveled at an audacious young man who contradicts the fogyism of smug authority. But when the evening is over you remember what the young man said.

I do not claim that the movements are of equal worth, or that the composer's flight is equally maintained. Thus the second and the third movements are to me superior to the first and the finale. They show a firmer grasp on superior material. Not that the first movement and the finale are poor in melodic charm or ingenious development; but the Adagio and the Scherzo seem to be more firmly knit; the strokes are more certain, more direct. In the Adagio Mr. Strube does not stop after he has achieved a charming and flowing theme, and then ramble about, watch in hand, until it is the proper time for him to return to his first love; he presents fresh matter, strongly developed; he keeps the interest from flagging; and when he does return to the original subject he is not so enamored with it that he feels obliged to cling to it until the hearer is tired of the iteration and endless modifications. As for the Scherzo, it is sparkling, ingenious, delightfully scored.

The symphony as a whole is distinguished by its melodic freshness, rhythmic variety, thoughtfulness in development and digressions, and courage in the instrumentation. Mr. Strube does not always hit the nail on the head. There are passages which suggest repeated endeavors to gain effects that do not reward fully the labor. There is occasionally too long continued dynamic intensity without contrast. But there is rich, healthy blood in the symphony; there are evidences in plenty of sane imagination; and there is contemplation without the pessimism that enters so freely in these days into the work of young and ambitious composers. No wonder that the audience recognized the present merits and the promise for the future, so that the modest man was obliged several times to bow his thanks from the stage.

* * *

The profoundly dramatic fantasie of Tschaikowsky is no stranger at these concerts, and yet it never seemed so nobly mournful and so grandly sensuous as last night. Under Mr. Nikisch, the effect was great; under Mr. Paur it was overwhelming. The "weird, superearthly" harmonies that follow immediately the opening chant were played marvelously well. And what shall be said of the love-theme that recalls the passion and the pain of all lovers mocked by death,—from the time that the sons of God saw the daughters of men that they were fair.

The "Genoveva" overture, although it was played with fiery understanding, seemed old and tame and dry.

* * *

Mrs. Henschel sang with beauty of tone, ease in technique, and winning personal bearing. "Mignon's Song" is one of the best of Liszt's vocal rhapsodies; nor is Mr. Henchel's "Spring" without musical, as well as ornithological and climatic charm. But the quaint words of Thomas Nash were last night a hollow mockery, although they were warranted by the calendar.

PHILIP HALE.

March 27

The New York Times.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Last Concert of Its Season Given at the Metropolitan Opera House.

The final concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's tenth season in New-York took place last night in the Metropolitan Opera House. In ordinary times this city would hardly be able to endure such an outpour of orchestral music as that which has been descending upon it since the Thomas Orchestra arrived a few days ago. But last night the Opera House held a large audience, which was filled with enthusiasm. There is nothing uncommon in these days in a visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, so it must have been the Wagner programme which excited public interest. The once hated composer of diminished sevenths and chromatic chords which refused to resolve in perfect cadences has become "lord of the ascendant." Wagner actually pays, even in the concert room.

We have to thank Mr. Paur for arranging a most delightful programme of Wagnerian works, which fairly bear separation from dramatic surroundings. Two numbers of his list are concert pieces pure and simple, and a third is a display overture, though it belongs to an opera. The list last night consisted of the "Rienzi" overture, the preludes to the first and third acts of "Lohengrin," a "Faust" overture, the "Siegfried Idyll," the "Waldweben," Walter's prize song, and the vorspiel from "Die Meistersinger," Siegmund's love song, and the "Ride of the Valkyries" from "Die Walküre."

The entire performance of the orchestral part of this comprehensive programme was as near perfection as it is reasonable to expect human work to be. It is beyond question that the Boston Orchestra has lost some of that machinelike precision which characterized its playing under the rigorous rule of Wilhelm Gericke. Yet even in precision it is almost beyond criticism. An attentive ear could catch last night a trifling lack of unity in the strings in the "Lohengrin" vorspiel, but that was atoned for by the luscious yet transparent quality of the tone. How those strings soared and floated in those ethereal upper harmonies! What an atmosphere they created! And how triumphant was the brilliancy of their declamatory utterance in the introduction to the third act and in the "Faust" overture!

It would be easy to write many lines about the breadth and solidity of the strings of this orchestra, the mellow, fluent singing of the wood, and the forceful purity of the brass; but it is not necessary to particularize in speaking of an orchestra of virtuosi. What is better to remember is the admirable balance of tone which makes the orchestra so rich in its total quality, and, above that, the splendid fire of its sweeping style, its glorious flexibility, its variety of delicate nuancing, and its admirable suggestion of reserve power. Such a concert as that of last night must give a thrill of genuine enjoyment to the most blasé concert goer, and leave to the commentator nothing but a fruitless search after adjectives that will not sound rhapsodic.

The soloist of the entertainment was Mr. Ben Davies, who sang his two songs in English with a lovely quality of tone and with abundance of enthusiasm. The audience vainly tried to get repetitions of these numbers and of the introduction to the third act of "Lohengrin."

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 1, 1896.

Boston Symphony Concert.

THE fifth and last concert in New York this season of the Boston Symphony Ochestra took place last Thursday evening at the Metropolitan Opera House. It was an exclusively Wagner evening, embracing the principal numbers from the music drama available for the concert platform, and a more enthusiastically received program has not been presented this season.

It included the Rienzi overture and a Faust overture in D minor, the preludes to Acts I. and III. of Lohengrin, the Siegfried Idyll and the Waldweben, the Meistersinger Prelude, and the Ride of the Valkyries for orchestra. Ben Davies sang Walther's prize song and the spring song from the Walküre.

The unsurpassable homogeneity of tone and technical finish of this Boston band have become so common an admission that repetition is monotonous. But on this last occasion there was an obvious comparison incurred by reason of the recent eminent Wagner influx. It did seem, too, that in stepping on the Metropolitan platform the Boston band master and men were strung to a particularly sharp tension. The results were a performance from beginning to end not alone unexcelled but absolutely unapproachable in America to-day for purity, vigor, color and sweep. The orchestra has not given a concert of such unbroken excellence and brilliancy before this season.

The Rienzi overture, in sonority and climax, was a key to the performance. The Siegfried Idyll and Waldweben were most exquisitely and dolicately colored, but the piled up tonal masses in their imposing grandeur and absolute proportion seemed to find the band most proudly at home and dazzled and excited the house to the highest point of enthusiasm. In a word, the Boston Symphony seemed in a mood mostly aggressive, and bombarded the house with such gorgeous tone color and such shivering climaxes that there was no escape from the decision that, after hearing the organization play, other bands sound flat, dull and ill-balanced by comparison.

Mr. Paur's rhythmic effects were capital, and the building of climax was admirable. After the familiar, almost conventionalized Vienna overture and the prelude to Act III. of Lohengrin, handled so as to present novel beauties, the Boston band's work might well prove the despair of other bodies. The beauty of phrase, the glowing variety in the color scheme of the Rienzi overture, the tremendous impact of the tone, with its infallible beauty of quality unrolled a new canvas, and the same may be said of the Lohengrin prelude. The Faust overture was dramatically read. Throughout the entire program the mellowness of both wind choirs was never tarnished for a moment, the 'cellos pealed organwise and the violins sang through the whole with delightful clarity. We have had the Valkyrie Ride more than once of late, but it halted and rode mildly. The Boston performance was superb, a sweep through a storm of overwhelming intensity, a breathless progress which hurried the breath of the audience in sympathetic intensity to match.

Mr. Paur steadily refused encores, but was recalled again and again. He conducted with rare energy and enthusiasm.

A warm reception was accorded Mr. Ben Davies, who sang well, but emphasized more than ever the fact that he is no high C tenor. He reached A with enough effort, but makes up in volume and musical quality what he lacks in range. The audience was large.

PROVIDENCE.

PROVIDENCE, R. I., March 10, 1896.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a rather unsymphonic concert, and, with the exception of Goldmark's cheerful and melodic Rustic Wedding, the orchestral numbers were of but little interest.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, APRIL 5, 1896.

STRUBE'S SYMPHONY

Produced with Success in Music Hall.

The program of the 20th concert given last evening in Music Hall, Emil Paur, conductor, was as follows:

Ouverture-Fantasie, "Romeo and Juliet," Tschaikowsky

Song, with orchestra, "Mignon,".....Liszt

Symphony in C minor, op. 11 (MS.) Gustav Strube

I. Grave e molto moderato—Allegro moderato.
II. Adagio ma non troppo.
III. Scherzo: Allegro. Trio: Un poco piu moderato.
IV. Finale: Allegro vivace. (First time.)

Song, with orchestra, "Spring".....Henschel

Overture to "Genoveva".....Schumann

A sketch of Mr. Strube's career and an account of the circumstances attending the composition of his symphony appeared in the Journal last Sunday. It is not necessary therefore to speak now of the personality of the composer, except to remind the reader that Mr. Strube is 29 years old, and is one of the first violins of the Symphony orchestra.

While it is true that at a first hearing neither all the beauties nor the imperfections of a work are revealed to a hearer, it is also true that a fair idea of the imagination and the technique of the composer follows such a hearing. This idea may be modified slightly after more intimate acquaintance with the music, but the presence or the absence of individuality is felt at once. When it is present you feel it, though you may not like it. If it is absent, there is nothing to be said, except the customary and perfunctory courteous praise for industry and perseverance, which are qualities useful in carpentry, brick-laying, and other trades.

The impressions made by Mr. Strube's symphony are these: He is not an echo; he has a voice of his own. He has musical imagination. He has a well-developed technique in composition. There is the delightful exuberance of youth exulting in creation, and, although this fervor is at times a little boisterous, suggesting high animal spirits, it is, after all, refreshing, and a favorable omen for the future. Perhaps Mr. Strube at times forgets himself, and then talks too loud and too continuously, but he has something to say, and much of it is worth the hearing. At any rate, he does not stammer, he does not repeat solemnly respectable commonplaces. He is not choked by tradition, even though he is in the evening dress of approved symphonic form. He may go so far as to say things that create a flutter, as when eyeglasses are leveled at an audacious young man who contradicts the fogyism of smug authority. But when the evening is over you remember what the young man said.

I do not claim that the movements are of equal worth, or that the composer's flight is equally maintained. Thus the second and the third movements are to me superior to the first and the finale. They show a firmer grasp on superior material. Not that the first movement and the finale are poor in melodic charm or ingenious development; but the Adagio and the Scherzo seem to be more firmly knit; the strokes are more certain, more direct. In the Adagio Mr. Strube does not stop after he has achieved a charming and flowing theme, and then ramble about, watch in hand, until it is the proper time for him to return to his first love; he presents fresh matter, strongly developed; he keeps the interest from flagging; and when he does return to the original subject he is not so enamored with it that he feels obliged to cling to it until the hearer is tired of the iteration and endless modifications. As for the Scherzo, it is sparkling, ingenious, delightfully scored.

The symphony as a whole is distinguished by its melodic freshness, rhythmic variety, thoughtfulness in development and digressions, and mastery in the instrumentation. Mr. Strube does not always hit the nail on the head. There are passages which suggest repeated endeavors to gain effects that do not reward fully the labor. There is occasionally too long continued dynamic intensity without contrast. But there is rich, healthy blood in the symphony; there are evidences in plenty of sane imagination; and there is contemplation without the pessimism that enters so freely in these days into the work of young and ambitious composers. No wonder that the audience recognized the present merits and the promise for the future, so that the modest man was obliged several times to bow his thanks from the stage.

* * *

The profoundly dramatic fantasie of Tschaikowsky is no stranger at these concerts, and yet it never seemed so nobly mournful and so grandly sensuous as last night. Under Mr. Nikisch, the effect was great; under Mr. Paur it was overwhelming. The "weird, superearthly" harmonies that follow immediately the opening chant were played marvelously well. And what shall be said of the love-theme that recalls the passion and the pain of all lovers mocked by death,—from the time that the sons of God saw the daughters of men that they were fair.

The "Genoveva" overture, although it was played with fiery understanding, seemed old and tame and dry.

* * *

Mrs. Henschel sang with beauty of tone, ease in technique, and winning personal bearing. "Mignon's Song" is one of the best of Liszt's vocal rhapsodies; nor is Mr. Henchel's "Spring" without musical, as well as ornithological and climatic charm. But the quaint words of Thomas Nash were last night a hollow mockery, although they were warranted by the calendar.

PHILIP HALE.

[113]

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 5, 1896.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Tschaikowsky overture-fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet," was the opening number at the twentieth symphony last night. It is a freely written composition of a highly descriptive nature and full of surprises. A pretty love theme runs through the overture, occasionally interrupted by a stormy passage representing the strife between the Capulets and Montagues. Mr. Paur gave a most careful reading and the orchestra a well balanced, even performance.

Mrs. Georg Henschel was the soloist, coming next on the programme, with Liszt's song, "Know'st Thou the Land?" Although Mrs. Henschel has been heard here several times in the past week, it was a positive delight to hear her with such a support as Mr. Paur's band can give. Her rendering of the above song was a charming piece of work, and brought her several recalls and some flowers, but pleasing as was her performance she gave even greater delight later in the evening by her singing of "Spring," by Mr. Henschel.

The song is a little gem in its way. It is simply written and is such a piece as could be given with even more charming effect as a chamber music. It breathes the very atmosphere of the season which it concerns, and the instrumental refrain to the cuckoo's call is a dainty bit of orchestration. The song was received most enthusiastically, Mrs. Henschel being again recalled several times.

The symphony was Gustav Strube's (a member of the orchestra), in C minor, and was played from manuscript. The symphony is in four movements, and introduces the usual instruments, although there is a too frequent use of the kettle-drums throughout every movement. Considered in its entire, the composition is one of much character and solidity, and there are many places in which much originality is shown. Portions of it are of massive construction, and very elaborate, and there are but few places where definiteness of purpose is lost sight of.

The first movement is perhaps the least interesting; but the audience showed its appreciation of the second and following movements in no uncertain manner. The third movement, scherzo, is especially pleasing. Written freely and simply, it is by no means frivolous, and there is marked continuity of theme throughout. The fourth movement is a little reminiscent, but for the happy results attained this can be excused. In the working out, several quaint themes are introduced, which greatly heightens the general effect.

Mr. Strube was obliged to acknowledge the applause after the second and third movements, and at the conclusion Mr. Paur generously insisted on his coming forward three times and receiving by himself the ovation.

The concert concluded with Schumann's overture to "Genoveva," a rather dry and uninteresting number.

At the next concert the quartet in C sharp by Beethoven will be played for the first time and Ben Davies will sing.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 5.

The Symphony Concert.

Last night, the twentieth concert of the Symphony Orchestra was given in Music Hall. The programme was:

Overture, fantaisie, "Romeo and Juliet," Tschaikowsky
Song, "Kennst der das Land;".....Liszt
Symphony, C minor, op 11.....Gustav Strube
Song, "Spring,".....Henschel
Overture to "Genovera,".....Schumann
Soloist, Mrs. Georg Henschel.

Of the Tschaikowsky orchestra there is little to be said at this day; time robs it of none of its brilliancy and beauty, both of which were strikingly apparent in the masterly interpretation it received. Of Mrs. Henschel little can be added to what has been written under another heading in this column. The Liszt song is not attractive, but it was sung with the high, artistic taste, and fine intelligence and feeling that are characteristic of Mrs. Henschel. It is always a rare pleasure to hear this artist, who was most heartily welcomed by a large audience.

The symphony is an almost needless proof that Mr. Mr. Strube is a man of talent; a thinker who dares be original, without rushing into the wild eccentricities that often supply the place of the original. The work is solid, filled with ideas that can be followed with pleasure in their development; the subjects are always treated symphonically, and there is no lack of fluent melody. It deserves to be mentioned that the symphony is an organic whole, and not a patchwork of disconnected ideas. The scoring is most effective; it is the work of a thinker, as well as that of a patient student, and what is lacking in closeness and fineness, time will supply. The style is free, large and dignified, even if it is not always sustained at one high level; there is a most praiseworthy absence of over-elaboration and of exuberance, and taken altogether, this symphony is the strongest and most original work produced by the younger order of our musicians. It is honest, earnest work, and not an ostentatious display of empty learning. The first movement is strong and brilliant. The theme is most attractive and it is developed with unlabored ease and effectiveness. The second movement—the adagio—is dignified in subject, and its development shows learning, fine taste, and the true artistic feeling for unexaggerated effect. The scherzo is dainty and brilliant, while the finale is the least original and effective movement in the symphony. High praise is due to the symphony itself, and still higher praise is forthcoming in that the work was composed by a modest young man, labored at and finished without any of the preliminary cackling with which our art bantams usually announce the progress of their labors to an astonished world. Mr. Strube is to be heartily congratulated for his opus eleven, and it is to be hoped that the tide of success may not sweep him over to the sterile fog-land, in which bantams congregate and delight to crow.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCIX., NO. 68.

SUNDAY, APRIL 5, 1896.

NEW SYMPHONY BY STRUBE.

Played for the First Time at Last Night's Concert.

Work of Remarkable Power Finely Read by Mr. Paur and Brilliantly Played by the Orchestra—Composer Given an Ovation—Mrs. Henschel Sings with Her Usual Charm.

The 20th of this season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra was given in Music Hall last night, Mrs. Georg Henschel assisting. The selections were:

Overture, fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet"....Tschaikowsky
"Kennet du das Land?".....Liszt
Symphony, C minor, op. 11 (MS. first time) Gustav Strube
"Spring".....Georg Henschel
Overture, "Genoveva".....Schumann

The symphony was the chief point of interest in the programme, the composer being a member—one of the first violins—of the orchestra. The work is one of remarkable power. It is modern in character, but it avoids the vagueness of the extreme contemporary school, is strict in form, wholly clear on a first hearing, and its themes are gracefully melodious. Mr. Strube shows a complete mastery of orchestral resources, and his score is admirably made from beginning to end. Occasionally it is somewhat over full, but even in its most exuberant instrumentation it is never thick or cloudy, and the effects are always thoughtfully considered and skilfully contrasted. The music flows freely and smoothly, and is affluent in ideas.

The opening movement is characterized by a fine dignity, and in its more impassioned moments moves with an imposing sweep and a splendid vigor. The slow movement is of rare beauty in its themes and their treatment, and the orchestration is delightful in the variety and refinement of its tone color, especially in the use of the wood wind. The scherzo is strikingly original and piquant, and here again the scoring is charming. The finale, that stumbling block to young composers, who generally exhaust themselves by the time they reach that point, shows no falling off, and is stirring in its brilliancy and the fire with which it is worked up to its climax. Toward the close there is a crescendo culminating in a tremendously massive outburst, which is sustained with masterly skill and power to the close of the work.

The second and third movements point most clearly, perhaps, to a strongly marked and characteristic individuality in the composer, and stamp him as a man of original ideas with the instinct to develop them in a true artistic direction. They are also convincing of Mr. Strube's right to the hearing that was accorded his work, which has fairly established for him a claim to frank and earnest consideration as a musician of innate and high gifts, and of great promise. The symphony, which was evidently read by Mr. Paur, and played by the orchestra, con amore, was listened to attentively, and at the close of the second movement the applause was so enthusiastic that the composer was obliged to rise from his place in the orchestra to bow his acknowledgement, and when the last movement was over he was furiously recalled to the front several times. His success was both complete and merited.

The grand Tschaikowsky overture was nobly interpreted by Mr. Paur. It is worthy the composer of the "Pathetic" symphony in its dignity of sentiment, its dramatic intensity of sentiment and its splendor of tone color. A brilliant and effective performance of the Schumann overture brought to a close a concert in which conductor and orchestra were at their best throughout.

Mrs. Henschel sang the Liszt air with all of the charm, exquisite finish and purity of style that have been so delightfully prominent in her every effort since her return hither. Nothing could have been more artistic than her shading of the air nor than the grace and warmth of the feeling she imparted to it. Three recalls and a handsome gift of flowers rewarded her performance. The sympathetic and perfect accompaniment Mr. Paur obtained from the orchestra must not be passed without a word of cordial praise. Mr. Henschel's dainty song, "Spring" gains greatly by the pretty and delicate instrumentation with which it was heard on this occasion. Mrs. Henschel sang it with captivating vivacity and daintiness, and again received three recalls.

The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Jessonda," Spohr; recitative and air from "Jephthah," Handel; quartet in C-sharp minor, by Beethoven, scored for orchestra by Muller-Berghaus; prize song from "Die Meistersinger," Wagner; academic overture, Brahms. The soloist is to be Mr. Ben Davies.

SUNDAY, APRIL 5, 1896.

The Symphony Concert.

A very interesting program was provided by conductor Paur for last evening's Symphony concert, the 20th of the year and the 743d performance by the orchestra in Boston. The selections were:

Overture, fantasie, "Romeo und Julie," Tschaikowsky.
Song, with orchestra, "Kennst du das Land?" Liszt.
Symphony, in C minor, op 11 (MS), Gustav Strube. (First time.)
Song, with orchestra, "Spring," Henschel.
Overture, to "Genoveva," in C minor, op 81, Schumann.
Soloist, Mrs Georg Henschel.

As is customary at Easter time, the rehearsal was given Thursday instead of Friday afternoon.

The chief feature of the concert was, of course, the performance of Mr Straube's symphony. It is to be said at once, and most emphatically, that the symphony is a work of great merit. Bostonians may justly be proud of the fact that it is the product of a resident musician.

Mr Straube has for a number of years been a member of the Symphony orchestra, playing one of the first violins.

He was born in Ballenstadt, a small town in Germany, and received his early musical education from his father. At the age of 16 he entered the Leipsic conservatory, studying the violin under Adolf Brodsky and Frederick Hermann, and composition under Solomon Yadassohn and Karl Reinecke. An accident to his hand interfered for several years with his violin playing, and during this time he devoted his efforts to conducting. When his hand regained its cunning he again took up the violin, and six years ago came to America under engagement to Mr Nikisch.

Mr Straube has written several compositions. The most pretentious, previous to his symphony, was an overture, which was played at the symphonw concerts last year, being received with much favor. In Straube is one of the very few members of the symphony orchestra who have enjoyed the honor of having a composition played by this organization.

The symphony is in four movements, and while all are written in the old sonata form, the treatment is thoroughly modern. It is a substantial and scholarly work, not possessed of an abundance of melody, but rich in impressive harmonies and brilliant effects. In certain passages the instrumentation seems rather too elaborate and so persistently sonorous as to at times become almost monotonous. But it never does actually reach that point.

The whole work is interesting, but perhaps the most pleasing movement is the adagio. This is notable for the graceful treatment of several delightfully melodious themes.

The scherzo is forceful and brilliant and, as played by the orchestra, moved the audience to enthusiastic applause. The final movement, allegro vivace, is full of variety, and from a strictly artistic point of view, probably the best feature of the composition. There are several delicious passages for the wood wind, with unique accompaniment by the strings, and the movement in its entirety is heartily enjoyable.

The audience rewarded the performance with demonstrative applause, and the composer was made to leave his seat and bow his acknowledgments a dozen times or more.

The other orchestral numbers, Tschaikowsky's overture, "Romeo and Juliet," and Schumann's overture, "Genoveva," were superbly played by the orchestra under Mr Paur's direction, and both were heartily enjoyed.

Mrs Georg Henschel was the soloist and, as is almost needless to state, was received with great cordiality by the audience. She sang Liszt's "Kennst du das Land," and her husband's settting to Nash's delightful old poem "Spring, Sweet Spring." Both were interpreted with exquisite expression and dainty refinement. It has been very gratifying to Bostonians to have been afforded so many opportunities during the last week of hearing this charming singer.

Mr Ben Davies, tenor, will be the soloist at this week's symphony concert, and the program will be:

Overture, "Jessonda," Spohr.
Recitative and aria, "Deeper and Deeper Still" and "Waft Her, Angels," from "Jephthah," Handel.
Quartet in C sharp minor, Beethoven.
"Walther's Preislied." from "Die Meistersinger," Wagner.
Academic overture, Brahms.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 5, 1896.

Mr. Paur's twentieth Symphony programme presented as its central number a manuscript symphony composed by Mr. Gustav Strube, a grave, modest, spectacled, blond gentleman who sits in one of the rows of fours among the first violins. He had already been known as the author of some good things of minor importance, but nothing of such consequence had been expected from his pen as this. It bears the opus number eleven, but it indicates a greater grasp of means, a wider range of thought and a maturer feeling than that would naturally indicate. For after a single hearing the impression left is that of reflection, temperance, honesty, sympathy and self-command. In the sense that it does not startle, thrill or sway as does even an early work of what folk are wont to call genius, it might be called by contrast kapellmeister or academic composition. Yet it would be unjust to speak of it so, because it has qualities better than the best formalism—elastic spirit, enthusiasm, insistence, warmth and light play of fancy. It is unquestionably modern music in its gathering together of forces for a climax; its unexpected bursts of emphasis, ending as it were with an exclamation point, and followed by something of so thoroughly different a nature that one does not easily perceive the relevance of it; in its confident departures from the strict ruies of development and its disposition to let feeling occasionally overrule intellect.

The first bars command attention, for they are strong, solid and grave, and their short, firm melody rests upon a basis of broad, deep chords. The allegro then opens with a pleasant melody which has an appealing droop at its close, and thence the movement develops freely and generously in device and enthusiasm. The adagio derives from a sweet but not mawkish melody, and the secondary figures well enhance the value of the beginning, adding strength as well as beauty to the movement. The scherzo is rather romantic than gay, its principal themes having a swaying pulse to them and a fancifulness of phrase which can hardly be called less than dainty. The final allegro, while no less melodious and agreeable than the other movements, shows a stronger will and a stronger hand. It rises almost to imperiousness of manner at times and it is bold with some fierce, clangorous discords. Yet it has its gentler moments also, and its second phase is bright, buoyant and song-like, making however no forced contrast with the main character of the movement. The conclusion is drawn from the antithesis of these ideas, each in turn claiming the mastery until, after a softened episode, the end comes in a few emphatic and incisive chords.

Mr. Strube holds the orchestra well together in his score, showing perhaps some predilection for the middle strings and the clarinet, but doing injustice to no element and permitting no instrumental extravagance or eccentricity. Indeed, among the characteristics which struck us most were the apparent ease wherewith the orchestra is used, the melodic fulness, the enthusiasm and the sureness of the writing and the interest generally aroused and maintained in the hearer. For there was much ready applause during the performance, and the author had to rise or come forward several times in answer. It should be said, too, that Mr. Paur and the orchestra could not have bestowed more care upon the playing of the work of any man, though he were most famous.

Mrs. Henschel sang in her most delightful and artistic way Liszt's "Kennst du das Land" and a pretty and piquant "Spring" by Mr. Henschel, each having the accompaniment of an orchestra slightly diminished in its heavier voicings.

Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" fantasy began the concert with its varying moods of turbulence, contention, romance, gentleness and grief, and Schumann's familiar "Genoveva" overture ended it. The orchestra always played as if mindful of the high encomiums they have just compelled from New York for their superiority at all points to the Theodore Thomas organization.

For the next concert are announced these things: Spohr, Overture, "Jessonda"; Haendel, Recitative and Aria, "Deeper and Deeper Still" and "Waft her, Angels," from "Jephthah"; Beethoven, Quartet in C-sharp minor, orchestrated by Muller-Berghaus, first time; Wagner, "Walther's Preislied," from "Die Meistersinger"; Brahms, Academic Overture. Soloist, Mr. Ben Davies.

[114]

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.
SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 5, 1896.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Tschaikowsky overture-fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet," was the opening number at the twentieth symphony last night. It is a freely written composition of a highly descriptive nature and full of surprises. A pretty love theme runs through the overture, occasionally interrupted by a stormy passage representing the strife between the Capulets and Montagues. Mr. Paur gave a most careful reading and the orchestra a well balanced, even performance.

Mrs. Georg Henschel was the soloist, coming next on the programme, with Liszt's song, "Know'st Thou the Land?" Although Mrs. Henschel has been heard here several times in the past week, it was a positive delight to hear her with such a support as Mr. Paur's band can give. Her rendering of the above song was a charming piece of work, and brought her several recalls and some flowers, but pleasing as was her performance she gave even greater delight later in the evening by her singing of "Spring," by Mr. Henschel.

The song is a little gem in its way. It is simply written and is such a piece as could be given with even more charming effect as a chamber music. It breathes the very atmosphere of the season which it concerns, and the instrumental refrain to the cuckoo's call is a dainty bit of orchestration. The song was received most enthusiastically, Mrs. Henschel being again recalled several times.

The symphony was Gustav Strube's (a member of the orchestra), in C minor, and was played from manuscript. The symphony is in four movements, and introduces the usual instruments, although there is a too frequent use of the kettle-drums throughout every movement. Considered in its entire, the composition is one of much character and solidity, and there are many places in which much originality is shown. Portions of it are of massive construction, and very elaborate, and there are but few places where definiteness of purpose is lost sight of.

The first movement is perhaps the least interesting; but the audience showed its appreciation of the second and following movements in no uncertain manner. The third movement, scherzo, is especially pleasing. Written freely and simply, it is by no means frivolous, and there is marked continuity of theme throughout. The fourth movement is a little reminiscent, but for the happy results attained this can be excused. In the working out, several quaint themes are introduced, which greatly heightens the general effect.

Mr. Strube was obliged to acknowledge the applause after the second and third movements, and at the conclusion Mr. Paur generously insisted on his coming forward three times and receiving by himself the ovation.

The concert concluded with Schumann's overture to "Genoveva," a rather dry and uninteresting number.

At the next concert the quartet in C sharp by Beethoven will be played for the first time and Ben Davies will sing.

Gazette
BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 5.

The Symphony Concert.

Last night, the twentieth concert of the Symphony Orchestra was given in Music Hall. The programme was:

Overture, fantaisie, "Romeo and Juliet," Tschaikowsky
Song, "Kennst der das Land,".....Liszt
Symphony, C minor, op 11.....Gustav Strube
Song, "Spring,".....Henschel
Overture to "Genovera,".....Schumann
Soloist, Mrs. Georg Henschel.

Of the Tschaikowsky orchestra there is little to be said at this day; time robs it of none of its brilliancy and beauty, both of which were strikingly apparent in the masterly interpretation it received. Of Mrs. Henschel little can be added to what has been written under another heading in this column. The Liszt song is not attractive, but it was sung with the high, artistic taste, and fine intelligence and feeling that are characteristic of Mrs. Henschel. It is always a rare pleasure to hear this artist, who was most heartily welcomed by a large audience.

The symphony is an almost needless proof that Mr. Mr. Strube is a man of talent; a thinker who dares be original, without rushing into the wild eccentricities that often supply the place of the original. The work is solid, filled with ideas that can be followed with pleasure in their development; the subjects are always treated symphonically, and there is no lack of fluent melody. It deserves to be mentioned that the symphony is an organic whole, and not a patchwork of disconnected ideas. The scoring is most effective; it is the work of a thinker, as well as that of a patient student, and what is lacking in closeness and fineness, time will supply. The style is free, large and dignified, even if it is not always sustained at one high level; there is a most praiseworthy absence of over-elaboration and of exuberance, and taken altogether, this symphony is the strongest and most original work produced by the younger order of our musicians. It is honest, earnest work, and not an ostentatious display of empty learning. The first movement is strong and brilliant. The theme is most attractive and it is developed with unlabored ease and effectiveness. The second movement—the adagio—is dignified in subject, and its development shows learning, fine taste, and the true artistic feeling for unexaggerated effect. The scherzo is dainty and brilliant, while the finale is the least original and effective movement in the symphony. High praise is due to the symphony itself, and still higher praise is forthcoming in that the work was composed by a modest young man, labored at and finished without any of the preliminary cackling with which our art bantams usually announce the progress of their labors to an astonished world. Mr. Strube is to be heartily congratulated for his opus eleven, and it is to be hoped that the tide of success may not sweep him over to the sterile fog-land, in which bantams congregate and delight to crow.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XOIX., NO. 96.
SUNDAY, ARPIL 5, 1896.

NEW SYMPHONY BY STRUBE.

Played for the First Time at Last Night's Concert.

Work of Remarkable Power Finely Read by Mr. Paur and Brilliantly Played by the Orchestra—Composer Given an Ovation—Mrs. Henschel Sings with Her Usual Charm.

The 20th of this season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra was given in Music Hall last night, Mrs. Georg Henschel assisting. The selections were:

Overture, fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet"....
Tschaikowsky
"Kennet du das Land?".....Liszt
Symphony, C minor, op. 11 (MS. first time)
Gustav Strube
"Spring".....Georg Henschel
Overture, "Genovera".....Schumann

The symphony was the chief point of interest in the programme, the composer being a member—one of the first violins—of the orchestra. The work is one of remarkable power. It is modern in character, but it avoids the vagueness of the extreme contemporary school, is strict in form, wholly clear on a first hearing, and its themes are gracefully melodious. Mr. Strube shows a complete mastery of orchestral resources, and his score is admirably made from beginning to end. Occasionally it is somewhat over full, but even in its most exuberant instrumentation it is never thick or cloudy, and the effects are always thoughtfully considered and skilfully contrasted. The music flows freely and smoothly, and is affluent in ideas.

The opening movement is characterized by a fine dignity, and in its more impassioned moments moves with an imposing sweep and a splendid vigor. The slow movement is of rare beauty in its themes and their treatment, and the orchestration is delightful in the variety and refinement of its tone color, especially in the use of the wood wind. The scherzo is strikingly original and piquant, and here again the scoring is charming. The finale, that stumbling block to young composers, who generally exhaust themselves by the time they reach that point, shows no falling off, and is stirring in its brilliancy and the fire with which it is worked up to its climax. Toward the close there is a crescendo culminating in a tremendously massive outburst, which is sustained with masterly skill and power to the close of the work.

The second and third movements point most clearly, perhaps, to a strongly marked and characteristic individuality in the composer, and stamp him as a man of original ideas with the instinct to develop them in a true artistic direction. They are also convincing of Mr. Strube's right to the hearing that was accorded his work, which has fairly established for him a claim to frank and earnest consideration as a musician of innate and high gifts, and of great promise. The symphony, which was evidently read by Mr. Paur, and played by the orchestra, con amore, was listened to attentively, and at the close of the second movement the applause was so enthusiastic that the composer was obliged to rise from his place in the orchestra to bow his acknowledgement, and when the last movement was over he was furiously recalled to the front several times. His success was both complete and merited.

The grand Tschaikowsky overture was nobly interpreted by Mr. Paur. It is worthy the composer of the "Pathetic" symphony in its dignity of sentiment, its dramatic intensity of sentiment and its splendor of tone color. A brilliant and effective performance of the Schumann overture brought to a close a concert in which conductor and orchestra were at their best throughout.

Mrs. Henschel sang the Liszt air with all of the charm, exquisite finish and purity of style that have been so delightfully prominent in her every effort since her return hither. Nothing could have been more artistic than her shading of the air nor than the grace and warmth of the feeling she imparted to it. Three recalls and a handsome gift of flowers rewarded her performance. The sympathetic and perfect accompaniment Mr. Paur obtained from the orchestra must not be passed without a word of cordial praise. Mr. Henschel's dainty song, "Spring" gains greatly by the pretty and delicate instrumentation with which it was heard on this occasion. Mrs. Henschel sang it with captivating vivacity and daintiness, and again received three recalls.

The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Jessonda," Spohr; recitative and air from "Jephthah," Handel; quartet in C-sharp minor, by Beethoven, scored for orchestra by Muller-Berghaus; prize song from "Die Meistersinger," Wagner; academic overture, Brahms. The soloist is to be Mr. Ben Davies.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, APRIL 5, 1896.

The Symphony Concert.

A very interesting program was provided by conductor Paur for last evening's Symphony concert, the 20th of the year and the 743d performance by the orchestra in Boston. The selections were:

Overture, fantasie, "Romeo und Julie," Tschaikowsky.
Song, with orchestra, "Kennst du das Land?" Liszt.
Symphony, in C minor, op 11 (MS), Gustav Strube. (First time.)
Song, with orchestra, "Spring," Henschel.
Overture, to "Genoveva," in C minor, op 81, Schumann.
Soloist, Mrs Georg Henschel.

As is customary at Easter time, the rehearsal was given Thursday instead of Friday afternoon.

The chief feature of the concert was, of course, the performance of Mr Straube's symphony. It is to be said at once, and most emphatically, that the symphony is a work of great merit. Bostonians may justly be proud of the fact that it is the product of a resident musician.

Mr Straube has for a number of years been a member of the Symphony orchestra, playing one of the first violins.

He was born in Ballenstadt, a small town in Germany, and received his early musical education from his father. At the age of 16 he entered the Leipsic conservatory, studying the violin under Adolf Brodsky and Frederick Hermann, and composition under Solomon Yadassohn and Karl Reinecke. An accident to his hand interfered for several years with his violin playing, and during this time he devoted his efforts to conducting. When his hand regained its cunning he again took up the violin, and six years ago came to America under engagement to Mr Nikisch.

Mr Straube has written several compositions. The most pretentious, previous to his symphony, was an overture, which was played at the symphonw concerts last year, being received with much favor. In Straube is one of the very few members of the symphony orchestra who have enjoyed the honor of having a composition played by this organization.

The symphony is in four movements, and while all are written in the old sonata form, the treatment is thoroughly modern. It is a substantial and scholarly work, not possessed of an abundance of melody, but rich in impressive harmonies and brilliant effects. In certain passages the instrumentation seems rather too elaborate and so persistently sonorous as to at times become almost monotonous. But it never does actually reach that point.

The whole work is interesting, but perhaps the most pleasing movement is the adagio. This is notable for the graceful treatment of several delightfully melodious themes.

The scherzo is forceful and brilliant and, as played by the orchestra, moved the audience to enthusiastic applause. The final movement, allegro vivace, is full of variety, and from a strictly artistic point of view, probably the best feature of the composition. There are several delicious passages for the wood wind, with unique accompaniment by the strings, and the movement in its entirety is heartily enjoyable.

The audience rewarded the performance with demonstrative applause, and the composer was made to leave his seat and bow his acknowledgments a dozen times or more.

The other orchestral numbers, Tschaikowsky's overture, "Romeo and Juliet," and Schumann's overture, "Genoveva," were superbly played by the orchestra under Mr Paur's direction, and both were heartily enjoyed.

Mrs Georg Henschel was the soloist and, as is almost needless to state, was received with great cordiality by the audience. She sang Liszt's "Kennst du das Land," and her husband's settting to Nash's delightful old poem "Spring, Sweet Spring." Both were interpreted with exquisite expression and dainty refinement. It has been very gratifying to Bostonians to have been afforded so many opportunities during the last week of hearing this charming singer.

Mr Ben Davies, tenor, will be the soloist at this week's symphony concert, and the program will be:

Overture, "Jessonda," Spohr.
Recitative and aria, "Deeper and Deeper Still" and "Waft Her, Angels," from "Jephthah," Handel.
Quartet in C sharp minor, Beethoven.
"Walther's Preislied," from "Die Meistersinger," Wagner.
Academic overture, Brahms.

Boston Courier.
SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 5, 1896.

Mr. Paur's twentieth Symphony programme presented as its central number a manuscript symphony composed by Mr. Gustav Strube, a grave, modest, spectacled, blond gentleman who sits in one of the rows of fours among the first violins. He had already been known as the author of some good things of minor importance, but nothing of such consequence had been expected from his pen as this. It bears the opus number eleven, but it indicates a greater grasp of means, a wider range of thought and a maturer feeling than that would naturally indicate. For after a single hearing the impression left is that of reflection, temperance, honesty, sympathy and self-command. In the sense that it does not startle, thrill or sway as does even an early work of what folk are wont to call genius, it might be called by contrast kapellmeister or academic composition. Yet it would be unjust to speak of it so, because it has qualities better than the best formalism—elastic spirit, enthusiasm, insistence, warmth and light play of fancy. It is unquestionably modern music in its gathering together of forces for a climax; its unexpected bursts of emphasis, ending as it were with an exclamation point, and followed by something of so thoroughly different a nature that one does not easily perceive the relevance of it; in its confident departures from the strict ruies of development and its disposition to let feeling occasionally overrule intellect.

The first bars command attention, for they are strong, solid and grave, and their short, firm melody rests upon a basis of broad, deep chords. The allegro then opens with a pleasant melody which has an appealing droop at its close, and thence the movement develops freely and generously in device and enthusiasm. The adagio derives from a sweet but not mawkish melody, and the secondary figures well enhance the value of the beginning, adding strength as well as beauty to the movement. The scherzo is rather romantic than gay, its principal themes having a swaying pulse to them and a fancifulness of phrase which can hardly be called less than dainty. The final allegro, while no less melodious and agreeable than the other movements, shows a stronger will and a stronger hand. It rises almost to imperiousness of manner at times and it is bold with some fierce, clangorous discords. Yet it has its gentler moments also, and its second phase is bright, buoyant and song-like, making however no forced contrast with the main character of the movement. The conclusion is drawn from the antithesis of these ideas, each in turn claiming the mastery until, after a softened episode, the end comes in a few emphatic and incisive chords.

Mr. Strube holds the orchestra well together in his score, showing perhaps some predilection for the middle strings and the clarinet, but doing injustice to no element and permitting no instrumental extravagance or eccentricity. Indeed, among the characteristics which struck us most were the apparent ease wherewith the orchestra is used, the melodic fulness, the enthusiasm and the sureness of the writing and the interest generally aroused and maintained in the hearer. For there was much ready applause during the performance, and the author had to rise or come forward several times in answer. It should be said, too, that Mr. Paur and the orchestra could not have bestowed more care upon the playing of the work of any man, though he were most famous.

Mrs. Henschel sang in her most delightful and artistic way Liszt's "Kennst du das Land" and a pretty and piquant "Spring" by Mr. Henschel, each having the accompaniment of an orchestra slightly diminished in its heavier voicings.

Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" fantasy began the concert with its varying moods of turbulence, contention, romance, gentleness and grief, and Schumann's familiar "Genoveva" overture ended it. The orchestra always played as if mindful of the high encomiums they have just compelled from New York for their superiority at all points to the Theodore Thomas organization.

For the next concert are announced these things: Spohr, Overture, "Jessonda"; Haendel, Recitative and Aria, "Deeper and Deeper Still" and "Waft her, Angels," frem "Jephthah"; Beethoven, Quartet in C-sharp minor, orchestrated by Muller-Berghaus, first time; Wagner, "Walther's Preislied," from "Die Meistersinger"; Brahms, Academic Overture. Soloist, Mr. Ben Davies.

[114]

Boston Daily Advertiser.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 6, 1896.

The Symphony Concert—Strube's New Symphony.

Handel and Haydn Concert, "The Creation"—Paderewski's Last.

Our musical wanderers have returned crowned with laurels. The reviews of the concerts given on this tour have been so delightfully enthusiastic that the Boston reviewer may be pardoned if he indulges in a little glow of pride on this account. Never before have the orchestra received such encomiums in New York, and it is just possible that it is because never before have they been in such perfect discipline, never before have they played quite as well, and while constantly remembering that Mr. Gericke was the real founder of the musical excellence that now obtains, one must give cordial gratitude to Mr. Paur for tightening lines that had become relaxed, for turning retrogression into a renewed advance. One might as well praise the piano at a Paderewski recital without awarding praise to the pianist as speak of the splendid technique of our orchestra without giving the credit of the performance to the man who directs it.

The concert of Saturday began with that passionate Fantasie-Overture to "Romeo and Juliet" which presents Tschaikowsky in one of his noblest moods. It is a bit singular that the best musical inspirations which have arisen from the great tragedy should be instrumental rather than vocal works; the ideal opera upon the subject yet remains to be written, while Berlioz's balcony-scene between two instruments, and this overture of Tschaikowsky with an English horn Romeo, outweigh in intrinsic merit the warblings of a Melba and a De Reszke in the same subject. There is considerable majesty in this work and considerable of fighting, too. The reviewer liked Mr. Paur's reading better in the "alarums, excursions" side of the topic than in the sad plaints of the two unfortunates. Tschaikowsky seemed to revel in the contentions of the Montagues and Capulets, and the riots were almost continuous. A belligerent bassoon would inquire, "Do you bite your thumb at us, sir," and the clarinette would shriek back "I do bite my thumb, sir," and instantly the kettle-drums and cymbals would break loose and there would ensue dissonance and trouble for a considerable period. It was a kettledrum night altogether; never did that instrument so royally earn its salary! The player of it was a soloist in almost every number of the programme, with the orchestra as a dim back-ground playing harmonies to his knock-turnes! Never was a more striking success! Nevertheless the tender love-theme was expressively played, and the overture was generally successful even if played in too loonine a mood.

Mrs. Henschel was an entire success in this concert. Her first number was Liszt's "Kennst du das Land?" in which the sweet tenderness and simplicity suited her perfectly, and even the broad climax beginning at the words "Dahin, dahin," seemed not to be beyond her force. The tone-color of this great art-song is continuously interesting, and the treatment of the questioning figure of four notes is very effective, even if the melody is not as charming as the better-known one of Ambroise Thomas. Mrs. Henschel was most cordially applauded in this number, and still more so in the charming Spring-song by her husband, which was scored with becoming delicacy and prettiness. In this song the artist was entirely in her own domain, a field in which few singers may hope to rival her, the realm of daintiness, delicacy and archness.

And now to the chief work of the concert. A new symphony by a resident composer is an event of importance enough to arouse the most blase of concertgoers. It is a little over a year ago that we had an overture, "The Maid of Orleans," by Gustav Strube, performed at these concerts. That work already showed that the composer was a man of originality, not entirely free from the modern dissonance-fever but not allowing this malady to draw him away from the paths of musical form and coherency. The first symphony of this composer, performed at this concert, bears out the impression which the overture made. We possess half-a-dozen classical composers within the ranks of our orchestra, but believe that not one of them, and not any symphonic composer in our country, has shown as much originality as Mr. Strube has put in evidence in this work. The first movement is in good and clear sonata-allegro form. It possesses a rather barbaric chief theme, but a charming second theme of excellent contrast to the first, and both have the merit of being real "symphonic" themes, capable of being thematically treated and developed. Another true symphonic point is that the themes are not given in perfectly plain melodic guise as in the Haydn or Mozart symphonies, but are developed in some degree even in the exposition, before the true development, a la Beethoven. The old fault crops out in this movement, however, there is too much elaboration, too little of dignity and repose, and the short "durchfuehrungssatz" and the very decisive coda give to this movement rather the character of a

The second movement has some glorious points, notably a noble chief theme which is allotted to the violoncello. The movement, however, is not, cannot be sustained at the power of its beginning, and again the inevitable tumult rushes in with the first episode. The movement unexpectedly ends with the most absolute simplicity, perhaps too sudden a contrast. The applause at the end of this movement was very abundant, and the composer was obliged to bow his thanks.

The Scherzo was wholly commendable in its clear construction and original themes. There was an odd tricksiness of phrasing in the first part, in which some quaint six-barred phrases at once awakened attention. The Trio was in fine contrast and was framed upon a still quainter set of phrases which were, we believe, of five measures each, certainly of odd and striking flavor and ingenious construction. At a first hearing this movement seemed the most effective and sustainedly interesting of the work. Its coda was effectively eerie and brusque.

The finale, of rather more free a form than the other movements, had a march-like chief theme and some strong contrasts. It employed some very dissonant sequences in its development, and was rather too emphatic and bizarre. It was the loudest, and possibly the weakest movement of the composition, and again the kettledrummer kettledrummed to his heart's content. The audience called for the composer at the end with much enthusiasm and he was repeatedly forced to bow his acknowledgments.

Is the new work a great symphony? One would hesitate to affirm that. The symphonic form demands a versatility of power and a sustained grasp that even a Rubinstein could not achieve, and Mr. Strube's work has its thin spots, but it has also a wealth of ideas, a good degree of originality, a commendable mastery of scoring, an abundant promise of good, possibly great, things from a composer who is yet young. The work causes us to believe that Mr. Strube is to take a permanent rank among prominent composers sometime, and he is at present a figure of no slight importance in the list of resident workers in the higher forms of musical art.

The concert closed with a brilliant but overloud performance of Schumann's Genoveva overture.

Louis C. Elson.

Boston Transcript
MONDAY, APRIL 6, 1896.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The programme of the twentieth symphony concert was—

Tschaikowsky: Overture-Fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet."
Liszt: Song with Orchestra, "Kennst du das Land?"
Gustav Strube: Symphony in C minor (MS.), opus 11, (First Time.)
Henschel: Song with Orchestra, "Spring."
Schumann: Overture to "Genoveva," opus 81.
Mrs. Georg Henschel was the singer.

Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" grows upon one, the more one hears it. There are, to be sure, moments of barbarism in the work; and the barbaric in art is not particularly to our taste. But the truth and force of the composer's inspiration compel admiration from the first measure to the last. The composition was excellently played and made its usual strong impression upon the audience.

The memory of Mr. Strube's "Jungfrau von Orleans" overture last year was enough to make one look forward to his new symphony with pleasant expectancy. And the new work is in no wise a disappointment. For a young and little-tried composer to combine the most unreserved romantic strenuousness of expression with such fine clarity of form as Mr. Strube has done is exceedingly uncommon. Perhaps the character of the thematic material is in general a little "homely"—in the good English sense of the word—for such large development, and so imposing a medium as the modern orchestra; but the sureness with which the composer shows that he always knows whither he is going, and the security with which he handles his material, impress one at once and lastingly. The scherzo is in particularly a gem in its way. The symphony was very warmly received, and few new works have better deserved such a reception.

Schumann's ever-beautiful and inspiring "Genoveva" overture was grandly played and brought the concert to a splendid close.

Mrs. Henschel sang wonderfully as ever. "Kennst du das Land?" is certainly one of the best of Liszt's songs, and its orchestral dress fits it to perfection; it shows less melodic invention than the "Loreley," perhaps, and what of melodic invention there is in it is not of the most ingratiating sort. But it is a decidedly finer musical expression of the text than the "Loreley," and in it Liszt evinces less of his too common tendency to make a musical mountain out of a poetic mole-hill. Mr. Henschel's "Spring" is the same fascinating little thing Mrs. Henschel sang, with pianoforte accompaniment at their last recital. It is infinitely charming. To hear Mrs. Henschel sing these two songs was a pure delight.

The next programme is: Spohr, overture to "Jessonda;" Handel, recitative, "Deeper and deeper still," and aria, "Waft her, angels," from "Jephtha;" Beethoven, quartet in C-sharp minor, opus 131 (scored for full orchestra by Müller-Berghaus); Wagner, Walther's Preislied from "Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg;" Brahms, "Academic" overture. Mr. Ben Davies will be the singer.

SATURDAY, APRIL 11, 1896.
BOSTON STANDARD.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.—The rehearsal for the 21st concert of the present season at Music Hall yesterday afternoon called out one of the largest and most enthusiastic audiences, even of this most artistically successful season. The program was as follows: Spohr, overture to "Jessonda," op. 63; Haendel, recitative, "Deeper and Deeper Still," and aria, "Waft Her, Angels," from "Jephthah"; Raff, symphony No. 5, in E. major, "Lenore," op. 117; part 1, "Liebesgluck," Allegro, Andante quasi Larghetto; part 2, "Trennung," Marsch-Tempo, Agitato; part 3, "Wiedervereinigung im Tode," introduction and ballade (after G. Burger's "Lenore"), Allegro. Wagner, "Walther's Preislied," from "Die Meistersinger von urnburg." Brahms, Akademische fest-ouverture, op. 80. The "Jessonda" overture, a graceful, delicate and most welcome entree to the more substantial banquet which followed, was rendered with a perfection of dynamical expression seldom equalled, even by this, our own, peerless orchestra. It was a treat, and though by no move of the pretentious order of the Raff symphony, or the Wagner and Brahms selections, it was, if not so profoundly intuitive, fully as generally satisfying. Of course, the symphony was the leading feature of the afternoon and was interpreted as only such a grand aggregation as ours could hope to render such a work.

Mr. Ben Davies was the popular member on the program, his rendering of Handel's dramatic recitation, "Deeper and Deeper Still," and the beautiful aria "Waft Her, Angels," from "Jephthah," was far more satisfactory than was his work in "The Creation" last Sunday evening. If there were a fault in his method, it might be said the tempo of the recitative was somewhat too slow, but the exceeding excellence of the aria fully made up for that. He was rewarded by five of the most hearty recalls from audience and musicians alike that critical Boston has given an artist. No doubt his triumph will be repeated tonight.

The Musical Courier.
NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 8, 1896.

* * *

The program of the twentieth Symphony concert was as follows:

Overture, fantasy, Romeo and Juliet.....Tschaikowsky
Song, with orchestra, Kennst du das Land?.....Liszt
Mrs. Henschel.
Symphony in C minor (MS.), op. 11 (first time).....Gustav Strube
Song, with orchestra, Spring.....Henschel
Mrs. Henschel.
Overture to Genoveva.....Schumann

Mr. Strube was born March 3, 1867, at Ballenstadt. His father was his first teacher. When the boy was ten years old he was a member of the Stadt Orchester. At the age of sixteen he entered the Leipsic Conservatory; studied the violin under Brodsky and Hermann, and composition under Jadassohn and Reinecke. An accident to his hand soon after he had played at the graduation concert incapacitated him for a year, and he took to conducting. He went back to Leipsic, studied, took prizes for composition, was a member of the Gewandhaus Orchestra. He went to Mannheim, where he taught violin at the Conservatory. Six years ago Mr. Brodsky recommended him to Mr. Nikisch, and so Mr. Strube became a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The symphony played last night was composed last summer.

Mr. Strube has shown by this symphony that he has a voice of his own. He is not merely an echo. He is not merely a painstaking imitator of approved models. He has musical imagination and a well developed technic. And then he has that most enviable thing, the exuberance of youth, with its optimism, its joy, that is at times boisterous, its healthy courage, that occasionally disquiets elderly and jaded persons. He knows the symphonic form and respects it as much as it deserves, but he is not in awe of it, nor is it a throttler of his fancy.

Perhaps Mr. Strube forgets himself once in a while, and talks then too continuously in a high-pitched voice, but he has something to say and much of it is worth hearing. At any rate he does not stammer, he does not repeat solemnly respectable commonplaces. He may go so far as to say things that create a flutter, as when eyeglasses are leveled at a bold young man who contradicts the fogyism of smug authority. The second and the third movements are superior to the first and the finale. The material is richer, the grasp is stronger. The strokes are surer, more direct.

In the adagio Mr. Strube does not stop after he has finished a charming, flowing theme, and then stroll, watch in hand, until it is the proper time to return to his theme; he presents fresh and interesting matter, and he develops it in a masterly manner. The scherzo is sparkling, ingenious, exceedingly well scored. The symphony as a whole is distinguished by melodic freshness, rhythmic variety, thoughtfulness that never totters on the brink of stupidity, strong feeling for shades and nuances of color. Its faults, and they are comparatively few, are those of imaginative youth, and I think they outweigh the merits of perseverance and industry, qualities that characterize chiefly the labor of uninspired, commonplace makers of music, and are also useful in the exercise of carpentry, bricklaying and other commendable trades.

The noble fantasie of Tschaikowsky and the overture of Schumann were finely played. Mrs. Henschel sang with beauty of tone and rare intelligence.

Philip Hale.

The Sunday Telegram
PORTLAND, MAINE.
SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 5, 1896.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Emil Paur, conductor, announces its only concert this season in Portland at City Hall, on Wednesday evening, April 15. The concert will be the 23d given in this city and the 1,396th performance since the founding of this orchestra 15 years ago.

Th programme, although containing only four numbers, is a most satisfactory one. No work performed this season by any musical organization in this country has made so deep and lasting impresion as the symphony No. 6 of Tschaikowsky, better known as the "Pathetic." This symphony made such a deep impression upon its first performance in the Boston concerts early this winter that, by very general request, it was repeated two weeks later, a compliment paid to only half a dozen compositions in the 15 years' existence of the organization. Speaking of the second performance, a leading Boston critic said: "Every successive performance of the work discovers new beauties and intensifies the belief that it is the largest and most impressive symphony of modern date; not only for its splendid flowing melody, and the lofty dignity that pervades it, but also for the nobility of its inspiration and purity of its sentiment."

The soloist will be Miss Antoinette Szumowska, who has already scored several brilliant successes with the orchestra in Boston and elsewhere. Miss Szumowska has chosen the concerto No. 2 for piano-forte by Saint-Saens, a most beautiful composition, notably the second and last movements, which are sure to awaken great enthusiasm. Miss Szumowska is known as the favorite pupil of Paderewski, and the patrons of this concert who have listened to the greatest pianist of the present age will easily recall his mehods in the playing of his pupil.

In deference to the very general demand in modern programmes for one or more selections by Wagner Mr. Paur has placed upon the programme the "Waldweben" or "Forest Sounds," from the opera of "Siegfried," a most beautiful illustration of Wagner's great leaning toward the descriptive in music and, as a fitting close to such a programme the well-known and ever-popular overture to "Rienzi" will be given.

The recent appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York called out the most remarkable series of favorable criticisms ever earned by any organization in this country, and the music-loving public of Portland and vicinity should manifest its appreciation of such a programme by such an organization at the ordinary prices, by filling City Hall to its utmost capacity.

Gazette
BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 12.

The Symphony Concert.

The twenty-first concert of the Symphony Orchestra was given in Music Hall, last evening. The programme was:

Overture, "Jessonda".....Spohr
Recitative and Aria.....Handel
Symphony, No. 5.....Raff
Walters' Prize Song.....Wagner
Academic Overture.....Brahms
Soloist, Mr. Ben Davies.

There is little that calls for comment in this programme. The Raff Symphony is always a favorite, probably, in part, on account of the story it is supposed to tell, but certainly for the fine music it contains. The work was played with rare spirit and brilliancy, with admirable finish and effect in its coloring, and with fine feeling for tone contrasts. The third movement, when it reached its climax, was irresistible, and even one who has no belief in programme music, felt the effects of the weird, wild ride in his blood and in his nerves. It was a triumph of fine artistic conducting and playing. In other directions we have recently had so much painful evidence of what conducting should not be, that it is a pleasure to turn to Mr. Paur where masterful skill and knowledge are equally combined, and where artistic instinct and feeling come to the support of wise experience and cultivated taste. One listens in full content and dreams of the Utopia wherein poor, misused oratorios will stand as an equal beside her younger sister, symphony.

Mr. Ben Davies again delighted a Boston audience with his broad, large, dignified and dramatic singing. In style, phrasing, artistic feeling and enunciation, nothing more could be desired. It was masterly work, that roused an usually apathetic audience into wild enthusiasm.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 6, 1896.

The Symphony Concert—Strube's New Symphony.

Handel and Haydn Concert, "The Creation"—Paderewski's Last.

Our musical wanderers have returned crowned with laurels. The reviews of the concerts given on this tour have been so delightfully enthusiastic that the Boston reviewer may be pardoned if he indulges in a little glow of pride on this account. Never before have the orchestra received such encomiums in New York, and it is just possible that it is because never before have they been in such perfect discipline, never before have they played quite as well, and while constantly remembering that Mr. Gericke was the real founder of the musical excellence that now obtains, one must give cordial gratitude to Mr. Paur for tightening lines that had become relaxed, for turning retrogression into a renewed advance. One might as well praise the piano at a Paderewski recital without awarding praise to the pianist as speak of the splendid technique of our orchestra without giving the credit of the performance to the man who directs it.

The concert of Saturday began with that passionate Fantasie-Overture to "Romeo and Juliet" which presents Tschaikowsky in one of his noblest moods. It is a bit singular that the best musical inspirations which have arisen from the great tragedy should be instrumental rather than vocal works; the ideal opera upon the subject yet remains to be written, while Berlioz's balcony-scene between two instruments, and this overture of Tschaikowsky with an English horn Romeo, outweigh in intrinsic merit the warblings of a Melba and a De Reszke in the same subject. There is considerable majesty in this work and considerable of fighting, too. The reviewer liked Mr. Paur's reading better in the "Alarums, excursions" side of the topic than in the sad plaints of the two unfortunates. Tschaikowsky seemed to revel in the contentions of the Montagues and Capulets, and the riots were almost continuous. A belligerent bassoon would inquire, "Do you bite your thumb at us, sir," and the clarinette would shriek back "I do bite my thumb, sir," and instantly the kettle-drums and cymbals would break loose and there would ensue dissonance and trouble for a considerable period. It was a kettledrum night altogether; never did that instrument so royally earn its salary! The player of it was a soloist in almost every number of the programme, with the orchestra as a dim back-ground playing harmonies to his knock-turnes! Never was a more striking success! Nevertheless the tender love-theme was expressively played, and the overture was generally successful even if played in too leonine a mood.

Mrs. Henschel was an entire success in this concert. Her first number was Liszt's "Kennst du das Land?" in which the sweet tenderness and simplicity suited her perfectly, and even the broad climax beginning at the words "Dahin, dahin," seemed not to be beyond her force. The tone-color of this great art-song is continuously interesting, and the treatment of the questioning figure of four notes is very effective, even if the melody is not as charming as the better-known one of Ambroise Thomas. Mrs. Henschel was most cordially applauded in this number, and still more so in the charming Spring-song by her husband, which was scored with becoming delicacy and prettiness. In this song the artist was entirely in her own domain, a field in which few singers may hope to rival her, the realm of daintiness, delicacy and archness.

And now to the chief work of the concert. A new symphony by a resident composer is an event of importance enough to arouse the most blase of concertgoers. It is a little over a year ago that we had an overture, "The Maid of Orleans," by Gustav Strube, performed at these concerts. That work already showed that the composer was a man of originality, not entirely free from the modern dissonance-fever but not allowing this malady to draw him away from the paths of musical form and coherency. The first symphony of this composer, performed at this concert, bears out the impression which the overture made. We possess half-a-dozen classical composers within the ranks of our orchestra, but we believe that not one of them, and not any symphonic composer in our country, has shown as much originality as Mr. Strube has put in evidence in this work. The first movement is in good and clear sonata-allegro form. It possesses a rather barbaric chief theme, but a charming second theme of excellent contrast to the first, and both have the merit of being real "symphonic" themes, capable of being thematically treated and developed. Another true symphonic point is that the themes are not given in perfectly plain melodic guise as in the Haydn or Mozart symphonies, but are developed in some degree even in the exposition, before the true development, a la Beethoven. The old fault crops out in the movement, however, there is too much of agitation, too little of dignity and repose, and the short "durchfuehrungssatz" and the very decisive coda give to this first movement rather the character of a

The second movement has some glorious points, notably a noble chief theme which is allotted to the violoncello. The movement, however, is not, cannot be sustained at the power of its beginning, and again the inevitable tumult rushes in with the first episode. The movement unexpectedly ends with the most absolute simplicity, perhaps too sudden a contrast. The applause at the end of this movement was very abundant, and the composer was obliged to bow his thanks.

The Scherzo was wholly commendable in its clear construction and original themes. There was an odd tricksiness of phrasing in the first part, in which some quaint six-barred phrases at once awakened attention. The Trio was in fine contrast and was framed upon a still quainter set of phrases which were, we believe, of five measures each, certainly of odd and striking flavor and ingenious construction. At a first hearing this movement seemed the most effective and sustainedly interesting of the work. Its coda was effectively eerie and brusque.

The finale, of rather more free a form than the other movements, had a march-like chief theme and some strong contrasts. It employed some very dissonant sequences in its development, and was rather too emphatic and bizarre. It was the loudest, and possibly the weakest movement of the composition, and again the kettledrummer kettledrummed to his heart's content. The audience called for the composer at the end with much enthusiasm and he was repeatedly forced to bow his acknowledgments.

Is the new work a great symphony? One would hesitate to affirm that. The symphonic form demands a versatility of power and a sustained grasp that even a Rubinstein could not achieve, and Mr. Strube's work has its thin spots, but it has also a wealth of ideas, a good degree of originality, a commendable mastery of scoring, an abundant promise of good, possibly great, things from a composer who is yet young. The work causes us to believe that Mr. Strube is to take a permanent rank among prominent composers sometime, and he is at present a figure of no slight importance in the list of resident workers in the higher forms of musical art.

The concert closed with a brilliant but overloud performance of Schumann's Genoveva overture.

Louis C. Elson.

Boston Transcript
MONDAY, APRIL 6, 1896.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The programme of the twentieth symphony concert was—

Tschaikowsky: Overture-Fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet."
Liszt: Song with Orchestra, "Kennst du das Land?"
Gustav Strube: Symphony in C minor (MS.), opus 11. (First Time.)
Henschel: Song with Orchestra, "Spring."
Schumann: Overture to "Genoveva," opus 81.
Mrs. Georg Henschel was the singer.

Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" grows upon one, the more one hears it. There are, to be sure, moments of barbarism in the work; and the barbaric in art is not particularly to our taste. But the truth and force of the composer's inspiration compel admiration from the first measure to the last. The composition was excellently played and made its usual strong impression upon the audience.

The memory of Mr. Strube's "Jungfrau von Orleans" overture last year was enough to make one look forward to his new symphony with pleasant expectancy. And the new work is in no wise a disappointment. For a young and little-tried composer to combine the most unreserved romantic strenuousness of expression with such fine clarity of form as Mr. Strube has done is exceedingly uncommon. Perhaps the character of the thematic material is in general a little "homely"—in the good English sense of the word—for such large development, and so imposing a medium as the modern orchestra; but the sureness with which the composer shows that he always knows whither he is going, and the security with which he handles his material, impress one at once and lastingly. The scherzo is in particularly a gem in its way. The symphony was very warmly received, and few new works have better deserved such a reception.

Schumann's ever-beautiful and inspiring "Genoveva" overture was grandly played and brought the concert to a splendid close.

Mrs. Henschel sang wonderfully as ever. "Kennst du das Land?" is certainly one of the best of Liszt's songs, and its orchestral dress fits it to perfection; it shows less melodic invention than the "Loreley," perhaps, and what of melodic invention there is in it is not of the most ingratiating sort. But it is a decidedly finer musical expression of the text than the "Loreley," and in it Liszt evinces less of his too common tendency to make a musical mountain out of a poetic mole-hill. Mr. Henschel's "Spring" is the same fascinating little thing Mrs. Henschel sang, with pianoforte accompaniment at their last recital. It is infinitely charming. To hear Mrs. Henschel sing these two songs was a pure delight.

The next programme is: Spohr, overture to "Jessonda;" Handel, recitative, "Deeper and deeper still," and aria, "Waft her, angels," from "Jephtha;" Beethoven, quartet in C-sharp minor, opus 131 (scored for full orchestra by Müller-Berghaus); Wagner, Walther's Preislied from "Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg;" Brahms, "Academic" overture. Mr. Ben Davies will be the singer.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 8, 1896.

* *

The program of the twentieth Symphony concert was as follows:

Overture, fantasy, Romeo and Juliet.....Tschaikowsky
Song, with orchestra, Kennst du das Land?.....Liszt
Mrs. Henschel.
Symphony in C minor (MS.), op. 11 (first time).....Gustav Strube
Song, with orchestra, Spring.....Henschel
Mrs. Henschel.
Overture to Genoveva.....Schumann

Mr. Strube was born March 3, 1867, at Ballenstadt. His father was his first teacher. When the boy was ten years old he was a member of the Stadt Orchester. At the age of sixteen he entered the Leipsic Conservatory; studied the violin under Brodsky and Hermann, and composition under Jadassohn and Reinecke. An accident to his hand soon after he had played at the graduation concert incapacitated him for a year, and he took to conducting. He went back to Leipsic, studied, took prizes for composition, was a member of the Gewandhaus Orchestra. He went to Mannheim, where he taught violin at the Conservatory. Six years ago Mr. Brodsky recommended him to Mr. Nikisch, and so Mr. Strube became a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The symphony played last night was composed last summer.

Mr. Strube has shown by this symphony that he has a voice of his own. He is not merely an echo. He is not merely a painstaking imitator of approved models. He has musical imagination and a well developed technic. And then he has that most enviable thing, the exuberance of youth, with its optimism, its joy, that is at times boisterous, its healthy courage, that occasionally disquiets elderly and jaded persons. He knows the symphonic form and respects it as much as it deserves, but he is not in awe of it, nor is it a throttler of his fancy.

Perhaps Mr. Strube forgets himself once in a while, and talks then too continuously in a high-pitched voice, but he has something to say and much of it is worth hearing. At any rate he does not stammer, he does not repeat solemnly respectable commonplaces. He may go so far as to say things that create a flutter, as when eyeglasses are leveled at a bold young man who contradicts the fogyism of smug authority. The second and the third movements are superior to the first and the finale. The material is richer, the grasp is stronger. The strokes are surer, more direct.

In the adagio Mr. Strube does not stop after he has finished a charming, flowing theme, and then stroll, watch in hand, until it is the proper time to return to his theme; he presents fresh and interesting matter, and he develops it in a masterly manner. The scherzo is sparkling, ingenious, exceedingly well scored. The symphony as a whole is distinguished by melodic freshness, rhythmic variety, thoughtfulness that never totters on the brink of stupidity, strong feeling for shades and nuances of color. Its faults, and they are comparatively few, are those of imaginative youth, and I think they outweigh the merits of perseverance and industry, qualities that characterize chiefly the labor of uninspired, commonplace makers of music, and are also useful in the exercise of carpentry, bricklaying and other commendable trades.

The noble fantasie of Tschaikowsky and the overture of Schumann were finely played. Mrs. Henschel sang with beauty of tone and rare intelligence.

PHILIP HALE.

SATURDAY, APRIL 11, 1896.

BOSTON STANDARD.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.—The rehearsal for the 21st concert of the present season at Music Hall yesterday afternoon called out one of the largest and most enthusiastic audiences, even of this most artistically successful season. The program was as follows: Spohr, overture to "Jessonda," op. 63; Haendel, recitative, "Deeper and Deeper Still," and aria, "Waft Her, Angels," from "Jephthah"; Raff, symphony No. 5, in E. major, "Lenore," op. 117; part 1, "Liebesgluck," Allegro, Andante quasi Larghetto; part 2, "Trennung," Marsch-Tempo, Agitato; part 3, "Wiedervereinigung im Tode," introduction and ballade (after G. Burger's "Lenore"), Allegro. Wagner, "Walther's Preislied," from "Die Meistersinger von urnburg." Brahms, Akademische fest-ouverture, op. 80. The "Jessonda" overture, a graceful, delicate and most welcome entree to the more substantial banquet which followed, was rendered with a perfection of dynamical expression seldom equalled, even by this, our own, peerless orchestra. It was a treat, and though by no move of the pretentious order of the Raff symphony, or the Wagner and Brahms selections, it was, if not so profoundly intuitive, fully as generally satisfying. Of course, the symphony was the leading feature of the afternoon and was interpreted as only such a grand aggregation as ours could hope to render such a work.

Mr. Ben Davies was the popular member on the program, his rendering of Handel's dramatic recitation, "Deeper and Deeper Still," and the beautiful aria "Waft Her, Angels," from "Jephthah," was far more satisfactory than was his work in "The Creation" last Sunday evening. If there were a fault in his method, it might be said the tempo of the recitative was somewhat too slow, but the exceeding excellence of the aria fully made up for that. He was rewarded by five of the most hearty recalls from audience and musicians alike that critical Boston has given an artist. No doubt his triumph will be repeated tonight.

The Sunday Telegram
PORTLAND, MAINE.
SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 5, 1896.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Emil Paur, conductor, announces its only concert this season in Portland at City Hall, on Wednesday evening, April 15. The concert will be the 23d given in this city and the 1,396th performance since the founding of this orchestra 15 years ago.

Th programme, although containing only four numbers, is a most satisfactory one. No work performed this season by any musical organization in this country has made so deep and lasting impresion as the symphony No. 6 of Tschaikowsky, better known as the "Pathetic." This symphony made such a deep impression upon its first performance in the Boston concerts early this winter that, by very general request, it was repeated two weeks later, a compliment paid to only half a dozen compositions in the 15 years' existence of the organization. Speaking of the second performance, a leading Boston critic said: "Every successive performance of the work discovers new beauties and intensifies the belief that it is the largest and most impressive symphony of modern date; not only for its splendid flowing melody, and the lofty dignity that pervades it, but also for the nobility of its inspiration and purity of its sentiment."

The soloist will be Miss Antoinette Szumowska, who has already scored several brilliant successes with the orchestra in Boston and elsewhere. Miss Szumowska has chosen the concerto No. 2 for piano-forte by Saint-Saens, a most beautiful composition, notably the second and last movements, which are sure to awaken great enthusiasm. Miss Szumowska is known as the favorite pupil of Paderewski, and the patrons of this concert who have listened to the greatest pianist of the present age will easily recall his mehods in the playing of his pupil.

In deference to the very general demand in modern programmes for one or more selections by Wagner Mr. Paur has placed upon the programme the "Waldweben" or "Forest Sounds," from the opera of "Siegfried," a most beautiful illustration of Wagner's great leaning toward the descriptive in music and, as a fitting close to such a programme the well-known and ever-popular overture to "Rienzi" will be given.

The recent appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York called out the most remarkable series of favorable criticisms ever earned by any organization in this country, and the music-loving public of Portland and vicinity should manifest its appreciation of such a programme by such an organization at the ordinary prices, by filling City Hall to its utmost capacity.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 12.

The Symphony Concert.

The twenty-first concert of the Symphony Orchestra was given in Music Hall, last evening. The programme was:

Overture, "Jessonda".....Spohr
Recitative and Aria.....Handel
Symphony, No. 5.....Raff
Walters' Prize Song.....Wagner
Academic Overture.....Brahms
Soloist, Mr. Ben Davies.

There is little that calls for comment in this programme. The Raff Symphony is always a favorite, probably, in part, on account of the story it is supposed to tell, but certainly for the fine music it contains. The work was played with rare spirit and brilliancy, with admirable finish and effect in its coloring, and with fine feeling for tone contrasts. The third movement, when it reached its climax, was irresistible, and even one who has no belief in programme music, felt the effects of the weird, wild ride in his blood and in his nerves. It was a triumph of fine artistic conducting and playing. In other directions we have recently had so much painful evidence of what conducting should not be, that it is a pleasure to turn to Mr. Paur where masterful skill and knowledge are equally combined, and where artistic instinct and feeling come to the support of wise experience and cultivated taste. One listens in full content and dreams of the Utopia wherein poor, misused oratorios will stand as an equal beside her younger sister, symphony.

Mr. Ben Davies again delighted a Boston audience with his broad, large, dignified and dramatic singing. In style, phrasing, artistic feeling and enunciation, nothing more could be desired. It was masterly work, that roused an usually apathetic audience into wild enthusiasm.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCIX., NO. 103.
SUNDAY, APRIL 12, 1896.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Ben Davies One of the Best Singers of the Season.

Handel, as Sung by Him and Played by the Orchestra, Not so Very Old-Fashioned—The Still Delightful Overture "Jessonda"—The Raff Symphony Finely Rendered.

The programme for the 21st concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall last night, was:

Overture, "Jessonda".....Spohr
Aria, "Waft Her Angels".....Handel
Symphony No. 5, "Lenore".....Raff
Prize song, "Die Meistersinger".....Wagner
Academic overture.....Brahms

Mr. Ben Davies was the soloist.

The still delightful "Jessonda" overture, written in the height of the composer's powers nearly three-quarters of a century ago, was given a beautiful reading, wholly in sympathy with the refined elegance and the graceful brilliancy of the work.

The Raff symphony begins to show the traces of decay in its earlier interest and effectiveness, and to seem overlong for what it has to say, but the andante, with its lovely themes, its exquisite orchestration and its warm and delicately sensuous color, holds its own, and the wonderfully sustained impetuosity and dramatic fire of the finale continue to appeal to the imagination; but, on the whole, it is doubtful if the symphony will survive as long as the composer's "Im Walde." Of the performance there is nothing to say, except in superlatives, especially in regard to the slow movement, the prominent first horn part of which was played with exquisite purity of tone and tenderness of style. The rendering of the march was so charming in regard to light shade and accent as almost to make one forget how closely it borders on the commonplace and how unsymphonic it is in character.

The Brahms overture never had a more spirited and effective interpretation here than was given it by Mr. Paur on this occasion.

Mr. Davies' performance of the recitative "Deeper and Deeper Still" and the aria "Waft Her Angels," from Handel's "Jephtha," may be placed foremost in the best singing that has been heard at these concerts this season. The recitative is in the composer's broadest style. How perfectly the music echoes the meaning of the words; how chastely dramatic it is, and withal, how simple, and what surprisingly powerful effect is produced with the unassisted accompaniment of the strings! Mr. Davies declaimed it in a large and noble manner, and with unsurpassable justness of feeling, every change of sentiment finding its exact expression. And no purer and more searching singing can be easily imagined than that of Mr. Davies in the pathetic and lovely aria, to say nothing of the smoothness of his style, the beauty of his phrasing and his perfect method. The whole effort was delightful in its manliness and was the perfection of Handel singing. That it should have stirred the audience into recalling him again and again was not surprising. The accompaniments were worthy the singing, notably in the recitative, which was splendidly accented by Mr. Paur. Handel thus sung, and thus accompanied is not so very old-fashioned, after all. It would be an edifying experience to hear "The Messiah," interpreted by singers, conductor and orchestra in this manner. In the "Prize Song" Mr. Davies was not so successful. The general range of the music is not well within the best and most sympathetic part of his voice, but he sang it with a thorough appreciation of its underlying character and with a passionate and flexible fervor that carried his hearers with him and stirred them to recall him some two or three times.

By the way, cannot the orchestra be induced to refrain from the noisy tuning of their instruments and the equally noisy preluding in which they indulge after they have taken their places previous to the beginning of the concert? It is not pleasing in the hearing, and, although there is a story that a certain Sultan of Turkey preferred such tuning and preluding to the music that was performed by a European orchestra that once visited Constantinople, it can scarcely be taken as evidence that cacophony should be equally welcome to more cultivated ears.

The programme for the next concert, the last but two of the season, is: Overture, "King Stephen," Beethoven; scene and aria, "King Saul's Dream," Dr. C. Hubert Parry; three movements from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" symphony; ballad, "Jung Dietrich," Henschel; march, Schubert; and Wagner's "Huldigung's" march. The soloist will be Mr. Georg Henschel.

Boston Journal.
SUNDAY, APRIL 12, 1896.

Twenty-First Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall Last Evening—Mr. Ben Davies the Soloist.

The program of the 21st Symphony Concert, Mr. Paur conductor, was as follows:

Overture to "Jessonda".....Spohr
Recitative, "Deeper and Deeper Still," and Aria, "Waft Her, Angels," from "Jephthah".....Handel
Symphony No. 5, in E major, "Lenore".....Raff
"Walther's Preislied," from "Die Meistersinger".....Wagner
Akademische Fest-Ouverture, Op. 80.Brahms

No work was produced last evening for the first time, and yet the "Jessorda" overture was undoubtedly new to many in the audience. The opera itself is seldom heard in Germany; in 1894 it was given only six times in that country:—in Cassel, Danzig and Hanover. The age is too nervous to enjoy the calm and the mellifluence of an opera by Spohr; but the "Jessonda" overture last night was not a bit hopelessly 1823 in the introduction; on the contrary, it was fresh and modern. Only the main body of the overture showed old-fashioned treatment, which, after all, was by no means disagreeable.

The dead ride fast, and so do symphonies. Today Raff is the composer of one beautiful symphony, the "Im Walde." Truly are there charming passages in the second movement, and the start of the first movement is impressive; but there is too much of Raff at his worst in this symphony and not enough of Raff at his best. Take the ending of the slow movement: it seems cheap and interminable. The sentiment, too, is inclined toward sentimentalism. Yes, it often falls into it. Pupils of Raff claim that he wished the march to be taken as a Scherzo and at about double the tempo generally observed. They are not to be shaken in this statement. Why should not the experiment be tried? The march would the sooner be over. As for the spectral ride in the finale, it no longer excites wonder or consternation. The neighing of the horses may please lovers of imitative music—and this suggests the happy thought of Mr. Paur in paying tribute to the horse show. But it would have been better if he had given us "The Ride of the Valkyries," or Saint-Saëns's "Phaëton," or even Auber's overture to "The Bronze Horse."

A stirring performance of Brahms's pot-pourri on German student songs brought to a close a concert that gave much pleasure, largely on account of the superb performance of the orchestra.

Then, too, Mr. Davies sang the music by Handel most delightfully. The recitative was declaimed in noble fashion; with breadth, authority, dramatic feeling, and, above all, with heroic tenderness. The air that followed displayed this admirable singer in his full glory. Here was true Handelian singing, as we imagine Handel himself wished it. For though this German composer was in the aria thoroughly Italianized, yet in his later works is there the expression, or at least the suggestion of English blood. Handel, indeed, seems in some of his music to represent the Englishman in his highest development: courageous, determined, inspired by belief in a Power that is always ready to help England, tender in simple, manly fashion. In the air from "Jephtha" Handel strikes a still higher note; yet even here is this queer dash of English feeling. Nor is there anything to be said of Mr. Davies's singing of the air except to thank him most heartily for the generous exhibition of his natural gifts and acquired skill. In the air from "Die Meistersinger" he was not as successful, although he made a brave attempt. The trouble was that the song does not lie easily in his voice. The effort to make effect on the upper tones was too apparent. So it is pleasanter to remember his singing of the Handel music. I remember no finer singing of Handel in this city for several years. Admirable as were the voice and the art of Mr. Lloyd, he was apt to be phlegmatic when he should have been most emotional.

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Courier.
SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 12, 1896.

Mr. Paur placed nothing new upon his twenty-first Symphony programme; but he chose things not too frequently heard—Spohr's gay and genial "Jessonda" overture, the sturdy and stirring with student-song "Academic Festival" overture of Brahms, and the picturesque and poetic "Lenore" symphony of Raff. These were played as became them and the virtuoso orchestra itself. As the season nears its close one can estimate what progress these men have made in intense volume of tone, in absolutely certain celerity and in easy elegance of phrase and finish.

Mr. Ben Davies sang the usually united recitative, "Deeper and deeper still," and the air, "Waft her, angels," from Jephthah," and also (in the English translation) the "Prize Song" from "The Mastersingers," creating great enthusiasm and being repeatedly recalled. For he displayed anew those sterling traits of the first-class English vocalists—unwavering intonation; a tone penetrative when soft and resonant when full; reserve power which gives confidence and pleasure; perfect enunciation; intelligent elocution and authoritative earnestness.

The next programme is thus arranged: Beethoven, overture, "King Stephen;" Dr. C. Hubert Parry, scene and aria, "King Saul's Dream;" Berlioz, three movements from symphony, "Romeo and Juliet;" Henschel, ballad, "Jung Dietrich," with pianoforte accompaniment; Schubert, March; Wagner, Huldigung's March. Soloist, Mr. George Henschel.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, APRIL 12, 1896.

Symphony Concert.

Mr Ben Davies was the soloist at the last symphony, and the hearty reception he received attested his popularity with the concert-going public. His work here has been of such a high artistic nature that he has established himself as a great favorite in the oratorio and concert fields. He is not now considered as a stranger with a continental reputation, but as a singer who has proved worthy of his fame abroad by the excellence of his performances in this country. Mr Davis sang the recitative, "Deeper and deeper still," and the aria, "Waft her, angels," from Handel's oratorio "Jephthah," and Walter's "Prize song," from "Die Meistersinger."

The somber recitative was given with magnificent effect. The voice was full and resonant and the deep emotional nature of the text was presented most vividly. It was dramatic singing of an exceptional quality, every phrase being given with exquisite finish and true devotional spirit. The baritone quality of Mr Davies' voice enables him to impress his auditors with the spirit of the lines, which a tenor of lighter timbre is unable to do. The contrast of sentiment in the aria, "Waft her, angels," was beautifully expressed. The pæan of hope was sung gloriously, illustrating the full meaning of the words, yet not over-emphasizing them for effect. Mr Davies was in excellent voice and sang without much effort, excepting in the very highest notes.

The prize song from "Die Meistersinger" was, perhaps, less satisfactory than the first selection. Although no fault should be found with the style of the interpretation the tones of the upper register were somewhat lacking in sweetness and flexibility. Take Mr Davies' interpretations, though, as a whole and it would be difficult to surpass them in general excellence. The cordiality of his reception was more than duplicated by the applause at the close of each number, which recalled him to the platform many, many times.

Spohr's overture to "Jessonda," the opening orchestral number, was noticeable for the beauty of the phrasing by the horns at the beginning of the number. The cantilena by the horns, with the lighter accompanying themes on the strings, and the closing coda also deserve special mention. The "Academic Festival" overture, by Brahms, was admirably played, the trumpet work being conspicuously good. The coda was given with great brilliancy.

Raff's "Lenore" symphony, No. 5, was the feature of the orchestral work. The peculiar melodic effects in the first movement, in which the trombones interrupt the full orchestra, were played with perfect smoothness; the clarinets introduced their themes in perfect harmony, and the elaborate closing was grandly presented. In the second movement the long continued passages given to the strings showed the wonderful ensemble work of this portion of the orchestra. It was played as if by one instrument from each section. The march and the spectral suggestions of the last movement were given with the requisite effect.

The program for this week's concert is as follows: Beethoven, overture, "King Stephen;" Dr C. Hubert Parry, scene and aria, "King Saul's Dream;" Berlioz, three movements from symphony, "Romeo and Juliet;" Henschel, ballad, "Jung Dietrich;" Schubert, march; Wagner, Huldigung's march. Mr Georg Henschel will be the soloist.

Boston Transcript
MONDAY, APRIL 13, 1896.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the twenty-first Symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Spohr: Overture to "Jessonda," opus 63.
Handel: Recitative, "Deeper and deeper still," and air, "Waft her, angels," from "Jephtha."
Raff: Symphony No. 5, in E major, "Lenore," opus 117.
Wagner: Walther's Preislied, from "Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg."
Brahms: Akademische Fest-Ouverture, opus 80.
Mr. Ben Davies was the singer.

Spohr's overture still holds its own well; there are some surprisingly modern points in it. The whole slow introduction, with its alternation of lively Oriental dance-tune, with thoughtful counterpoint, might have been written yesterday. The genial freedom of form in the principal allegro, too, is noteworthy as the work of a man who was often merely academic in an academic age. The work was admirably played.

Raff's "Lenore" had not been heard here, we think, for nine years; this longish beauty-sleep did not seem to have refreshed it much last Saturday evening. The first part and the coda of the first movement and the whole of the finale still impress one as fine and full of life; the rest sounds very old and weary. That so expert a technician as Raff should have written so poor a free fantasia in the first movement is surprising; the beginning of the working-out is weak enough for Rubinstein. The andante, and still more so the march, have plainly had their day; one listens to them now as if under protest. The performance was a particularly brilliant one, and reflected great credit upon conductor and orchestra.

Brahms's ever welcome "Academic Overture" was splendidly played, and produced its unfailing brilliant effect.

Mr. Davies sang Handel's favorite recitative and air with admirable beauty of expression. It seemed to us that the orchestra played the accompaniment to the air a thought too heavily—not too loud, but with too little appreciation of its poetic suggestiveness; the thing is full of the flapping of angel's wings. The song from the "Meistersinger" demands a rather larger and more heroic voice than Mr. Davies's; but he sang it excellently well, notwithstanding. It is always a pleasure to listen to this artist; he sings both with feeling and brains.

The next programme is: Beethoven, overture to "König Stephan;" Parry, scene and air, "King Saul's Dream;" Berlioz, three movements from the "Roméo et Juliette" symphony; Henschel, ballad, "Jung Dietrich;" Wagner, "Huldigungsmarsch." Mr. Georg Henschel will be the singer.

---

[116]

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCIX., NO. 103.

SUNDAY, APRIL 12, 1896.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Ben Davies One of the Best Singers of the Season.

Handel, as Sung by Him and Played by the Orchestra, Not so Very Old-Fashioned—The Still Delightful Overture "Jessonda"—The Raff Symphony Finely Rendered.

The programme for the 21st concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, in Music Hall last night, was:

Overture, "Jessonda".....Spohr
Aria, "Waft Her Angels".....Handel
Symphony No. 5, "Lenore".....Raff
Prize song, "Die Meistersinger".....Wagner
Academic overture.....Brahms

Mr. Ben Davies was the soloist.

The still delightful "Jessonda" overture, written in the height of the composer's powers nearly three-quarters of a century ago, was given a beautiful reading, wholly in sympathy with the refined elegance and the graceful brilliancy of the work.

The Raff symphony begins to show the traces of decay in its earlier interest and effectiveness, and to seem overlong for what it has to say, but the andante, with its lovely themes, its exquisite orchestration and its warm and delicately sensuous color, holds its own, and the wonderfully sustained impetuosity and dramatic fire of the finale continue to appeal to the imagination; but, on the whole, it is doubtful if the symphony will survive as long as the composer's "Im Walde." Of the performance there is nothing to say, except in superlatives, especially in regard to the slow movement, the prominent first horn part of which was played with exquisite purity of tone and tenderness of style. The rendering of the march was so charming in regard to light shade and accent as almost to make one forget how closely it borders on the commonplace and how unsymphonic it is in character.

The Brahms overture never had a more spirited and effective interpretation here than was given it by Mr. Paur on this occasion.

Mr. Davies' performance of the recitative "Deeper and Deeper Still" and the aria "Waft Her Angels," from Handel's "Jephtha," may be placed foremost in the best singing that has been heard at these concerts this season. The recitative is in the composer's broadest style. How perfectly the music echoes the meaning of the words; how chastely dramatic it is, and withal, how simple, and what surprisingly powerful effect is produced with the unassisted accompaniment of the strings! Mr. Davies declaimed it in a large and noble manner, and with unsurpassable justness of feeling, every change of sentiment finding its exact expression. And no purer and more searching singing can be easily imagined than that of Mr. Davies in the pathetic and lovely aria, to say nothing of the smoothness of his style, the beauty of his phrasing and his perfect method. The whole effort was delightful in its manliness and was the perfection of Handel singing. That it should have stirred the audience into recalling him again and again was not surprising. The accompaniments were worthy the singing, notably in the recitative, which was splendidly accented by Mr. Paur. Handel thus sung, and thus accompanied is not so very old-fashioned, after all. It would be an edifying experience to hear "The Messiah," interpreted by singers, conductor and orchestra in this manner. In the "Prize Song" Mr. Davies was not so successful. The general range of the music is not well within the best and most sympathetic part of his voice, but he sang it with a thorough appreciation of its underlying character and with a passionate and flexible fervor that carried his hearers with him and stirred them to recall him some two or three times.

By the way, cannot the orchestra be induced to refrain from the noisy tuning of their instruments and the equally noisy preluding in which they indulge after they have taken their places previous to the beginning of the concert? It is not pleasing in the hearing, and, although there is a story that a certain Sultan of Turkey preferred such tuning and preluding to the music that was performed by a European orchestra that once visited Constantinople, it can scarcely be taken as evidence that cacophony should be equally welcome to more cultivated ears.

The programme for the next concert, the last but two of the season, is: Overture, "King Stephen," Beethoven; scene and aria, "King Saul's Dream," Dr. C. Hubert Parry; three movements from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" symphony; ballad, "Jung Dietrich," Henschel; march, Schubert; and Wagner's "Huldigung's" march. The soloist will be Mr. Georg Henschel.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, APRIL 12, 1896.

Twenty-First Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall Last Evening—Mr. Ben Davies the Soloist.

The program of the 21st Symphony Concert, Mr. Paur conductor, was as follows:

Overture to "Jessonda".....Spohr
Recitative, "Deeper and Deeper Still," and Aria, "Waft Her, Angels," from "Jephthah".....Handel
Symphony No. 5, in E major, "Lenore".....Raff
"Walther's Preislied," from "Die Meistersinger".....Wagner
Akademische Fest-Ouverture, Op. 80.Brahms

No work was produced last evening for the first time, and yet the "Jessorda" overture was undoubtedly new to many in the audience. The opera itself is seldom heard in Germany; in 1894 it was given only six times in that country:—in Cassel, Danzig and Hanover. The age is too nervous to enjoy the calm and the mellifluence of an opera by Spohr; but the "Jessonda" overture last night was not a bit hopelessly 1823 in the introduction; on the contrary, it was fresh and modern. Only the main body of the overture showed old-fashioned treatment, which, after all, was by no means disagreeable.

The dead ride fast, and so do symphonies. Today Raff is the composer of one beautiful symphony, the "Im Walde." Truly are there charming passages in the second movement, and the start of the first movement is impressive; but there is too much of Raff at his worst in this symphony and not enough of Raff at his best. Take the ending of the slow movement: it seems cheap and interminable. The sentiment, too, is inclined toward sentimentalism. Yes, it often falls into it. Pupils of Raff claim that he wished the march to be taken as a Scherzo and at about double the tempo generally observed. They are not to be shaken in this statement. Why should not the experiment be tried? The march would the sooner be over. As for the spectral ride in the finale, it no longer excites wonder or consternation. The neighing of the horses may please lovers of imitative music—and this suggests the happy thought of Mr. Paur in paying tribute to the horse show. But it would have been better if he had given us "The Ride of the Valkyries," or Saint-Saëns's "Phaëton," or even Auber's overture to "The Bronze Horse."

A stirring performance of Brahms's pot-pourri on German student songs brought to a close a concert that gave much pleasure, largely on account of the superb performance of the orchestra.

Then, too, Mr. Davies sang the music by Handel most delightfully. The recitative was declaimed in noble fashion; with breadth, authority, dramatic feeling, and, above all, with heroic tenderness. The air that followed displayed this admirable singer in his full glory. Here was true Handelian singing, as we imagine Handel himself wished it. For though this German composer was in the aria thoroughly Italianized, yet in his later works is there the expression, or at least the suggestion of English blood. Handel, indeed, seems in some of his music to represent the Englishman in his highest development: courageous, determined, inspired by belief in a Power that is always ready to help England, tender in simple, manly fashion. In the air from "Jephtha" Handel strikes a still higher note; yet even here is this queer dash of English feeling. Nor is there anything to be said of Mr. Davies's singing of the air except to thank him most heartily for the generous exhibition of his natural gifts and acquired skill. In the air from "Die Meistersinger" he was not as successful, although he made a brave attempt. The trouble was that the song does not lie easily in his voice. The effort to make effect on the upper tones was too apparent. So it is pleasanter to remember his singing of the Handel music. I remember no finer singing of Handel in this city for several years. Admirable as were the voice and the art of Mr. Lloyd, he was apt to be phlegmatic when he should have been most emotional.

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 12, 1896.

Mr. Paur placed nothing new upon his twenty-first Symphony programme; but he chose things not too frequently heard—Spohr's gay and genial "Jessonda" overture, the sturdy and stirring with student-song "Academic Festival" overture of Brahms, and the picturesque and poetic "Lenore" symphony of Raff. These were played as became them and the virtuoso orchestra itself. As the season nears its close one can estimate what progress these men have made in intense volume of tone, in absolutely certain celerity and in easy elegance of phrase and finish.

Mr. Ben Davies sang the usually united recitative, "Deeper and deeper still," and the air, "Waft her, angels," from Jephthah," and also (in the English translation) the "Prize Song" from "The Mastersingers," creating great enthusiasm and being repeatedly recalled. For he displayed anew those sterling traits of the first-class English vocalists—unwavering intonation; a tone penetrative when soft and resonant when full; reserve power which gives confidence and pleasure; perfect enunciation; intelligent elocution and authoritative earnestness.

The next programme is thus arranged: Beethoven, overture, "King Stephen;" Dr. C. Hubert Parry, scene and aria, "King Saul's Dream;" Berlioz, three movements from symphony, "Romeo and Juliet;" Henschel, ballad, "Jung Dietrich," with pianoforte accompaniment; Schubert, March; Wagner, Huldigung's March. Soloist, Mr. George Henschel.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, APRIL 12, 1896.

Symphony Concert.

Mr Ben Davies was the soloist at the last symphony, and the hearty reception he received attested his popularity with the concert-going public. His work here has been of such a high artistic nature that he has established himself as a great favorite in the oratorio and concert fields. He is not now considered as a stranger with a continental reputation, but as a singer who has proved worthy of his fame abroad by the excellence of his performances in this country. Mr Davis sang the recitative, "Deeper and deeper still," and the aria, "Waft her, angels," from Handel's oratorio "Jephthah," and Walter's "Prize song," from "Die Meistersinger."

The somber recitative was given with magnificent effect. The voice was full and resonant and the deep emotional nature of the text was presented most vividly. It was dramatic singing of an exceptional quality, every phrase being given with exquisite finish and true devotional spirit. The baritone quality of Mr Davies' voice enables him to impress his auditors with the spirit of the lines which a tenor of ligter timbre is unable to do. The contrast of sentiment in the aria, "Waft her, angels," was beautifully expressed. The pæan of hope was sung gloriously, illustrating the full meaning of the words, yet not over-emphasizing them for effect. Mr Davies was in excellent voice and sang without much effort, excepting in the very highest notes.

The prize song from "Die Meistersinger" was, perhaps, less satisfactory than the first selection. Although no fault should be found with the style of the interpretation the tones of the upper register were somewhat lacking in sweetness and flexibility. Take Mr Davies' interpretations, though, as a whole and it would be difficult to surpass them in general excellence. The cordiality of his reception was more than duplicated by the applause at the close of each number, which recalled him to the platform many, many times.

Spohr's overture to "Jessonda," the opening orchestral number, was noticeable for the beauty of the phrasing by the horns at the beginning of the number. The cantilena by the horns, with the lighter accompanying themes on the strings, and the closing coda also deserve special mention. The "Academic Festival" overture, by Brahms, was admirably played, the trumpet work being conspicuously good. The coda was given with great brilliancy.

Raff's "Lenora" symphony, No. 5, was the feature of the orchestral work. The peculiar melodic effects in the first movement, in which the trombones interrupt the full orchestra, were played with perfect smoothness; the clarinets introduced their themes in perfect harmony, and the elaborate closing was grandly presented. In the second movement the long continued passages given to the strings showed the wonderful ensemble work of this portion of the orchestra. It was played as if by one instrument from each section. The march and the spectral suggestions of the last movement were given with the requisite effect.

The program for this week's concert is as follows: Beethoven, overture, "King Stephen;" Dr C. Hubert Parry, scene and aria, "King Saul's Dream;" Berlioz, three movements from symphony, "Romeo and Juliet;" Henschel, ballad, "Jung Dietrich;" Schubert, march; Wagner, Huldigung's march. Mr Georg Henschel will be the soloist.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, APRIL 13, 1896.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the twenty-first Symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Spohr: Overture to "Jessonda," opus 63.
Handel: Recitative, "Deeper and deeper still," and air, "Waft her, angels," from "Jephtha."
Raff: Symphony No. 5, in E major, "Lenore," opus 117.
Wagner: Walther's Preislied, from "Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg."
Brahms: Akademische Fest-Ouvertüre, opus 80.

Mr. Ben Davies was the singer.

Spohr's overture still holds its own well; there are some surprisingly modern points in it. The whole slow introduction, with its alternation of lively Oriental dance-tune, with thoughtful counterpoint, might have been written yesterday. The genial freedom of form in the principal allegro, too, is noteworthy as the work of a man who was often merely academic in an academic age. The work was admirably played.

Raff's "Lenore" had not been heard here, we think, for nine years; this longish beauty-sleep did not seem to have refreshed it much last Saturday evening. The first part and the coda of the first movement and the whole of the finale still impress one as fine and full of life; the rest sounds very old and weary. That so expert a technician as Raff should have written so poor a free fantasia in the first movement is surprising; the beginning of the working-out is weak enough for Rubinstein. The andante, and still more so the march, have plainly had their day; one listens to them now as if under protest. The performance was a particularly brilliant one, and reflected great credit upon conductor and orchestra.

Brahms's ever welcome "Academic Overture" was splendidly played, and produced its unfailing brilliant effect.

Mr. Davies sang Handel's favorite recitative and air with admirable beauty of expression. It seemed to us that the orchestra played the accompaniment to the air a thought too heavily—not too loud, but with too little appreciation of its poetic suggestiveness; the thing is full of the flapping of angel's wings. The song from the "Meistersinger" demands a rather larger and more heroic voice than Mr. Davies's; but he sang it excellently well, notwithstanding. It is always a pleasure to listen to this artist; he sings both with feeling and brains.

The next programme is: Beethoven, overture to "König Stephan;" Parry, scene and air, "King Saul's Dream;" Berlioz, three movements from the "Roméo et Juliette" symphony; Henschel, ballad, "Jung Dietrich;" Wagner, "Huldigungsmarsch." Mr. Georg Henschel will be the marsch." Mr. Georg Henscel will be the singer.

---

[116]

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 13, 1896.

SYMPHONY

Concert—Mr. Davies in Two Widely Differing Selections.

The concert of Saturday began quietly enough with Spohr's overture to "Jessonda," crystal clear in its form and treatment, but formal even in its most portentous moments. It was read in a sedate manner as befitted its style, and if it presented nothing to grow excited over it was none the less enjoyable and was admirably played. A little of such music now and then may be valuable as an antidote against the modern dissonance-fever.

Mr. Ben Davies appeared in two selections of the most widely differing style. First he gave Handel's "Waft her, Angels," with a preceding recitative. He sang this magnificently, although occasionally he inclined towards exaggeration of shading; but his enunciation, his constant purity of intonation, his dramatic fervor, were things to grow enthusiastic over, and the audience did grow very demonstrative at the end of the number,—more so than at any previous concert, and far beyond the limit of the two recalls which seem to be the established courtesy at these concerts. The brilliant quality of Mr. Davies' high notes was never displayed to better advantage than upon this occasion. One must also give great credit to Mr. Paur and the orchestra for the accompaniment to the recitative, "Deeper and Deeper Still," for it is a most difficult task for a large orchestra to keep in time with a singer in such a free delivery as was given to this part of the number; the ensemble was admirable.

Mr. Davies' other number was Wagner's "Preis-lied," from "The Mastersingers." This did not seem so entirely effective as the Handelian number; in the first place it was sung in English, and any translation interferes with the close union of words and music which Wagner achieved. The end of this number was somewhat hurried, and the perfection of ensemble which marked the first selection was not attained, yet one must give due credit to the sincerity and dramatic fervor of Mr. Davies' interpretation, and hasten to add that the recalls were almost as numerous as after the aria from "Jephthah."

The symphony was Raff's "Lenore," and it is not too much to say that often as it has been heard in Boston it has never been heard to such advantage as at this performance. It was one of those great successes through which the orchestral season of 1895-6 will be remembered as phenomenal. The present writer cannot rank the work quite as high as Raff's "Im Walde" symphony, yet readily concedes that it is the most popular of modern symphonies, containing enough of development to satisfy the musician and sufficient dramatic effect to excite anybody in spite of some parts which are not of symphonic dignity.

The first movement, which does not go unwarrantably far into the domain of tone-picturing, was finely worked up to its climax; and the oboe-playing here was especially excellent. The second movement, in which Raff sometimes gives the impression of being a close relative of Goldmark, was wonderfully shaded, the first horn deserving separate mention for artistic work, although the violins played like a set of Teutonic angels, and the flute, at the final appearance of the chief theme, did some excellent work. The coda, with its very extended organ-point and its constant monotony of kettle-drum, was very effectively performed. Of course, the march is always the popular point of the work, and it was excitingly given with all its piccolo flourishes, its rolls of drums, and its approaching crescendo and departing diminuendo, but the episode, the touching portion of the movement which portrays the unhappy heroine running from rank to rank of the returning regiment in a fruitless search for her soldier-lover, was the most notable part of this movement, and here the violins and 'cellos covered themselves with credit. The finale no longer makes one's flesh creep as it ought to, for the modern auditor has become accustomed to spectral horse shows and recalls the span handled by Mephistopheles in the "Damnation of Faust" sweepstakes, the black mare entered by Frau Holle in the Forest Symphony, the splendid exhibit from the Walkuere stables, and does not scare at any ghostly whimmeyings or sepulchral trottings. But the reminiscences of the preceding movements, introduced into this finale, are full of poetic charm, and the brilliancy of Mr. Paur's rending was sufficient to carry a much weaker work to success.

The concert ended with a superb performance of the "Academic Overture," one of the most genial works that Brahms ever achieved.

When Brahms received the honorary title of Doctor of Philosophy from the University of Breslau (we believe it was Breslau, although Deiters gives it as Bremen) he composed a grand Festival Overture upon three student-songs which are as familiar to every German graduate as "Fidlee" would be to any Harvard man; he did not make a mere potpourri, a medley overture, but he elaborated and interwove the themes with a contrapuntal art that no other composer of the present could ever hope to rival; in the blending of the diverse elements there is not a moment of dulness or dry formality, everything is as smuethlich as if it were a humble foundation Brahms has but followed the lead of great German composers from ancient days. The composers of Germany, much more than those of any other nation, cherished the folksong and built great classical works upon the melodies of the people. Bach used a Hassler love-song as the theme of the greatest chorales in the Passion Music. Luther took "Soldiers', Sailors' and Miners', and other Streetsongs," (Gassenhauer) for the foundation of some of the great works of the reformation. Weber built his opera of "Der Freischuetz" upon the same popular idea, and some of the simplest of the old folk-songs have come down to us, preserved as a fly might be preserved in amber, because of the rich counterpoint in which they have been enveloped. Besides the three great themes, "Wir hatten gebaut ein stattliches Haus," "Was kommt dort von der Hoeh," and "Gaudeamus Igitur," there are traces of another very dignified semi-national song, beginning which is only sung at the German students' Commers once a year, and then only with impressive ceremonies. With characteristic good taste, Brahms reserves the fiery "Gaudeamus Igitur," which Hanslick has called the "student's 'Marseillaise,'" for the climax, but what an amount of fun precedes it! How comically the bassoons (the clowns of the orchestra) intone "Was kommt dort von der Hoeh!" and how gloriously the trumpets ring out "Wir hatten gebaut!" Then there is a touch of muted horn (the ugliest tone-color of the orchestra), which hints that occasionally students' rejoicings are followed by Katzenjammer, but even "das graue Elend" is evanescent and the joyous memories are permanent.

Hoert, ich sing das Lied der Lieder!
Hoert es, meine Deutschen Brueder.

Only the German can fully appreciate and love this work as it should be appreciated and loved, but every one must recognize the great skill which underlies its mirth and the lofty climax which it reaches, and every one present must have apppreciated the clearness with which it was performed and must have been grateful for such a splendid representation of a side of Brahms' genius which is far too little understood among us.

Louis C. Elson.

Portland Advertiser
April 14

THE SYMPHONY PROGRAMME.

Are These Great Concerts to Continue in Portland?

Judging from the advance sale for the concert announced by the Boston symphony orchestra next Wednesday evening, the music-loving public of Portland and vicinity either do not realize the nature of the entertainment which is to be given them, or else they do not care for it. The Boston Symphony orchestra will give as complete a concert in every detail in Portland as it would give in New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, or in fact any of the cities it visits. The management does not lay great stress upon abnormal receipts, but it does expect an audience worthy of the standing of the orchestra. If such an audience cannot be obtained, the inference is obvious and further concerts will be abandoned. This is in no way meant as a threat, but is a simple statement of fact which every true music lover in this vicinity will both understand and appreciate.

The programme, with no exaggeration, is a superb one. The opening number, though unknown to the audience that will attend the concert next Wednesday evening, has the reputation of having made the most profound impression of any selection rendered by the orchestra this season, and has received the very marked compliment of a repetition within a few weeks of its first performance in the Boston, Cambridge and Providence series by the orchestra. Such a repetition has not been given more than half a dozen times in the entire fifteen years history of the orchestra. The selection thus honored is the Symphony No. 6 by the late Russian composer, Tschaikowsky, and is better known as the "Pathetic Symphony." It is almost impossible to describe in words the singular beauty of this work, and lack of space forbids repeating the flattering comment made by the press of other cities.

Miss Antoinette Szumowska, the soloist, is a most finished artist who has achieved marked success in several appearances with the orchestra this season. She is well known as the favorite pupil of the great pianist, Paderewski, and her playing will readily show to any who have listened to the great Polish virtuoso, the result of his teaching.

The last two selections on the programme are by Wagner, without whose name no modern concert programme is complete. Ordinarily Wagner selections are at a disadvantage on a concert programme because of the absence of stage accessories which are usually most essential to their proper presentatation; but the "Waldweben" or "Forest Sounds" from "Siegfried," one of the most wonderful illustrations of descriptive music ever written, loses none of its effectiveness when presented in concert form, and the same is true of the overture to "Rienzi" which will be a fitting close to as fine a concert as the orchestra has ever given.

The Musical Courier.
NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 15, 1896.

The program of the twenty-first Symphony concert, Mr. Paur conductor, was as follows:

Overture to Jessonda.....Spohr
Recitative, Deeper and Deeper Still, and aria, Waft Her, Angels, from Jephthah.....Händel
Symphony No. 5, in E major, Lenore.....Raff
Walther's Preislied, from Die Meistersinger.....Wagner
Akademische Fest-Ouverture, op. 80.....Brahms

No work was produced last evening for the first time, and yet the Jessonda overture was undoubtedly new to many of the audience. The opera itself is seldom heard in Germany; in 1894 it was given only six times in that country—in Cassel, Danzig and Hanover. The age is too nervous to enjoy the calm and the mellifluence of an opera by Spohr, but the Jessonda overture last night was not a bit hopelessly 1823 in the introduction; on the contrary, it was fresh and modern. Only the main body of the overture showed old-fashioned treatment, which, after all, was by no means disagreeable.

The dead ride fast, and so do symphonies. To-day Raff is the composer of one beautiful symphony, the Im Walde. Truly are there charming passages in the second movement, and the start of the first movement is impressive; but there is too much of Raff at his worst in this symphony and not enough of Raff at his best. Take the ending of the slow movement; it seems cheap and interminable. The sentiment, too, is inclined toward sentimentalism. Yes, it often falls into it. Pupils of Raff claim that he wished the march to be taken as a scherzo and at about double the tempo generally observed. They are not to be shaken in this statement. Why should not the experiment be tried? The march would the sooner be over. As for the spectral in the finale, it no longer excites wonder or consternation. The neighing of the horses may please lovers of imitative music—and this suggests the happy thought of Mr. Paur in paying tribute to the horse show. But it would have been better if he had given us the Ride of the Valkyries, or Saint-Saëns' Phaëton, or even Auber's overture to the Bronze Horse.

A stirring performance of Brahms' overture brought to close a concert that gave much pleasure, largely on account of the superb performance of the orchestra.

Mr. Davies sang the music by Händel most effectively. The recitative was declaimed in noble fashion, with breadth, authority, dramatic feeling, and, above all, with heroic tenderness. The air that followed displayed this admirable singer in his full glory. Here was true Händelian singing, as we imagine Händel himself wished it. For though this German composer was in the aria thoroughly Italianized, yet in his later works is there the expression, or at least the suggestion, of English blood. Händel, indeed, seems in some of his music to represent the Englishman in his highest development—courageous, determined, inspired by a belief in a power that is always ready to help England, tender in simple, manly fashion. In the air from Jephthah Händel strikes a still higher note; yet even here is this queer dash of English feeling. Nor is there anything to be said of Mr. Davies' singing of the air except to thank him most heartily for the generous exhibition of his natural gifts and acquired skill. In the air from Die Meistersinger he was not as successful, although he made a brave attempt. The trouble was that the song does not lie easily in his voice. The effort to make effect on the upper tones was too apparent. So it is pleasanter to remember his singing of the Händel music. I remember no finer singing of Händel in this city for several years. Admirable as were the voice and the art of Mr. Lloyd, he was apt to be phlegmatic when he should have been most emotional.

PHILIP HALE.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.
SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 12, 1896.
(Copyright 1896, Post Publishing Company.)

THE SYMPHONY.

For general excellence the Symphony concert of last night, the twenty-first, was no exception to what has come to be the rule, and the audience was more than uniformly enthusiastic than usual, due to the altogether delightful programme. The overture to "Jessonda," by Louis Spohr, was the first number. It has many beautiful phrases, and its several themes are skilfully and tunefully developed.

Ben Davies, whose singing gave such delight at the oratorio last Sunday, was next on the programme, giving the recitative, "Deeper and Deeper Still," and the air, "Waft Her, Angels," from Handel's "Jephthah." The recitative is of much dramatic strength, and Mr. Davies gave it in a broad, robust style.

Later in the evening he gave Walter's prize song from Wagner's "Meistersinger" in manly and tuneful style, and received therefor several recalls.

The symphony was Raff's No. 5, "Lenore," and throughout its four movements it was read grandly. The third movement, the march, was played really brilliantly and provoked much applause. The concert finished with Brahms's Academic Festival overture.

At next week's concert Mr. Georg Henschel will sing the scene and aria from "King Saul's Dream," by Dr. C. Herbert Parry, and the ballad, "Jung Deitrich," written by himself.

BATH, ME., APRIL 13, 1896

The Boston Symphony Orchestra In Portland.

For the past fourteen years, commencing in 1882 the second year of its existence, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has given concerts in Portland, excepting a break of four years from 1891 to 1895.

Next Wednesday evening this now famous organization will give its 23d concert in Portland and the 1396th since its founding, fifteen years ago. Appreciating the great value to the musical public of such a concert as this, special rates have been made by the railroad companies.

The opening number, the Symphony No. 6 by the famous Russian composer, Tschaikowsky, has been acknowledged wherever it has been performed this season as the most thrilling, intense and beautiful composition yet presented. Even the members of the orchestra are enthusiastic in speaking of it, one of the greatest compliments any composition can receive.

The second number on the programme is the solo selection, the Concerto for piano-forte No. 2 by Saint Saens, which will be played by Miss Antoinette Szumowska, the brilliant and gifted young Polish pianiste, who has appeared with marked success several times this season with the orchestra, and who is best known to the musical public as the favorite pupil of the eminent piano virtuoso, Paderewski.

In deference to the very general request in modern programmes for selections by Wagner. Mr. Paur has placed upon this programme the famous "Waldweben" from "Siegfried" and the ever popular Overture to "Rienzi."

Such a programme as this, by such an organization as the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at prices that prevail at all first class entertainments, should suffice to fill City Hall, Portland to the doors.

Portland Advertiser
EVENING, APRIL 14, 1896.

THE SYMPHONY PROGRAMME.

Are These Great Concerts to Continue in Portland?

Judging from the advance sale for the concert announced by the Boston symphony orchestra next Wednesday evening, the music-loving public of Portland and vicinity either do not realize the nature of the entertainment which is to be given them, or else they do not care for it. The Boston Symphony orchestra will give as complete a concert in every detail in Portland as it would give in New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, or in fact any of the cities it visits. The management does not lay great stress upon abnormal receipts, but it does expect an audience worthy of the standing of the orchestra. If such an audience cannot be obtained, the inference is obvious and further concerts will be abandoned. This is in no way meant as a threat, but is a simple statement of fact which every true music lover in this vicinity will both understand and appreciate.

The programme, with no exaggeration, is a superb one. The opening number, though unknown to the audience that will attend the concert next Wednesday evening, has the reputation of having made the most profound impression of any selection rendered by the orchestra this season, and has received the very marked compliment of a repetition within a few weeks of its first performance in the Boston, Cambridge and Providence series by the orchestra. Such a repetition has not been given more than half a dozen times in the entire fifteen years history of the orchestra. The selection thus honored is the Symphony No. 6 by the late Russian composer, Tschaikowsky, and is better known as the "Pathetic Symphony." It is almost impossible to describe in words the singular beauty of this work, and lack of space forbids repeating the flattering comment made by the press of other cities.

Miss Antoinette Szumowska, the soloist, is a most finished artist who has achieved marked success in several appearances with the orchestra this season. She is well known as the favorite pupil of the great pianist, Paderewski, and her playing will readily show to any who have listened to the great Polish virtuoso, the result of his teaching.

The last two selections on the programme are by Wagner, without whose name no modern concert programme is complete. Ordinarily Wagner selections are at a disadvantage on a concert programme because of the absence of stage accessories which are usually most essential to their proper presentatation; but the "Waldweben" or "Forest Sounds" from "Siegfried," one of the most wonderful illustrations of descriptive music ever written, loses none of its effectiveness when presented in concert form, and the same is true of the overture to "Rienzi" which will be a fitting close to as fine a concert as the orchestra has ever given.

[117]

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 13, 1896.

SYMPHONY

Concert—Mr. Davies in Two Widely Differing Selections.

The concert of Saturday began quietly enough with Spohr's overture to "Jessonda," crystal clear in its form and treatment, but formal even in its most portentous moments. It was read in a sedate manner as befitted its style, and if it presented nothing to grow excited over it was none the less enjoyable and was admirably played. A little of such music now and then may be valuable as an antidote against the modern dissonance-fever.

Mr. Ben Davies appeared in two selections of the most widely differing style. First he gave Handel's "Waft her, Angels," with a preceding recitative. He sang this magnificently, although occasionally he inclined towards exaggeration of shading; but his enunciation, his constant purity of intonation, his dramatic fervor, were things to grow enthusiastic over, and the audience did grow very demonstrative at the end of the number,—more so than at any previous concert, and far beyond the limit of the two recalls which seem to be the established courtesy at these concerts. The brilliant quality of Mr. Davies' high notes was never displayed to better advantage than upon this occasion. One must also give great credit to Mr. Paur and the orchestra for the accompaniment to the recitative, "Deeper and Deeper Still," for it is a most difficult task for a large orchestra to keep in time with a singer in such a free delivery as was given to this part of the number; the ensemble was admirable.

Mr. Davies' other number was Wagner's "Preis-lied," from "The Mastersingers." This did not seem so entirely effective as the Handelian number; in the first place it was sung in English, and any translation interferes with the close union of words and music which Wagner achieved. The end of this number was somewhat hurried, and the perfection of ensemble which marked the first selection was not attained, yet one must give due credit to the sincerity and dramatic fervor of Mr. Davies' interpretation, and hasten to add that the recalls were almost as numerous as after the aria from "Jephthah."

The symphony was Raff's "Lenore," and it is not too much to say that often as it has been heard in Boston it has never been heard to such advantage as at this performance. It was one of those great successes through which the orchestral season of 1895-6 will be remembered as phenomenal. The present writer cannot rank the work quite as high as Raff's "Im Walde" symphony, yet readily concedes that it is the most popular of modern symphonies, containing enough of development to satisfy the musician and sufficient dramatic effect to excite anybody in spite of some parts which are not of symphonic dignity.

The first movement, which does not go unwarrantably far into the domain of tone-picturing, was finely worked up to its climax, and the oboe-playing here was especially excellent. The second movement, in which Raff sometimes gives the impression of being a close relative of Goldmark, was wonderfully shaded, the first horn deserving separate mention for artistic work, although the violins played like a set of Teutonic angels, and the flute, at the final appearance of the chief theme, did some excellent work. The coda, with its very extended organ-point and its constant monotony of kettle-drum, was very effectively performed. Of course, the march is always the popular point of the work, and it was excitingly given with all its piccolo flourishes, its rolls of drums, and its approaching crescendo and departing diminuendo, but the episode, the touching portion of the movement which portrays the unhappy heroine running from rank to rank of the returning regiment in a fruitless search for her soldier-lover, was the most notable part of this movement, and here the violins and 'cellos covered themselves with credit. The finale no longer makes one's flesh creep as it ought to, for the modern auditor has become accustomed to spectral horse shows and recalls the span handled by Mephistopheles in the "Damnation of Faust" sweepstakes, the black mare entered by Frau Holle in the Forest Symphony, the splendid exhibit from the Walkuere stables, and does not scare at any ghostly whinneyings or sepulchral trettings. But the reminiscences of the preceding movements, introduced into this finale, are full of poetic charm, and the brilliancy of Mr. Paur's reading was sufficient to carry a much weaker work to success.

The concert ended with a superb performance of the "Academic Overture," one of the most genial works that Brahms ever achieved.

When Brahms received the honorary title of Doctor of Philosophy from the University of Breslau (we believe it was Breslau, although Deiters gives it as Bremen) he composed a grand Festival Overture upon three student-songs which are as familiar to every German graduate as "Upidee" would be to any Harvard man; he did not make a mere potpourri, a medley overture, but he elaborated and interwove the themes with a contrapuntal grace that no other composer of the present could ever hope to rival; in the blending of the diverse elements there is not a moment of dulness or dry formality, everything is as gemuethlich as if it were a

In building a classical work on such an humble foundation Brahms has but followed the lead of great German composers from ancient days. The composers of Germany, much more than those of any other nation, cherished the folksong and built great classical works upon the melodies of the people. Bach used a Hassler lovesong as the theme of the greatest chorales in the Passion Music. Luther took "Soldiers', Sailors' and Miners', and other Streetsongs," (Gassenhauer) for the foundation of some of the great works of the reformation, Weber built his opera of "Der Freischuetz" upon the same popular idea, and some of the simplest of the old folksongs have come down to us, preserved as a fly might be preserved in amber, because of the rich counterpoint in which they have been enveloped. Besides the three great themes, "Wir hatten gebaut ein stattliches Haus," "Was kommt dort von der Hoeh," and "Gaudeamus Igitur," there are traces of another very dignified semi-national song, beginning which is only sung at the German students' Commers once a year, and then only with impressive ceremonies. With characteristic good taste, Brahms reserves the fiery "Gaudeamus Igitur," which Hanslick has called the "student's 'Marseillaise,'" for the climax, but what an amount of fun precedes it! How comically the bassoons (the clowns of the orchestra) intone "Was kommt dort von der Hoeh!" and how gloriously the trumpets ring out "Wir hatten gebaut!" Then there is a touch of muted horn (the ugliest tone-color of the orchestra), which hints that occasionally students' rejoicings are followed by Katzenjammer, but even "das graue Elend" is evanescent and the joyous memories are permanent.

Hoert, ich sing 'das Lied der Lieder!
Hoert es, meine Deutschen Brueder.

Only the German can fully appreciate and love this work as it should be appreciated and loved, but every one must recognize the great skill which underlies its mirth and the lofty climax which it reaches, and every one present must have apppreciated the clearness with which it was performed and must have been grateful for such a splendid representation of a side of Brahms' genius which is far too little understood among us.

Louis C. Elson.

Portland Advertiser
April 14

THE SYMPHONY PROGRAMME.

Are These Great Concerts to Continue in Portland?

Judging from the advance sale for the concert announced by the Boston symphony orchestra next Wednesday evening, the music-loving public of Portland and vicinity either do not realize the nature of the entertainment which is to be given them, or else they do not care for it. The Boston Symphony orchestra will give as complete a concert in every detail in Portland as it would give in New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, or in fact any of the cities it visits. The management does not lay great stress upon abnormal receipts, but it does expect an audience worthy of the standing of the orchestra. If such an audience cannot be obtained, the inference is obvious and further concerts will be abandoned. This is in no way meant as a threat, but is a simple statement of fact which every true music lover in this vicinity will both understand and appreciate.

The programme, with no exaggeration, is a superb one. The opening number, though unknown to the audience that will attend the concert next Wednesday evening, has the reputation of having made the most profound impression of any selection rendered by the orchestra this season, and has received the very marked compliment of a repetition within a few weeks of its first performance in the Boston, Cambridge and Providence series by the orchestra. Such a repetition has not been given more than half a dozen times in the entire fifteen years history of the orchestra. The selection thus honored is the Symphony No. 6 by the late Russian composer, Tschaikowsky, and is better known as the "Pathetic Symphony." It is almost impossible to describe in words the singular beauty of this work, and lack of space forbids repeating the flattering comment made by the press of other cities.

Miss Antoinette Szumowska, the soloist, is a most finished artist who has achieved marked success in several appearances with the orchestra this season. She is well known as the favorite pupil of the great pianist, Paderewski, and her playing will readily show to any who have listened to the great Polish virtuoso, the result of his teaching.

The last two selections on the programme are by Wagner, without whose name no modern concert programme is complete. Ordinarily Wagner selections are at a disadvantage on a concert programme because of the absence of stage accessories which are usually most essential to their proper presentatation; but the "Waldweben" or "Forest Sounds" from "Siegfried," one of the most wonderful illustrations of descriptive music ever written, loses none of its effectiveness when presented in concert form, and the same is true of the overture to "Rienzi" which will be a fitting close to as fine a concert as the orchestra has ever given.

The Musical Courier.
NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 15, 1896.

The program of the twenty-first Symphony concert, Mr. Paur conductor, was as follows:

Overture to Jessonda.....Spohr
Recitative, Deeper and Deeper Still, and aria, Waft Her, Angels, from Jephthah .....Händel
Symphony No. 5, in E major, Lenore.....Raff
Walther's Preislied, from Die Meistersinger.....Wagner
Akademische Fest-Ouverture, op. 80.....Brahms

No work was produced last evening for the first time, and yet the Jessonda overture was undoubtedly new to many of the audience. The opera itself is seldom heard in Germany; in 1894 it was given only six times in that country—in Cassel, Danzig and Hanover. The age is too nervous to enjoy the calm and the mellifluence of an opera by Spohr, but the Jessonda overture last night was not a bit hopelessly 1823 in the introduction; on the contrary, it was fresh and modern. Only the main body of the overture showed old-fashioned treatment, which, after all, was by no means disagreeable.

The dead ride fast, and so do symphonies. To-day Raff is the composer of one beautiful symphony, the Im Walde. Truly are there charming passages in the second movement, and the start of the first movement is impressive; but there is too much of Raff at his worst in this symphony and not enough of Raff at his best. Take the ending of the slow movement; it seems cheap and interminable. The sentiment, too, is inclined toward sentimentalism. Yes, it often falls into it. Pupils of Raff claim that he wished the march to be taken as a scherzo and at about double the tempo generally observed. They are not to be shaken in this statement. Why should not the experiment be tried? The march would the sooner be over. As for the spectral in the finale, it no longer excites wonder or consternation. The neighing of the horses may please lovers of imitative music—and this suggests the happy thought of Mr. Paur in paying tribute to the horse show. But it would have been better if he had given us the Ride of the Valkyries, or Saint-Saëns' Phaëton, or even Auber's overture to the Bronze Horse.

A stirring performance of Brahms' overture brought to close a concert that gave much pleasure, largely on account of the superb performance of the orchestra.

Mr. Davies sang the music by Händel most effectively. The recitative was declaimed in noble fashion, with breadth, authority, dramatic feeling, and, above all, with heroic tenderness. The air that followed displayed this admirable singer in his full glory. Here was true Händelian singing, as we imagine Händel himself wished it. For though this German composer was in the aria thoroughly Italianized, yet in his later works is there the expression, or at least the suggestion, of English blood. Händel, indeed, seems in some of his music to represent the Englishman in his highest development—courageous, determined, inspired by a belief in a power that is always ready to help England, tender in simple, manly fashion. In the air from Jephthah Händel strikes a still higher note; yet even here is this queer dash of English feeling. Nor is there anything to be said of Mr. Davies' singing of the air except to thank him most heartily for the generous exhibition of his natural gifts and acquired skill. In the air from Die Meistersinger he was not as successful, although he made a brave attempt. The trouble was that the song does not lie easily in his voice. The effort to make effect on the upper tones was too apparent. So it is pleasanter to remember his singing of the Händel music. I remember no finer singing of Händel in this city for several years. Admirable as were the voice and the art of Mr. Lloyd, he was apt to be phlegmatic when he should have been most emotional.

Philip Hale.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.
SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 12, 1896.
(Copyright 1896, Post Publishing Company.)

THE SYMPHONY.

For general excellence the Symphony concert of last night, the twenty-first, was no exception to what has come to be the rule, and the audience was more than uniformly enthusiastic than usual, due to the altogether delightful programme. The overture to "Jessonda," by Louis Spohr, was the first number. It has many beautiful phrases, and its several themes are skilfully and tunefully developed.

Ben Davies, whose singing gave such delight at the oratorio last Sunday, was next on the programme, giving the recitative, "Deeper and Deeper Still," and the air, "Waft Her, Angels," from Handel's "Jephthah." The recitative is of much dramatic strength, and Mr. Davies gave it in a broad, robust style.

Later in the evening he gave Walter's prize song from Wagner's "Meistersinger" in manly and tuneful style, and received therefor several recalls.

The symphony was Raff's No. 5, "Lenore," and throughout its four movements it was read grandly. The third movement, the march, was played really brilliantly and provoked much applause. The concert finished with Brahms's Academic Festival overture.

At next week's concert Mr. Georg Henschel will sing the scene and aria from "King Saul's Dream," by Dr. C. Herbert Parry, and the ballad, "Jung Deitrich," written by himself.

THE BATH DAILY TIMES.
BATH, ME., APRIL 13, 1896

The Boston Symphony Orchestra In Portland.

For the past fourteen years, commencing in 1882 the second year of its existence, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has given concerts in Portland, excepting a break of four years from 1891 to 1895.

Next Wednesday evening this now famous organization will give its 23d concert in Portland and the 1396th since its founding, fifteen years ago. Appreciating the great value to the musical public of such a concert as this, special rates have been made by the railroad companies.

The opening number, the Symphony No. 6 by the famous Russian composer, Tschaikowsky, has been acknowledged wherever it has been performed this season as the most thrilling, intense and beautiful composition yet presented. Even the members of the orchestra are enthusiastic in speaking of it, one of the greatest compliments any composition can receive.

The second number on the programme is the solo selection, the Concerto for piano-forte No. 2 by Saint Saens, which will be played by Miss Antoinette Szumowska, the brilliant and gifted young Polish pianiste, who has appeared with marked success several times this season with the orchestra, and who is best known to the musical public as the favorite pupil of the eminent piano virtuoso, Paderewski.

In deference to the very general request in modern programmes for selections by Wagner. Mr. Paur has placed upon this programme the famous "Waldweben" from "Siegfried" and the ever popular Overture to "Rienzi."

Such a programme as this, by such an organization as the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at prices that prevail at all first class entertainments, should suffice to fill City Hall, Portland to the doors.

Portland Advertiser
EVENING, APRIL 14, 1896.

THE SYMPHONY PROGRAMME.

Are These Great Concerts to Continue in Portland?

Judging from the advance sale for the concert announced by the Boston symphony orchestra next Wednesday evening, the music-loving public of Portland and vicinity either do not realize the nature of the entertainment which is to be given them, or else they do not care for it. The Boston Symphony orchestra will give as complete a concert in every detail in Portland as it would give in New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, or in fact any of the cities it visits. The management does not lay great stress upon abnormal receipts, but it does expect an audience worthy of the standing of the orchestra. If such an audience cannot be obtained, the inference is obvious and further concerts will be abandoned. This is in no way meant as a threat, but is a simple statement of fact which every true music lover in this vicinity will both understand and appreciate.

The programme, with no exaggeration, is a superb one. The opening number, though unknown to the audience that will attend the concert next Wednesday evening, has the reputation of having made the most profound impression of any selection rendered by the orchestra this season, and has received the very marked compliment of a repetition within a few weeks of its first performance in the Boston, Cambridge and Providence series by the orchestra. Such a repetition has not been given more than half a dozen times in the entire fifteen years history of the orchestra. The selection thus honored is the Symphony No. 6 by the late Russian composer, Tschaikowsky, and is better known as the "Pathetic Symphony." It is almost impossible to describe in words the singular beauty of this work, and lack of space forbids repeating the flattering comment made by the press of other cities.

Miss Antoinette Szumowska, the soloist, is a most finished artist who has achieved marked success in several appearances with the orchestra this season. She is well known as the favorite pupil of the great pianist, Paderewski, and her playing will readily show to any who have listened to the great Polish virtuoso, the result of his teaching.

The last two selections on the programme are by Wagner, without whose name no modern concert programme is complete. Ordinarily Wagner selections are at a disadvantage on a concert programme because of the absence of stage accessories which are usually most essential to their proper presentatation; but the "Waldweben" or "Forest Sounds" from "Siegfried," one of the most wonderful illustrations of descriptive music ever written, loses none of its effectiveness when presented in concert form, and the same is true of the overture to "Rienzi" which will be a fitting close to as fine a concert as the orchestra has ever given.

[117]

APRIL 15, 1896.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Great Treat to be Given Music-Loving People This Evening.

Judging from the advance sale for the concert announced by the Boston Symphony orchestra next Wednesday evening, the music-loving public of Portland and vicinity either do not realize the nature of the entertainment which is to be given them, or else they do not care for it. The Boston Symphony orchestra will give as complete a concert in every detail in Portland as it would give in New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, or in fact any of the cities it visits. The management does not lay great stress upon abnormal receipts bnt it does expect an audience worthy of the standing of the orchestra. If such an audience cannot be obtained the inference is obvious and further concerts will be abandoned. This is in no way meant as a threat, but is a simple statement of facts which every true music lover in this vicinity will both understand and appreciate.

The programme, with no exaggeration, is a superb one. The opening number, though unknown to the audience that will attend the concert next Wednesday evening, has received the very marked compliment of a repetition within a few weeks of its first performance in the Boston, Cambridge and Providence series by the orchestra. The selection thus honored is the Symphony No. 6 by the late Russian composer, Tschaikowski, and is known as the "Pathetic Symphony."

Miss Antoinette Szumowska, the soloist is a most finished artist who has achieved marked success in several appearances with the orchestra this season. She is well known as the favorite pupil of the great pianist, Paderewski, and her playing will readily show to any who have listened to the great Polish virtuoso, the result of his teaching.

Whig and Courier.

BY BOUTELLE BROTHERS.

All business letters should be addressed to Boutelle Brothers, and communications intended for publication should be addressed: "Editor of Whig and Courier."

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 15, 1896.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Judging from the advance sale for the concert announced by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this evening, the music-loving public of Portland and vicinity either do not realize the nature of the entertainment which is to be given them, or else they do not care for it. The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give as complete a concert in every detail in Portland as it would give in New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, or in fact any of the cities it visits. The management does not lay great stress upon abnormal receipts, but it does expect an audience worthy of the standing of the orchestra. If such an audience cannot be obtained, the inference is obvious and further concerts will be abandoned. The programme, with no exaggeration, is a superb one.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 19.

The Symphony Concert.

The one novelty at the symphony concert last evening, was Dr. H. C. Parry's scene and aria "King Saul Dream" sung by Mr. Georg Henchel. The work was sung with dramatic fervor but it was hardly worth the singing, for it is a work as gruesome as a nightmare and as empty as an exhausted jar of the air pump. A dull foolish wearisome work even duller than Mr. Henschel's ballad of "Jung Dietrich." The orchestra under Mr. Paur played with rare sprit and brilliancy.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR. VOL. XCIX., NO. 110.

SUNDAY, APRIL 19, 1896.

MR. HENSCHEL IN FINE VOICE.

Symphony Soloist Received a Cordial Reception.

His Phrasing of Parry's Music Evidenced Artistic Judgment—Concert, However, Was the Least Interesting of the Series—Work of Orchestra Especially Praiseworthy.

Last evening's selections for the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall were:

Overture, "King Stephen".....Beethoven
Scene and aria, "King Stephen's Dream"
Dr. C. H. Parry
Three movements from symphony, "Romeo and Juliet".....Berlioz
Funeral march.....Schubert
Ballad, "Jung Dietrich".....Henschel
Huldigung's march.....Wagner

Mr. Georg Henschel was the soloist.

The programme was dispiriting. It would have proved so even on a bracing winter night, and it was warm to the point of enervation last evening. The selections were, on the whole, lugubrious in character. The first incentive to gloom was W. Parry's well written and declamatorily dramatic, but uninteresting, scene and aria, which was followed by Berlioz's elaborate tone picture of Romeo's sadness, "andante malincolico." The ball music that came after broke the mournful spell for a time, and then came the long drawn out balcony scene adagio. There was another break of subshine through the clouds with the ethereal "Queen Mab" scherzo, after which depression was again restored by Liszt's orchestral version of Schubert's funeral march in E flat minor, succeeded in turn by successful incentive to "the blues" in Mr. Henschel's solemn ballad.

There was too much of the sombre and of the spirit-wearying to be listened to with wholly cheering emotion in one concert. Mr. Henschel declaimed Parry's music with all the effectiveness that was possible, phrasing it finely and emphasizing its varying expressions with his unerring artistic judgment, but though it is a musicianly piece of workmanship, large in style and admirably scored, and even marked by a certain vein of strong individuality, it is unimpressive and ineffective. His own ballad cannot be justly ranked among his most successful and most attractive compositions, and is moreover monotonous in effect.

One listens patiently through three stanzas waiting for a powerful culmination in the fourth and last of them, but is disappointed, for when the flying Hun reveals that the secret hidden under his mantle is the son of his slaughtered monarch and now the King of the Goths, it is in a tame anti-climax. In this song the composer accompanied himself on the piano. Mr. Henschel's reception was one of very great cordiality, and after his first contribution to the concert he had three recalls and after the second two.

The three movements of the Berlioz symphony were "Romeo's Sadness and the Ball at Capulet's House," "The Balcony Scene" and "Queen Mab." Of their performance, it is possible to write in superlatives only. The strings were at their very best throughout, especially in the warmer cantabile of the garden scene, and in the delicacy, precision and grace of their work in the scherzo, which still remains the most wonderful bit of orchestral fairy music that has ever been written. The "King Stephen" overture, perhaps the weakest of all Beethoven's works in its class, was given an interpretation that brought out all that the music had to say, and the coda was given with brilliant impetuosity. But the concert was a dull one, and the least interesting of the season's series.

The programme for next Saturday is: Symphony No. 7, in A, Beethoven; symphonic poem, "Vysehrad," Smetana (first time); concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, Liszt, "Invitation to the Dance," Weber-Berlioz. Mr. Carl Baermann is to be the soloist.

SUNDAY, APRIL 19, 1896.

Twenty-second Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall Last Evening—Mr. Georg Henschel an Uninteresting Soloist.

The program of the 22d symphony concert, Mr. Emil Paur, conductor, was as follows:

Overture to "King Stephen".....Beethoven
Scene and aria, "King Saul's Dream"..Parry (First time.)
Three movements from the "Romeo and Juliet" Symphony.....Berlioz
Romeo alone; grand fete at the house of Capulet.
Balcony scene.
Queen Mab, scherzo.
Funeral march, in E flat minor....Schubert (Scored for orchestra by Liszt.)
Ballad, "Jung Dietrich".....Henschel (With piano accompaniment.)
March of Homage.....Wagner

For no good reason whatever, this dull, and hopelessly old-fashioned overture of Beethoven reminds me of the song in "Othello." To be sure there were King Stephens in Hungary just as there was a King Stephen in England, but there is no musical association between the monarchs; nevertheless the loud calls to attention and the presto that is the main body of the overture suggest grotesquely, incongruously, flippantly;

"King Stephen was a worthy peer,
His breeches cost him but a crown."

This overture is worthy, no doubt, for was it not written by Beethoven? Yes, oh fetishist, but Beethoven, as other great men, had dreary moments; and the dreary moments of great men are unutterably dreary. The dullness of a hum-drum citizen does not vex you; you are prepared for it; you expect nothing better. When a genius sinks not only to earth, but well into the earth, then is there a sense of personal disappointment that irritates. Do you say the overture is well made? So in all probability were the breeches worn by the august monarch.

* * *

The portions of the "Romeo and Juliet' music played last evening are among the greatest, the most complete exhibits made by Berlioz. Strip yourself of the memories connected with the work, the thought of Miss Smithson, the passion of the composer for the dramatist as well as the play-actress, the hysterical account given by Berlioz, and concentrate your mind on the music itself; marvelous music at the time it was written, it is still beautiful, brilliant, imaginative, noble. The ball music of Gounod might serve for the début of the daughter of a wealthy grocer; it is, indeed, a trifling, foolish banquet; but the sounds of revelry that come to the ears of Berlioz's Romeo are worthy of the dazzling beauty of Verona. The adagio is the night of the large few stars, the mad, naked summer night sung by Walt Whitman; and on such a night the doomed lovers exchange their vows, and pretty oaths, and rapturous kisses. I know of few musical compositions that so completely and at once create an atmosphere which fills a room and removes the thought of electric lights, and men in evening dress performing on instruments, and another man in evening dress making motions with a stick. The first measures of this wondrous adagio sound, and there is Verona; the night is balmy, conniving; and Romeo is in Juliet's arms. As for the scherzo, all fairy music seems plantigrade and galumphing in comparison with it.

* * *

If Mr. Paur had only omitted the funeral march conceived in sorrow and brought forth in lamentation. Personal enemies should be buried to such strains; for then is there no possible excuse for emotion on the way to the cemetery. Schubert and Liszt together are for once doubly tedious. And then the march is so long!

* * *

Mr. Henschel introduced to this city an extract from Dr. Parry's "King Saul," an oratorio in four acts, which was produced at the Birmingham Festival Oct. 3, 1894, when Mr. Henschel took the part of Saul. The scene is from the third act. Saul and his men, weary with pursuing David, sleep in a cave, when a dream troubles the King. "A terrible and mocking spirit came to taunt him with news that David had entered the cave while he lay helpless, and yet had spared his life."

Dr. Parry is a profoundly learned Englishman, who spins counterpoint as a spider spins his web. He is an accomplished master of all technical devices. He is also profoundly dry. In this long-winded scene, declaimed by Mr. Henschel in his most Henschelian manner, there is not one spark of spontaneity, there is not one musical thought that appeals to the heart or the imagination. The scene is the laborious work of a musician-mechanic.

Mr. Henschel's ballad, "Jung Dietrich," is, also, alas, without imagination. There is no dramatic touch, there is no climax. Nor was the singer fortunate in presenting his little child. His intonation was not always pure, and he seemed to be aware of the hopelessness of the task set for him.

PHILIP HALE.

SUNDAY, APRIL 19, 1896.

Echoes from Yesterday's Symphony Concert.

"Faust" at the Castle Sq—"Wizard of the Nile" at the Museum.

Barnet's New Burlesque—Varied Harmonic Happenings.

The program for the Symphony concert in Music hall last night was:

Beethoven, Overture to "King Stephen."
Dr Charles Hubert Parry, scene and aria, "King Saul's Dream" (first time).
Berlioz, first three movements from the "Romeo and Juliet" symphony.
Schubert, Funeral March, in E flat minor.
Georg Henschel, ballad, "Jung Dietrich." (with pianoforte accompaniment.)
Wagner, ...March of Homage
Soloist, Mr Georg Henschel.

The concert was of considerable variety, although the program was altogether too long, and it was plain before it was finished that most of the audience were tired. Many went before the last number.

General interest was felt in Mr Henschel's appearance, as this is the first time he has sung alone in Boston this spring. A desire to hear Dr Parry's composition also attracted many people to the concert. Dr Parry's "Judith" is well known here, and much of his church music has been sung.

The recitative from "King Saul's Dream," sung by Mr Henschel yesterday, is very dramatic and interesting, although there is nothing strikingly original in the composition. Mr Henschel himself hardly came up to expectations. In his middle register his voice was smooth and sonorous, but in the upper and lower notes it sounded harsh. He seemed to be straining every nerve most of the time to be heard above the orchestra, which made too much noise and forced his voice so that at the end of the aria he was somewhat hoarse. Still, he sang with feeling, expression and dramatic fire. In his ballad he was more pleasing.

The orchestra did some things very well, but in others the playing was not as smooth as some we have heard in other days. It would be well to train the violins in time. Yesterday both the firsts and seconds lost the beat several times.

The Beethoven overture was played in a broad, free style, which was, on the whole, satisfactory, although the time was ragged in one or two spots, and once the violins seemed about to break away from their fellow-players. Fortunately they were brought back.

The Romeo and Juliet symphony was well done. The passionate, subdued music of the second movement, which describes the balcony scene of the old love story, was played in an entirely satisfactory way, and the Queen Mab movement, with its scherzo time, brought forth warm applause from a rather unresponsive audience.

The familiar Schubert funeral march was given a good performance, and the Wagner selection, too, although by the time the latter was reached most people were too tired to listen with much attention.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 19, 1896.

The twenty-second Symphony programme was a standard one in its orchestral numbers. At its head stood the "King Stephen" overture, whose first sequence of four full chords proclaims Beethoven as its author, and whose two movements, quaintly gay and stirringly brilliant by turns, maintain the truth of that announcement. Then followed three parts or Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" symphony—that which represents Romeo in solitude and passes into a picture of the Capulet festival, the Balcony Scene and the Queen Mab scherzo. After these came Liszt's rich and broad and yet thoroughly respectful and considerable orchestration of Schubert's funeral march in E-flat minor, and then Wagner's "Homage" march ended the concert.

The performance of these things was in all respects fine and adapted to the character of each, particular virtuosity and discrimination being shown in the Berlioz music, while great power was obtained without harshness for the Wagner. The Beethoven had due freedom and simplicity and the Schubert was smooth and calm, taking even its few strong climaxes gravely.

Mr. Henschel sang twice. His first selection was "King Saul's Dream," by the English composer, Dr. Charles Hubert Parry. Being entirely unknown to the audience, there was of course not a word about it in the programme-pamphlet which has been chiefly occupied this season with the sectional publication of what appear to be superficial text-books of musical history. The composition, which was specified as a scene and aria, is prettily and skilfully put together, and its orchestral development especially, from the present prelude for a solo viola, is commendable. But there is no particular effect of originality or power in the thing. Later Mr. Henschel sang to his own piano accompaniment his "Young Dietrich" ballad, which also pleasd and got him a recall, but aroused no enthusiasm, being neither forceful nor resplendent enough at its close for the spirit of the text.

At the next concert the audience will have the advantage of hearing Mr. Carl Baermann play Liszt's second pianoforte concerto. The other pieces will be Beethoven's seventh symphony, Berlioz's orchestration of Weber's "Invitation to the Dance," and Smetana's symphonic poem, "Vysehrad," to be played for the first time here.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

[118]

LEWISTON DAILY SUN.
APRIL 15, 1896.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Great Treat to be Given Music-Loving People This Evening.

Judging from the advance sale for the concert announced by the Boston Symphony orchestra next Wednesday evening, the music-loving public of Portland and vicinity either do not realize the nature of the entertainment which is to be given them, or else they do not care for it. The Boston Symphony orchestra will give as complete a concert in every detail in Portland as it would give in New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, or in fact any of the cities it visits. The management does not lay great stress upon abnormal receipts bnt it does expect an audience worthy of the standing of the orchestra. If such an audience cannot be obtained the inference is obvious and further concerts will be abandoned. This is in no way meant as a threat, but is a simple statement of facts which every true music lover in this vicinity will both understand and appreciate.

The programme, with no exaggeration, is a superb one. The opening number, though unknown to the audience that will attend the concert next Wednesday evening, has received the very marked compliment of a repetition within a few weeks of its first performance in the Boston, Cambridge and Providence series by the orchestra. The selection thus honored is the Symphony No. 6 by the late Russian composer, Tschaikowski, and is known as the "Pathetic Symphony."

Miss Antoinette Szumowska, the soloist is a most finished artist who has achieved marked success in several appearances with the orchestra this season. She is well known as the favorite pdpil of the great pianist, Paderewski, and her playing will readily show to any who have listened to the great Polish virtuoso, the result of his teaching.

Whig and Courier.

BY BOUTELLE BROTHERS.

All business letters should be addressed to Boutelle Brothers, and communications intended for publication should be addressed: "Editor of Whig and Courier."

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 15, 1896.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Judging from the advance sale for the concert announced by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this evening, the music-loving public of Portland and vicinity either do not realize the nature of the entertainment which is to be given them, or else they do not care for it. The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give as complete a concert in every detail in Portland as it would give in New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, or in fact any of the cities it visits. The management does not lay great stress upon abnormal receipts, but it does expect an audience worthy of the standing of the orchestra. If such an audience cannot be obtained, the inference is obvious and further concerts will be abandoned. The programme, with no exaggeration, is a superb one.

Gazette.

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 19.

The Symphony Concert.

The one novelty at the symphony concert last evening, was Dr. H. C. Parry's scene and aria "King Saul Dream" sung by Mr. Georg Henchel. The work was sung with dramatic fervor but it was hardly worth the singing, for it is a work as gruesome as a nightmare and as empty as an exhausted jar of the air pump. A dull foolish wearisome work even duller than Mr. Henschel's ballad of "Jung Dietrich." The orchestra under Mr. Paur played with rare sprit and brilliancy.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCIX., NO. 110.

SUNDAY, APRIL 19, 1896.

MR. HENSCHEL IN FINE VOICE.

Symphony Soloist Received a Cordial Reception.

His Phrasing of Parry's Music Evidenced Artistic Judgment—Concert, However, Was the Least Interesting of the Series—Work of Orchestra Especially Praiseworthy.

Last evening's selections for the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall were:

Overture, "King Stephen".....Beethoven
Scene and aria, "King Stephen's Dream"
Dr. C. H. Parry
Three movements from Symphony, "Romeo and Juliet".....Berlioz
Funeral march.....Schubert
Ballad, "Jung Dietrich".....Henschel
Huldigung's march.....Wagner

Mr. Georg Henschel was the soloist.

The programme was dispiriting. It would have proved so even on a bracing winter night, and it was warm to the point of enervation last evening. The selections were, on the whole, lugubrious in character. The first incentive to gloom was W. Parry's well written and declamatorily dramatic, but uninteresting, scene and aria, which was followed by Berlioz's elaborate tone picture of Romeo's sadness, "andante malincolico." The ball music that came after broke the mournful spell for a time,and then came the long drawn out balcony scene adagio. There was another break of sunshine through the clouds with the ethereal "Queen Mab" scherzo, after which depression was again restored by Liszt's orchestral version of Schubert's funeral march in E flat minor, succeeded in turn by successful incentive to "the blues" in Mr. Henschel's solemn ballad.

There was too much of the sombre and of the spirit-wearying to be listened to with wholly cheering emotion in one concert. Mr. Henschel declaimed Parry's music with all the effectiveness that was possible, phrasing it finely and emphasizing its varying expressions with his unerring artistic judgment, but though it is a musicianly piece of workmanship, large in style and admirably scored, and even marked by a certain vein of strong individuality, it is unimpressive and ineffective. His own ballad cannot be justly ranked among his most successful and most attractive compositions, and is moreover monotonous in effect.

One listens patiently through three stanzas waiting for a powerful culmination in the fourth and last of them, but is disappointed, for when the flying Hun reveals that the secret hidden under his mantle is the son of his slaughtered monarch and now the King of the Goths, it is in a tame anti-climax. In this song the composer accompanied himself on the piano. Mr. Henschel's reception was one of very great cordiality, and after his first contribution to the concert he had three recalls and after the second two.

The three movements of the Berlioz symphony were "Romeo's Sadness and the Ball at Capulet's House," "The Balcony Scene" and "Queen Mab." Of their performance, it is possible to write in superlatives only. The strings were at their very best throughout, especially in the warmer cantabile of the garden scene, and in the delicacy, precision and grace of their work in the scherzo, which still remains the most wonderful bit of orchestral fairy music that has ever been written. The "King Stephen" overture, perhaps the weakest of all Beethoven's works in its class, was given an interpretation that brought out all that the music had to say, and the coda was given with brilliant impetuosity. But the concert was a dull one, and the least interesting of the season's series.

The programme for next Saturday is: Symphony No. 7, in A, Beethoven; symphonic poem, "Vysehrad," Smetana (first time); concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, Liszt, "Invitation to the Dance," Weber-Berlioz. Mr. Carl Baermann is to be the soloist.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, APRIL 19, 1896.

Twenty-second Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall Last Evening—Mr. Georg Henschel an Uninteresting Soloist.

The program of the 22d symphony concert, Mr. Emil Paur, conductor, was as follows:

Overture to "King Stephen".....Beethoven
Scene and aria, "King Saul's Dream"..Parry (First time.)
Three movements from the "Romeo and Juliet" Symphony.....Berlioz
Romeo alone; grand fete at the house of Capulet.
Balcony scene.
Queen Mab, scherzo.
Funeral march, in E flat minor....Schubert (Scored for orchestra by Liszt.)
Ballad, "Jung Dietrich".....Henschel (With piano accompaniment.)
March of Homage.....Wagner

For no good reason whatever, this dull, and hopelessly old-fashioned overture of Beethoven reminds me of the song in "Othello." To be sure there were King Stephens in Hungary just as there was a King Stephen in England, but there is no musical association between the monarchs; nevertheless the loud calls to attention and the presto that is the main body of the overture suggest grotesquely, incongruously, flippantly,

"King Stephen was a worthy peer,
His breeches cost him but a crown."

This overture is worthy, no doubt, for was it not written by Beethoven? Yes, oh fetishist, but Beethoven, as other great men, had dreary moments; and the dreary momehts of great men are unutterably dreary. The dullness of a hum-drum citizen does not vex you; you are prepared for it; you expect nothing better. When a genius sinks not only to earth, but well into the earth, then is there a sense of personal disappointment that irritates. Do you say the overture is well made? So in all probability were the breeches worn by the august monarch.

***

The portions of the "Romeo and Juliet' music played last evening are among the greatest, the most complete exhibits made by Berlioz. Strip yourself of the memories connected with the work, the thought of Miss Smithson, the passion of the composer for the dramatist as well as the play-actress, the hysterical account given by Berlioz, and concentrate your mind on the music itself; marvelous music at the time it was written, it is still beautiful, brilliant, imaginative, noble. The ball music of Gounod might serve for the début of the daughter of a wealthy grocer; it is, indeed, a trifling, foolish banquet; but the sounds of revelry that come to the ears of Berlioz's Romeo are worthy of the dazzling beauty of Verona. The adagio is the night of the large few stars, the mad, naked summer night sung by Walt Whitman; and on such a night the doomed lovers exchange their vows, and pretty oaths, and rapturous kisses. I know of few musical compositions that so completely and at once create an atmosphere which fills a room and removes the thought of electric lights, and men in evening dress performing on instruments, and another man in evening dress making motions with a stick. The first measures of this wondrous adagio sound, and there is Verona; the night is balmy, conniving; and Romeo is in Juliet's arms. As for the scherzo, all fairy music seems plantigrade and galumphing in comparison with it.

***

If Mr. Paur had only omitted the funeral march conceived in sorrow and brought forth in lamentation. Personal enemies should be buried to such strains; for then is there no possible excuse for emotion on the way to the cemetery. Schubert and Liszt together are for once doubly tedious. And then the march is so long!

***

Mr. Henschel introduced to this city an extract from Dr. Parry's "King Saul," an oratorio in four acts, which was produced at the Birmingham Festival Oct. 3, 1894, when Mr. Henschel took the part of Saul. The scene is from the third act. Saul and his men, weary with pursuing David, sleep in a cave, when a dream troubles the King. "A terrible and mocking spirit came to taunt him with news that David had entered the cave while he lay helpless, and yet had spared his life."

Dr. Parry is a profoundly learned Englishman, who spins counterpoint as a spider spins his web. He is an accomplished master of all technical devices. He is also profoundly dry. In this long-winded scene, declaimed by Mr. Henschel in his most Henschelian manner, there is not one spark of spontaneity, there is not one musical thought that appeals to the heart or the imagination. The scene is the laborious work of a musician-mechanic.

Mr. Henschel's ballad, "Jung Dietrich," is, also, alas, without imagination. There is no dramatic touch, there is no climax. Nor was the singer fortunate in presenting his little child. His intonation was not always pure, and he seemed to be aware of the hopelessness of the task set for him.

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, APRIL 19, 1896.

Echoes from Yesterday's Symphony Concert.

"Faust" at the Castle Sq—"Wizard of the Nile" at the Museum.

Barnet's New Burlesque—Varied Harmonic Happenings.

The program for the Symphony concert in Music hall last night was:

Beethoven, Overture to "King Stephen."
Dr Charles Hubert Parry, scene and aria, "King Saul's Dream" (first time).
Berlioz, first three movements from the "Romeo and Juliet" symphony.
Schubert, Funeral March, in E flat minor.
Georg Henschel, ballad, "Jung Dietrich." (with pianoforte accompaniment.)
Wagner, ...March of Homage
Soloist, Mr Georg Henschel.

The concert was of considerable variety, although the program was altogether too long, and it was plain before it was finished that most of the audience were tired. Many went before the last number.

General interest was felt in Mr Henschel's appearance, as this is the first time he has sung alone in Boston this spring. A desire to hear Dr Parry's composition also attracted many people to the concert. Dr Parry's "Judith" is well known here, and much of his church music has been sung.

The recitative from "King Saul's Dream," sung by Mr Henschel yesterday, is very dramatic and interesting, although there is nothing strikingly original in the composition. Mr Henschel himself hardly came up to expectations. In his middle register his voice was smooth and sonorous, but in the upper and lower notes it sounded harsh. He seemed to be straining every nerve most of the time to be heard above the orchestra, which made too much noise and forced his voice so that at the end of the aria he was somewhat hoarse. Still, he sang with feeling, expression and dramatic fire. In his ballad he was more pleasing.

The orchestra did some things very well, but in others the playing was not as smooth as some we have heard in other days. It would be well to train the violins in time. Yesterday both the firsts and seconds lost the beat several times.

The Beethoven overture was played in a broad, free style, which was, on the whole, satisfactory, although the time was ragged in one or two spots, and once the violins seemed about to break away from their fellow-players. Fortunately they were brought back.

The Romeo and Juliet symphony was well done. The passionate, subdued music of the second movement, which describes the balcony scene of the old love story, was played in an entirely satisfactory way, and the Queen Mab movement, with its scherzo time, brought forth warm applause from a rather unresponsive audience.

The familiar Schubert funeral march was given a good performance, and the Wagner selection, too, although by the time the latter was reached most people were too tired to listen with much attention.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 19, 1896.

The twenty-second Symphony programme was a standard one in its orchestral numbers. At its head stood the "King Stephen" overture, whose first sequence of four full chords proclaims Beethoven as its author, and whose two movements, quaintly gay and stirringly brilliant by turns, maintain the truth of that announcement. Then followed three parts or Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" symphony—that which represents Romeo in solitude and passes into a picture of the Capulet festival, t he Balcony Scene and the Queen Mab scherzo. After these came Liszt's rich and broad and yet thoroughly respectful and considerable orchestration of Schubert's funeral march in E-flat minor, and then Wagner's "Homage" march ended the concert.

The performance of these things was in all respects fine and adapted to the character of each, particular virtuosity and discrimination being shown in the Berlioz music, while great power was obtained without harshness for the Wagner. The Beethoven had due freedom and simplicity and the Schubert was smooth and calm, taking even its few strong climaxes gravely.

Mr. Henschel sang twice. His first selection was "King Saul's Dream," by the English composer, Dr. Charles Hubert Parry. Being entirely unknown to the audience, there was of course not a word about it in the programme-pamphlet which has been chiefly occupied this season with the sectional publication of what appear to be superficial text-books of musical history. The composition, which was specified as a scene and aria, is prettily and skilfully put together, and its orchestral development especially, from the present prelude for a solo viola, is commendable. But there is no particular effect of originality or power in the thing. Later Mr. Henschel sang to his own piano accompaniment his "Young Dietrich" ballad, which also pleassd and got him a recall, but aroused no enthusiasm, being neither forceful nor resplendent enough at its close for the spirit of the text.

At the next concert the audience will have the advantage of hearing Mr. Carl Baermann play Liszt's second pianoforte concerto. The other pieces will be Beethoven's seventh symphony, Berlioz's orchestration of Weber's "Invitation to the Dance," and Smetana's symphonic poem, "Vysehrad," to be played for the first time here.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

Boston Transcript

TUESDAY, APRIL 21, 1896.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the twenty-second symphony concert, given last Saturday evening in the Music Hall, was as follows:

Beethoven: Overture to "König Stephan," opus 117.
Dr. C. Hubert Parry: Scene and Aria, "King Saul's Dream."
(First time).
Berlioz: Three movements from the "Roméo et Juliette" Symphony, opus 17.
Schubert: Funeral March in E-flat minor.
(Scored for Orchestra by Franz Liszt.)
Henschel: Ballad with Pianoforte, "Jung Dietrich," opus 45.
Wagner: Huldigungsmarsch.
Mr. Georg Henschel was the singer.

Time was when we thought Beethoven's "König Stephan" overture cheap, trivial and a bore; now it seems to us exceedingly bright, brilliant and full of life. The presto portions, with that little second theme from the ninth symphony, are carried through with infinite dash, and the instrumentation, especially in the coda, is of quite modern lustre. The piece was capitally played and produced a striking effect.

The three movements—Romeo's melancholy, and fete at the house of Capulet; balcony scene; and Queen Mab—from the "Roméo et Juliette" symphony were especial favorites with the composer. Berlioz once wrote to a friend: "If you ask me now which one of my things I prefer, I will answer: I agree with most artists, I prefer the adagio (the love scene) in 'Roméo et Juliette.'" Perhaps these three movements show forth at once the splendor and the limitations of Berlioz's genius more convincingly than anything else he ever wrote; they also show the curious contrast between these limitations and that splendor. As pure music, we prefer the adagio (scene in the fields) of the "Fantastic" symphony to this balcony scene in "Roméo et Juliette;" from the same point of view the fete at the house of Capulet seems to us inferior to the "Carnaval Romain" overture. The "Queen Mab," to be sure, is unique and can be compared to nothing else in the whole range of orchestral composition. But, as vivid, resplendent, and poetic musical pictures, these three movements from the "Roméo et Juliette" far surpass all else that Berlioz has given to the world. The dance music of the "fete" is a little vulgar, perhaps, from one point of view—call it æsthetically vulgar; but, in another sense, how unspeakably elegant it is! What gallant, cavalierly music, fit for the noblest of knights and the finest of fine ladies to dance to! And how gallantly the fiery Tybalt rages through the coda! It is a complete picture, drawn and painted by an incomparable master. Points of specifically musical beauty are by no means wanting, either; but it is the vividness, dash and coruscating brilliancy of the thing that most compels your admiration; there is not a poor nor mean measure in it! In the same way, the adagio may be called one of the most perfect tone-poems in existence; more musically pregnant melodies may be found elsewhere, but in purity of poetic conception and poignant beauty of expression the movement is fully up to the level of Shakspeare's scene. All three movements are infinitely difficult to play well; difficult technically—although modern orchestras have even harder tasks to face nowadays—but thrice difficult in the higher artistic sense; a single false step in the rendering may cause a whole page to totter. The performance last Saturday was decidedly inferior to that given by Mr. Paur two years ago. Up to the coda of the "fete" all went superbly; but those wonderful ascending triplets in the strings went with less impetuousness than formerly, and the close was a little tame compared to the beginning. The adagio seemed not well held together; the musical thread kept snapping. The "Queen Mab" went too slow and heavily; one could not say of it, as Berlioz once said after a performance under his own direction in Brunswick: "The orchestra identified itself completely with Shakspeare's ravishing fancy, and made itself so small, so agile, so cunning and soft, that never, I think, did the invisible queen flit more gayly through more silent harmonies."

We think it a mistake to have given the Schubert-Liszt funeral march. One wonders why Liszt took it into his head to score it for orchestra, unless indeed he went prowling round at the time like a roaring lion, seeking what he might transcribe. There is no little beauty in the work; in its original pianforte shape it is delightful; but its portentous orchestral dress dwarfs it. To us it was thoroughly tedious. Then think of it: "König Stephan" in E-flat major; this march in E-flat minor; the Huldigungsmarsch in E-flat major! Something too much of one tonality!

We found the same fault with the playing of Wagner's Huldigungsmarsch that we have found with the playing of all of Wagner's marches under Mr. Paur: it was played, not grandly and powerfully, but loudly and stridently. The quality of tone was coarse and vulgar. To be sure, in this instance, the scoring was not Wagner's but Raff's; but Raff did his work quite according to the Wagner model, and Wagner gave it his approval. The fault was in the playing.

Dr. Parry's scene from his oratorio of "Saul" is a composition one is glad to have heard—and have done with. Why it is called "Scene and Aria" is hard to discover; for surely nothing in the music tells you where the scene stops and the aria begins. The writing somehow gives you an impression of consummate mastery—which is not to be held cheap nowadays—but of inspiration, either musical, dramatic or poetic, we could find none in it. Mr. Henschel sang admirably, wonderfully; with incomparable power and variety of expression. What a surprising power he has, by the way, of giving a percussive accent to his voice without the slightest apparent effort! The vividness of suggestion he gave to the word "smote"—in "And yet he spared and smote not"—recalled the terrific significance he gave to the phrase "One blow, and he is dead!" when he sang Pizarro in Beethoven's "Fidelio" here years ago. We have not forgotten it, you see, and shall probably remember [illegible] quite as long.

His own ballad, "Jung Dietrich," leaves us with rather mixed feelings. In it he seems only partially to have caught the ballad tone; perhaps quite as well as Schumann ever did—in "Die Löwenbraut," "Der arme Peter," and other similar things—but still not completely. Here Carl Loewe was the unsurpassed master. That peculiar, and apparently contradictory, combination of purely lyrical form and dramatic expression—or, to put it more accurately, that simple, homely lyrical form to which it is possible for the singer to give the most poignant and picturesque dramatic expression—is found in such perfection in the ballads of no other writer. Take Loewe's "Erlkönig;" as a musical composition, it has neither the luminous inspiration nor the scope of Schubert's to the same words; but it is far more in the ballad style, and works with simpler, more homely means. Schumann never really caught the ballad tone; he came nearest it in "Die beiden Grenadiere," but his miss was as good as a mile. And we feel the same thing even more strongly in Mr. Henschel's "Jung Dietrich;" the conscious effort to be dramatically expressive is too prominent. His singing of it was not up to his best; he seemed tired and sang with less than his usual force. His accepting an encore after it cannot be called in good taste; Mr. Henschel's three years' apprenticeship must have taught him the rules of the Symphony Orchestra, and he, as an ex-conductor of the organization, should have been the last man to break them.

The next programme is: Beethoven, symphony No. 7, in A major, opus 92; Smetana, symphonic poem, "Vysebrad" (first time); Liszt, pianoforte concerto No. 2, in A major; Weber-Berlioz, "Invitation a la Valse." Mr. Carl Baermann will be the pianist.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 19, 1896.
(Copyright 1896, Post Publishing Company.)

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Apart from the fact that Mr. Georg Henschel was the soloist at last evening's symphony, the occasion was not one of special interest, the programme not being of such a diversified character as usual, there being too much heaviness and monotony.

The overture to "King Stephen," by Beethoven, was the first number on the programme. It is a charming work, with many light, dainty touches, and introduces several solo instruments in fragments of melody, notably the flute.

Mr. Henschel was heard next in an aria from Dr. Charles Hubert Parry's "King Saul's Dream," heard here for the first time. The aria cannot be called interesting, for it lacks anything like variation. It is not a good concert number, although Mr. Henschel made all that was possible out of it, singing it with much dramatic strength and with clear enunciation. Naturally he was given a most cordial reception on his first appearance, and at the close of the aria, although in the latter case it was more of a compliment to the popular singer than to the number. On Mr. Henschel's reappearance later in the evening, he sang one of his own ballads, "Jung Dietrich," in German, playing his own accompaniment. In this he scored a much greater success, largely because his strong baritone voice is better suited to this style of work. The audience recalled him several times, and he finally returned to the piano and sang a well-known Italian song, "Vittoria fittoria," by Carissimi. To those of the audience who remember the days when Mr. Henschel conducted the symphonies this was quite a concession, so far as the choice of encore was concerned, since he was seldom known to include any Italian composition on his programme. Cherubini, being, perhaps, more often heard by an overture than any other composer of that nationality.

Three movements for the Berlioz symphony, "Romeo and Juliet," did not prove especially interesting. The first movement is very brassy toward the close, while the second, though delicate in sentiment, is rather monotonous. The third is the most interesting, because of the quaint, galloping theme which runs through it, the whole movement being a sort of scherzo. Schubert's "Funeral March," scored for orchestra by Liszt, and Wagner's "March of Homage," were the two remaining numbers on the programme.

At next week's concert a symphonic poem "Vysehrad," by Smetana, will be heard for the first time, and Mr. Carl Baermann will be the soloist, playing the Liszt concerto No. 2.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.

MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 20, 1896.

A Peculiar Programme at the Symphony Concert, Saturday.

It was a peculiar programme, that of Saturday, for when it was not extremely heroic it was lugubrious. It began with a broad performance of Beethoven's "King Stephan" overture, a work which is not in Beethoven's greatest style and which betrays something of the "made to order," pot-boiling style of manufacture. At the opening of the Stadt-theatre in Pesth, this overture began, and the "Ruins of Athens" ended, the festivities, Von Kotzebue having set words to both subjects. Naturally therefore, one finds something of lofty festivity, akin to bombast, in the "King Stephan" overture, a quality to which the Buda-Pesth spectators were keyed up, while the Music Hall audience was not; such works, heard apart from their festivities, too frequently have the flavor of stale champagne, and it is difficult to enter into sympathy with their heroics. The opening call of trumpets and horns was not as steady as might have been demanded, but the rest of the work received a very good performance. The march-theme, with its eleventh-century quaintness, was given in excellent contrast to the heavier parts of the score. When one bears in mind that this music led directly to a very striking tableau, a scene in the open fields near Pestsh, with the hero-king seated upon his throne of shields and surrounded by his nobles and warriors, one can recognize the fitness of the music to its subject, shorn of its surroundings, however, the piece d'occasion is not especially thrilling, although the resolute and manly reading deserves recognition.

Next followed Mr. Georg Henschel with "King Saul's Dream" by Dr. Chas. H. Parry, a species of mad-scene in which King Saul was the maniac; Lucia, Ophelia, Linda, Dinorah and other inmates of the operatic lunatic asylum go crazy in a decorous and highly embellished manner to flute accompaniment, but this scriptural madman, being a male and of oratorio proclivities, took his insanity upon the deep wind instruments and the viola. The work was of a declamatory style, never dropping into melody but giving a continuous recitativo stromentato, full of dramatic intensity yet not pleasing in any degree. The tone-coloring was the most interesting part of the work, the viola, the instrument of orchestral brooding, being much used, and all the scoring being done with a practised hand. There was also a certain degree of figure development in the accompaniment which made its due effect upon the auditor of classical tastes, but as a whole, this new Tom o' Bedlam seemed too rambling and disjointed for musical treatment, although the spasmodic and denunciatory character may have been true to nature. Mr. Henschel, who was received with an enthusiasm of which he may be proud, was more Henschelian than ever in his vocalism; all the traits which made his voice and method marked in the old days seem accentuated now; the dark timbre, the explosive character of the accents, the peculiarities of pronunciation, are more marked than ever; his great intelligence, his artistic fervor and his high musicianship however, also are as prominent as of yore.

His own composition, "Jung Dietrich," which he gave later in the concert, was far more attractive than the Saul scene. The dark and mournful character of the subject suited his voice perfectly, and there was a certain breadth of treatment in the number that reminded of Loewe's "Heinrich von Volger," although Loewe would have made more of the gallop of the defeated warriors which should have formed the background of the first two stanzas. The climax seemed powerful enough, yet was not very strongly contrasted with what had gone before. Mr. Henschel accompanied himself, and the composition and its interpretation so moved the audience that continuous applause followed until the rule of the concert was again broken and an encore given—"Vittoria mio Core," by Carissimi, one of the old classic gems which is not the best suited to Mr. Henschel's voice.

To resume the orchestral thread of events—the chief number of the concert was an excerpt from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" symphony, the larger part of three movements being given. The first violins gave the recitative-like phrases of the longing Romeo, in the movement entitled "Romeo Seul—Tristesse—Grande Fete chez Capulet," in most perfect manner, and the tender oboe passages suggestive of Juliet were also of exquisite tenderness. The reunion of the two themes of the Larghetto and Allegro was skilfully played, but the dance-theme was rather rigid and square cut. The tremndous noise of it was rather the fault of Berlioz than of Mr. Paur, for the Frenchman has here made as much racket as if the Capulets had given the ball in Verona. The balcony given the ball in Hoboken instead of Verona. The balcony scene, which came next, is certainly the best musical expression that has been evoked by this tragedy, although Tschaikowsky has not fallen far behind Berlioz in drawing instrumental thoughts from the play; yet the former composer has been much the more powerful in the interpretation of the love episodes. It is only an amorous violoncello that sighs for a tender violin (combined with flute), yet the picture is as graphically presented to the ear as ever painting was presented to the eye. The interpretation, however, did not seem to give all the possible that there was in the scene, there was a lack of ardor and abandon, a certain respectability of performance that suggested a church wedding with all the 400 of Veronese society present as guests. "Queen Mab" is a movement that has been dragged in by the ears, and we are glad of it, for Berlioz was never quite so much at home as when depicting elves, unless it were in painting demons, and the dainty prestissimo was splendidly played from its opening chord upon the woodwind to its brusque final cadence by the full orchestra. The great difficulties were surmounted as if they did not exist, and the delicate harp harmonics, the high harmonics upon the violins, the dainty trills upon the strings in high positions with flute and English horn in the lower register, all these were splendidly effective, and presented the only light moments of the heavy programme. The tiny bell (glockenspiel) that tinkled the end of Queen Mab's cortege, soon changed into funeral tollings as the fairy procession was succeeded by a Trauer-Marsch, that by Schubert (in E flat), with its sorrows magnified by sombre scoring by Liszt. The cello work in the trio of this was of excellent character, and the returning passage after the trio, leading into the march, was nobly played. The kettle drummer had a fine time of it during this march. If ever this artist should turn policeman, it would be dangerous to trust him with a billy. His motto is evidently

> Strike! for your altars and your fires,
> Strike! till the last armed foe expires,

and strike as violently as you possibly can.

The concert ended with Wagner's "Huldigungs Marsch" a composition, like the one which began the programme, which has its excuse (or rather its raison d'etre) in the ceremonial for which it was written, the coronation of Louis II, of Bavaria, but it is not so successful when taken in cold blood in the concert room. Even a German might think that such concert Huldigung requires Entschuldigung. It was played loudly enough to please every aurist present; it would form a suitable opening number for the day of judgment, but it is a littl too heavy for Music Hall. But even amidst the tonal cyclones the kettle-drummer aforesaid rode in the whirlwind and directed the storm, aided now by an energetic snare-drummer. After this forcible number all those who had escaped concussion of the brain went home satisfied.

Louis C. Elson.

The Sunday Telegram

PORTLAND, MAINE.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 19, 1896.

A Grand Symphony Concert.

The concert given in City Hall last Wednesday evening by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was one of the best concerts ever given in this city. It was too bad that there was not a larger audience present, but it is woefully true that some of the best things that come to Portland, in the entertainment line are very poorly patronized.

The first number was the beautiful Symphony No. 6, in B minor, entitled "Pathetique" by Tschaikowsky. The four movements of the symphony were exquisitely rendered, but the fourth movement, adagio lamentoso, in B minor, was the most striking part of the number. It has a pathetic character, being of a funereal type, now solemn, now majestic, rising at times to a grand fortissimo, then diminishing to a sad, hushed pianissimo.

The second number was a concerto for the pianoforte (No. 2) by Saint-Saens. Miss Antoinette Szumowska, the only pupil of the great Paderewski, was the soloist and made a lasting impression on those who were fortunate enough to hear her. Her wonderful technique and her wonderful phrasing technique and her brilliant phrasing of the difficult composition caused the audience to nearly go wild with ecstacy and she was liberally applauded. Her playing is decidely after the style of her gifted master and should she visit our city again, in the future, City Hall would be crowded.

The last two numbers on the programme were selections from Wagner's celebrated operas. One listening to the beautiful, seductive strains of "Forest Sounds," from "Siegfried," could almost imagine he was in the midst of a beautiful forest, listening to the sweet singing of various birds. The overture to "Rienzi" was a superb finale to the performance. It is hard to describe this number, as it was a masterly rendition of a masterly work. At its close the orchestra was given a tremendous ovation.

Mr. Emil Paur, the talented conductor of the orchestra, is a composer of decided ability. His work on this occasion was of the highest order.

When the "music-loving people" of Portland can attend grand opera, the Bostonians, the Symphony and other Standard attractions in the Stockbridge course at a cost of about 23 cents, City Hall is crowded, but when such attractions come here singly and on their own merits at a price of admission commensurate with their excellence, and no higher than is charged for the same thing elsewhere our "music-loving public" stay religiously at home and camp at high prices.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 29, 1896.

The program of the twenty-second Symphony concert was as follows:

Overture, König Stephan.....Beethoven
Scene and aria, King Saul's Dream.....Parry
(First time.)
Three movements from the Roméo and Juliette Symphony, op. 17.....Berlioz
Roméo alone, grand fête at the house of Capulet.
Balcony scene, adagio.
Scherzo, Queen Mab.
Funeral March, in E flat major.....Schubert
(Scored for orchestra by Franz Liszt.)
Ballad with piano, Jung Dietrich.....Henschel
Huldigungsmarsch.....Wagner

This program was long, too long, and in the main it was dismally dull.

Does Mr. Henschel, who usually shows great taste in his selections, believe in the secret recesses of his mind that Saul's Dream is tolerable and to be endured? He sang it, I understand, when Dr. Charles Hubert Hastings Parry's oratorio in four acts was first produced at the Birmingham Festival in 1894; proper pride, then, may be the cause of this imprudent obstinacy.

Ah, this Dr. Parry! He spins counterpoint with the skill and the facility of a spider constructing a web. He is learned and profound and skillful and everything that an English doctor of music should be; but in this scene and aria there is not one spark of imagination, not one sure dramatic touch. The dreary waste of notes! And there stood Mr. Henschel declaiming as though he were intoxicated by the perfume of madding, gorgeous flowers.

And then Mr. Henschel insisted on singing his own ballad Jung Dietrich. Would that some composer of fine frenzy might put Dahn's verses to thrilling music; for the subject is a brave one. I can imagine Mr. H. W. Parker triumphing gloriously. But Mr. Henschel failed completely. There is neither moving iteration nor impressive contrast. And when the climax should carry everything before it, there is complete flattening out. Nevertheless, and although Mr. Henschel was not vocally at his best, there was tumultuous applause.

* * *

And what did Mr. Paur mean by compelling the audience to listen to Beethoven's King Stephen overture? The old song is better:

"King Stephen was a worthy peer,
His breeches cost him but a crown."

Never mind, if it is not the same King Stephen. The song is still the more musical. Is Mr. Paur, too, among the fetishists? Must we bow the knee to the complete works of any great composer?

And then there was that arrangement of Schubert's funeral march! Here the emotions of the hearer are too deep for speech.

* * *

The noble music of Berlioz was the sole solace, for I will not make affidavit that the march by Wagner was played. When I left Mr. Henschel appeared to own the hall.

Are there many greater works of high imagination than the Balcony Scene of Berlioz! I know of few that at once so thoroughly and intimately suggest an atmosphere. The night is tender, caressing, conniving, and Romeo is in the arms of the pride of the Capulets. The night herself, the "huge and thoughtful night," does not disdain to give poor earthly lovers an hour of rapture.

When you hear the ball music of Gounod, the daughter of M. Prudhomme makes her début, and the invited guests exclaim "Tiens!" But the strains of revelry that are born to the ears of Berlioz's Romeo are worthy of a great feast in a mansion of Verona.

As for Queen Mab—all other fairy music is plantigrade and galumphing.

PHILIP HALE.

THURSDAY, APRIL 23, 1896.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Boston Orchestra Makes Its Last Appearance of the Season.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's last concert for this season was given at Infantry Hall last evening. Mention has been made before of the marked increase in attendance at these concerts, but the audience of last night was the banner one of the series in point of numbers. There was a considerable display of enthusiasm and an unusual warmth in the applause bestowed on Mr. Paur and the accomplished tenor, Mr. Ben Davies, the soloist of the evening. The programme, like the closing one of last year, was drawn from the inexhaustable mine of Richard Wagner's works, with the single exception of Tschaikowsky's "Symphony Pathetique," played at the previous concert and repeated in deference to a request by a large number of hearers. The order was as follows:

Symphony No 6, in B-minor, "Pathetic," op. 74.....Peter Hyitch Tschaikowsky.
I. Adagio (B-minor).
Allegro non troppo (B-minor).
II. Allegro con grazia (D-major).
III. Allegro molto vivace (G-major).
IV. Finale: Adagio lamentoso (B-minor).
"Spring Song," from "Die Walkure," Wagner.
"Waldweben," from Siegfried," .....Wagner.
"Prize Song," from Die Meistersinger," .....Wagner.
Preludes to acts I. and III., "Lohengrin"....Wagner.
Overture, "Tannhauser," .....Wagner.

Any work so far out of the common rut as this symphony of Tschaikowsky's must of necessity lose something of its impressiveness upon a second hearing. For, though a clearer view may be had of its general structure, and a more intelligent appreciation of its detail and meaning, the element of surprise is wanting. The symphony remains an undeniably great work, but it does not seem to hit you as hard the second time as it did the first. Its outlines are rugged and massive—Tschaikowsy paints with a large brush and a prodigality of color unusual even among the moderns. There is in this one work a wealth of invention, an ingenuity of combination and a command of musical resources sufficient to proclaim its author a genius and a great composer. But there are points where one instinctively wonders whether he is really in earnest, or whether—like Dickens's fat boy—he only "wants to make your flesh creep." Any one who has heard this symphony will have no difficulty in locating the places referred to. The form of the work is exceedingly free; there are the traditional four movements, to be sure, but even these transposed from their usual order, and the slow movement placed at the end; as to structural detail, it bears no more resemblance to the old style of symphony than Wagner's "Parsifal" or "Die Walkure" does to one of Donizetti's operas. There are impressive melodies skillfully developed and contrasted, there is counterpoint of the most modern and intricate sort, there is keen instinct and profound knowledge of the possibilities of instrumentation, but of adherence to scholastic forms not a whit. The work is sui generis, and must be judged by itself. It was magnificently played, and listened to with very evident attention and interest.

The five selections from Wagner's works which made up the balance of the programme are all more or less familiar to concert-goers. It is superfluous to add that they were played with all the exquisite finish that has made the Boston orchestra famous throughout the land. Mr. Ben Davies was given a royal welcome, which he justified by his splendid singing of the love song of Siegmund and the prize song of Walther. It is a genuine pleasure to listen to Mr. Davies, so manly and unaffected in style, so full of genuine artistic impulse, and so skillful in the use of his clear, telling, musical voice.

A look backward at this season's concerts reveals the fact that we have never had a more satisfactory series. The programmes have given us a wide range of the best and most modern music; the soloists have been without exception of eminent rank and thoroughly satisfactory; as for the orchestra itself, fine as it has always been, its work this season has been beyond its best previous endeavor, and has called out the most flattering comment everywhere. Mr. Emil Paur has lived down his critics and proved himself to be what these columns have always given him credit for being—a most sound musician and able conductor. It is of interest to note the fact, as showing what a factor this grand organization has been in the musical growth of this country, that last night's performance was the 1399th concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. For 15 years they have been preaching the gospel of musical righteousness, nor have their converts been few or lukewarm. A series of concerts has been given in Providence every season except the first since the orchestra was organized. Last night's concert was the 51st in this city. During these years the audiences here have about trebled in size, and the influence of these repeated hearings of the best music has been both wide and deep.

THURSDAY, APRIL 23, 1896.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Boston Orchestra Makes Its Last Appearance of the Season.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's last concert for this season was given at Infantry Hall last evening. Mention has been made before of the marked increase in attendance at these concerts, but the audience of last night was the banner one of the series in point of numbers. There was a considerable display of enthusiasm and an unusual warmth in the applause bestowed on Mr. Paur and the accomplished tenor, Mr. Ben Davies, the soloist of the evening. The programme, like the closing one of last year, was drawn from the inexhaustable mine of Richard Wagner's works, with the single exception of Tschaikowsky's "Symphony Pathetique," played at the previous concert and repeated in deference to a request by a large number of hearers. The order was as follows:

Symphony No 6, in B-minor, "Pathetic," op. 74.....Peter Hyitch Tschaikowsky.
I. Adagio (B-minor).
Allegro non troppo (B-minor).
II. Allegro con grazia (D-major).
III. Allegro molto vivace (G-major).
IV. Finale: Adagio lamentoso (B-minor).
"Spring Song," from "Die Walkure," Wagner.
"Waldweben," from Siegfried," .....Wagner.
"Prize Song," from Die Meistersinger," .....Wagner.
Preludes to acts I. and III., "Lohengrin"....Wagner.
Overture, "Tannhauser," .....Wagner.

Any work so far out of the common rut as this symphony of Tschaikowsky's must of necessity lose something of its impressiveness upon a second hearing. For, though a clearer view may be had of its general structure, and a more intelligent appreciation of its detail and meaning, the element of surprise is wanting. The symphony remains an undeniably great work, but it does not seem to hit you as hard the second time as it did the first. Its outlines are rugged and massive—Tschaikowsy paints with a large brush and a prodigality of color unusual even among the moderns. There is in this one work a wealth of invention, an ingenuity of combination and a command of musical resources sufficient to proclaim its author a genius and a great composer. But there are points where one instinctively wonders whether he is really in earnest, or whether—like Dickens's fat boy—he only "wants to make your flesh creep." Any one who has heard this symphony will have no difficulty in locating the places referred to. The form of the work is exceedingly free; there are the traditional four movements, to be sure, but even these transposed from their usual order, and the slow movement placed at the end; as to structural detail, it bears no more resemblance to the old style of symphony than Wagner's "Parsifal" or "Die Walkure" does to one of Donizetti's operas. There are impressive melodies skillfully developed and contrasted, there is counterpoint of the most modern and intricate sort, there is keen instinct and profound knowledge of the possibilities of instrumentation, but of adherence to scholastic forms not a whit. The work is sui generis, and must be judged by itself. It was magnificently played, and listened to with very evident attention and interest.

The five selections from Wagner's works which made up the balance of the programme are all more or less familiar to concert-goers. It is superfluous to add that they were played with all the exquisite finish that has made the Boston orchestra famous throughout the land. Mr. Ben Davies was given a royal welcome, which he justified by his splendid singing of the love song of Siegmund and the prize song of Walther. It is a genuine pleasure to listen to Mr. Davies, so manly and unaffected in style, so full of genune artistic impulse, and so skillful in the use of his clear, telling, musical voice.

A look backward at this season's concerts reveals the fact that we have never had a more satisfactory series. The programmes have given us a wide range of the best and most modern music; the soloists have been without exception of eminent rank and thoroughly satisfactory; as for the orchestra itself, fine as it has always been, its work this season has been beyond its best previous endeavor, and has called out the most flattering comment everywhere. Mr. Emil Paur has lived down his critics and proved himself to be what these columns have always given him credit for being—a most sound musician and able conductor. It is of interest to note the fact, as showing what a factor this grand organization has been in the musical growth of this country, that last night's performance was the 1399th concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. For 15 years they have been preaching the gospel of musical righteousness, nor have their concerts been few or lukewarm. A series of concerts has been given in Providence every season except the first since the orchestra was organized. Last night's concert was the 51st in this city. During these years the audiences here have about trebled in size, and the influence of these repeated hearings of the best music has been both wide and deep.

THURSDAY, APRIL 23, 1896.

The best audience that has yet gathered at a concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra was seen in Infantry hall last evening when the last performance in the series for this season was given under the direction of Conductor Paur. The assemblage was not only the largest of the course, but it was the largest ever present at a Symphony event, and the fact was a fresh demonstration of the great popularity the orchestra and its leaders have gained in this city. The program was one of the most brilliant of the year, and it was embellished by the appearance of a singer whose name is always synonymous with pleasure and high reaching ability, Mr. Ben Davies. The numbers were received enthusiastically from the outset, and at the close the delighted hearers went away fully resolved to an individual to give hearty support to the entertainments of next season.

The following selections were on the program:

Symphony No. 6, in B-minor, "Pathetic," op 74.....Peter Hyitch Tschaikowsky
I. Adagio (B-minor).
Allegro non troppo (B-minor).
II. Allegro con grazia (D-major).
III. Allegro molto vivace (G-major).
IV. Finale: Adagio lamentoso (B-minor).
"Spring Song," from "Die Walkure".Wagner
"Waldweben," from "Siegfried".....Wagner
"Prize Song," from "Die Meistersinger".....Wagner
Preludes to acts I. and III., "Lohengrin"..Wagner
Overture, "Tannhauser".....Wagner

Rather of a novelty in a Boston Symphony orchestra list of compositions was a succession of five works by Richard Wagner. In fact it is unusual to find in one of these programs so many productions of the same writer. The innovation was one that satisfied. The opening composition has been played here before. Then it was a genuine treat in the matter of being something out of the common in musical construction. Heard again it did not seem so effective, though the manner in which it was interpretad was consummate art and the acme of intelligence. The Wagner features were offered with a view to showing, perhaps, what the orchestra was capable of doing in that line as a contrast to the performances of the Damrosch orchestra. At any rate, the execution of each one of them was splendidly perfect in every detail. Mr. Paur's reading was careful and close, and his musicians were in the most sympathetic and responsive mood. Indeed it would seem impossible that the Boston Symphony players could be improved upon in any of their achievements.

Mr. Davies was heard with renewed gratification. His voice is a solace and an inspiration, his method is the cream of accuracy and the results he obtains are superb from the musical standpoint. The reception that he got was a fine one, and it impelled him to a display of his powersthat threw the audience into paroxisms of appreciation.

The final departure of the orchestra is something which Providence keenly regrets. It is a balm for sorrowing minds, however, that the grand force is to return to the city another season, to begin anew a series of its unsurpassed diversions, and its patrons will be only too glad to welcome it when the night of its reappearance next fall arrives.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 29, 1896.

The program of the twenty-second Symphony concert was as follows:

Overture, König Stephan.....Beethoven
Scene and aria, King Saul's Dream.....Parry
(First time.)
Three movements from the Roméo and Juliette Symphony, op. 17.....Berlioz
Roméo alone, grand fête at the house of Capulet.
Balcony scene, adagio.
Scherzo, Queen Mab.
Funeral March, in E flat major.....Schubert
(Scored for orchestra by Franz Liszt.)
Ballad with piano, Jung Dietrich.....Henschel
Huldigungsmarsch.....Wagner

This program was long, too long, and in the main it was dismally dull.

Does Mr. Henschel, who usually shows great taste in his selections, believe in the secret recesses of his mind that Saul's Dream is tolerable and to be endured? He sang it, I understand, when Dr. Charles Hubert Hastings Parry's oratorio in four acts was first produced at the Birmingham Festival in 1894; proper pride, then, may be the cause of this imprudent obstinacy.

Ah, this Dr. Parry! He spins counterpoint with the ease and the facility of a spider constructing a web. He is learned and profound and skillful and everything that an English doctor of music should be; but in this scene and aria there is not one spark of imagination, not one sure dramatic touch. The dreary waste of notes! And there stood Mr. Henschel declaiming as though he were intoxicated by the perfume of madding, gorgeous flowers.

And then Mr. Henschel insisted on singing his own ballad Jung Dietrich. Would that some composer of fine frenzy might put Dahn's verses to thrilling music; for the subject is a brave one. I can imagine Mr. H. W. Parker triumphing gloriously. But Mr. Henschel failed completely. There is neither moving iteration nor impressive contrast. And when the climax should carry everything before it, there is complete flattening out. Nevertheless, and although Mr. Henschel was not vocally at his best, there was tumultuous applause.

* * *

And what did Mr. Paur mean by compelling the audience to listen to Beethoven's King Stephen overture? The old song is better:

"King Stephen was a worthy peer,
His breeches cost him but a crown."

Never mind, if it is not the same King Stephen. The song is still the more musical. Is Mr. Paur, too, among the fetishists? Must we bow the knee to the complete works of any great composer?

And then there was that arrangement of Schubert's funeral march! Here the emotions of the hearer are too deep for speech.

* * *

The noble music of Berlioz was the sole solace, for I will not make affidavit that the march by Wagner was played. When I left Mr. Henschel appeared to own the hall.

Are there many greater works of high imagination than the Balcony Scene of Berlioz! I know of few that at once so thoroughly and intimately suggest an atmosphere. The night is tender, caressing, conniving, and Romeo is in the arms of the pride of the Capulets. The night herself, the "huge and thoughtful night," does not disdain to give poor earthly lovers an hour of rapture.

When you hear the ball music of Gounod, the daughter of M. Prudhomme makes her début, and the invited guests exclaim "Tiens!" But the strains of revelry that are born to the ears of Berlioz's Romeo are worthy of a great feast in a mansion of Verona.

As for Queen Mab—all other fairy music is plantigrade and galumphing.

PHILIP HALE.

THE EVENING BULLETIN

THURSDAY, APRIL 23, 1896.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Boston Orchestra Makes Its Last Appearance of the Season.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's last concert for this season was given at Infantry Hall last evening. Mention has been made before of the marked increase in attendance at these concerts, but the audience of last night was the banner one of the series in point of numbers. There was a considerable display of enthusiasm and an unusual warmth in the applause bestowed on Mr. Paur and the accomplished tenor, Mr. Ben Davies, the soloist of the evening. The programme, like the closing one of last year, was drawn from the inexhaustable mine of Richard Wagner's works, with the single exception of Tschaikowsky's "Symphony Pathetique," played at the previous concert and repeated in deference to a request by a large number of hearers. The order was as follows:

Symphony No 6, in B-minor, "Pathetic," op. 74.....Peter Hyitch Tschaikowsky.
I. Adagio (B-minor).
Allegro non troppo (B-minor).
II. Allegro con grazia (D-major).
III. Allegro molto vivace (G-major).
IV. Finale: Adagio lamentoso (B-minor).
"Spring Song," from "Die Walkure," Wagner.
"Waldweben," from Siegfried."....Wagner.
"Prize Song," from Die Meistersinger,".....Wagner.
Preludes to acts I. and III., "Lohengrin"....Wagner.
Overture, "Tannhauser,".....Wagner.

Any work so far out of the common rut as this symphony of Tschaikowsky's must of necessity lose something of its impressiveness upon a second hearing. For, though a clearer view may be had of its general structure, and a more intelligent appreciation of its detail and meaning, the element of surprise is wanting. The symphony remains an undeniably great work, but it does not seem to hit you as hard the second time as it did the first. Its outlines are rugged and massive—Tschaikowsy paints with a large brush and a prodigality of color unusual even among the moderns. There is in this one work a wealth of invention, an ingenuity of combination and a command of musical resources sufficient to proclaim its author a genius and a great composer. But there are points where one instinctively wonders whether he is really in earnest, or whether—like Dickens's fat boy—he only "wants to make your flesh creep." Any one who has heard this symphony will have no difficulty in locating the places referred to. The form of the work is exceedingly free; there are the traditional four movements, to be sure, but even these transposed from their usual order, and the slow movement placed at the end; as to structural detail, it bears no more resemblance to the old style of symphony than Wagner's "Parsifal" or "Die Walkure" does to one of Donizetti's operas. There are impressive melodies skillfully developed and contrasted, there is counterpoint of the most modern and intricate sort, there is keen instinct and profound knowledge of the possibilities of instrumentation, but of adherence to scholastic forms not a whit. The work is sui generis, and must be judged by itself. It was magnificently played, and listened to with very evident attention and interest.

The five selections from Wagner's works which made up the balance of the programme are all more or less familiar to concert-goers. It is superfluous to add that they were played with all the exquisite finish that has made the Boston orchestra famous throughout the land. Mr. Ben Davies was given a royal welcome, which he justified by his splendid singing of the love song of Siegmund and the prize song of Walther. It is a genuine pleasure to listen to Mr. Davies, so manly and unaffected in style, so full of genuine artistic impulse, and so skillful in the use of his clear, telling, musical voice.

A look backward at this season's concerts reveals the fact that we have never had a more satisfactory series. The programmes have given us a wide range of the best and most modern music; the soloists have been without exception of eminent rank and thoroughly satisfactory; as for the orchestra itself, fine as it has always been, its work this season has been beyond its best previous endeavor, and has called out the most flattering comment everywhere. Mr. Emil Paur has lived down his critics and proved himself to be what these columns have always given him credit for being—a most sound musician and able conductor. It is of interest to note the fact, as showing what a factor this grand organization has been in the musical growth of this country, that last night's performance was the 1399th concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. For 15 years they have been preaching the gospel of musical righteousness, nor have their converts been few or lukewarm. A series of concerts has been given in Providence every season except the first since the orchestra was organized. Last night's concert was the 51st in this city. During these years the audiences here have about trebled in size, and the influence of these repeated hearings of the best music has been both wide and deep.

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL

THURSDAY, APRIL 23, 1896.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Boston Orchestra Makes Its Last Appearance of the Season.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's last concert for this season was given at Infantry Hall last evening. Mention has been made before of the marked increase in attendance at these concerts, but the audience of last night was the banner one of the series in point of numbers. There was a considerable display of enthusiasm and an unusual warmth in the applause bestowed on Mr. Paur and the accomplished tenor, Mr. Ben Davies, the soloist of the evening. The programme, like the closing one of last year, was drawn from the inexhaustable mine of Richard Wagner's works, with the single exception of Tschaikowsky's "Symphony Pathetique," played at the previous concert and repeated in deference to a request by a large number of hearers. The order was as follows:

Symphony No 6, in B-minor, "Pathetic," op. 74.....Peter Hyitch Tschaikowsky.
I. Adagio (B-minor).
Allegro non troppo (B-minor).
II. Allegro con grazia (D-major).
III. Allegro molto vivace (G-major).
IV. Finale: Adagio lamentoso (B-minor).
"Spring Song," from "Die Walkure," Wagner.
"Waldweben," from Siegfried,".....Wagner.
"Prize Song," from Die Meistersinger,".....Wagner.
Preludes to acts I. and III., "Lohengrin"....Wagner.
Overture, "Tannhauser,".....Wagner.

Any work so far out of the common rut as this symphony of Tschaikowsky's must of necessity lose something of its impressiveness upon a second hearing. For, though a clearer view may be had of its general structure, and a more intelligent appreciation of its detail and meaning, the element of surprise is wanting. The symphony remains an undeniably great work, but it does not seem to hit you as hard the second time as it did the first. Its outlines are rugged and massive—Tschaikowsy paints with a large brush and a prodigality of color unusual even among the moderns. There is in this one work a wealth of invention, an ingenuity of combination and a command of musical resources sufficient to proclaim its author a genius and a great composer. But there are points where one instinctively wonders whether he is really in earnest, or whether—like Dickens's fat boy—he only "wants to make your flesh creep." Any one who has heard this symphony will have no difficulty in locating the places referred to. The form of the work is exceedingly free; there are the traditional four movements, to be sure, but even these transposed from their usual order, and the slow movement placed at the end; as to structural detail, it bears no more resemblance to the old style of symphony than Wagner's "Parsifal" or "Die Walkure" does to one of Donizetti's operas. There are impressive melodies skillfully developed and contrasted, there is counterpoint of the most modern and intricate sort, there is keen instinct and profound knowledge of the possibilities of instrumentation, but of adherence to scholastic forms not a whit. The work is sui generis, and must be judged by itself. It was magnificently played, and listened to with very evident attention and interest.

The five selections from Wagner's works which made up the balance of the programme are all more or less familiar to concert-goers. It is superfluous to add that they were played with all the exquisite finish that has made the Boston orchestra famous throughout the land. Mr. Ben Davies was given a royal welcome, which he justified by his splendid singing of the love song of Siegmund and the prize song of Walther. It is a genuine pleasure to listen to Mr. Davies, so manly and unaffected in style, so full of genune artistic impulse, and so skillful in the use of his clear, telling, musical voice.

A look backward at this season's concerts reveals the fact that we have never had a more satisfactory series. The programmes have given us a wide range of the best and most modern music; the soloists have been without exception of eminent rank and thoroughly satisfactory; as for the orchestra itself, fine as it has always been, its work this season has been beyond its best previous endeavor, and has called out the most flattering comment everywhere. Mr. Emil Paur has lived down his critics and proved himself to be what these columns have always given him credit for being—a most sound musician and able conductor. It is of interest to note the fact, as showing what a factor this grand organization has been in the musical growth of this country, that last night's performance was the 1399th concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. For 15 years they have been preaching the gospel of musical righteousness, nor have their concerts been few or lukewarm. A series of concerts has been given in Providence every season except the first since the orchestra was organized. Last night's concert was the 51st in this city. During these years the audiences here have about trebled in size, and the influence of these repeated hearings of the best music has been both wide and deep.

The Telegram

THURSDAY, APRIL 23, 1896.

The best audience that has yet gathered at a concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra was seen in Infantry hall last evening when the last performance in the series for this season was given, under the direction of Conductor Paur. The assemblage was not only the largest of the course, but it was the largest ever present at a Symphony event, and the fact was a fresh demonstration of the great popularity the orchestra and its leaders have gained in this city. The program was one of the most brilliant of the year, and it was embellished by the appearance of a singer whose name is always synonymous with pleasure and high reaching ability, Mr. Ben Davies. The numbers were received enthusiastically from the outset, and at the close the delighted hearers went away fully resolved to an individual to give hearty support to the entertainments of next season.

The following selections were on the program:

Symphony No. 6, in B-minor, "Pathetic," op 74.....Peter Hyitch Tschaikowsky
I. Adagio (B-minor).
Allegro non troppo (B-minor).
II. Allegro con grazia (D-major).
III. Allegro molto vivace (G-major).
IV. Finale: Adagio lamentoso (B-minor).
"Spring Song," from "Die Walkure".....Wagner
"Waldweben," from "Siegfried".....Wagner
"Prize Song," from "Die Meistersinger"....Wagner
Preludes to acts I. and III., "Lohengrin"....Wagner
Overture, "Tannhauser".....Wagner

Rather of a novelty in a Boston Symphony orchestra list of compositions was a succession of five works by Richard Wagner. In fact it is unusual to find in one of these programs so many productions of the same writer. The innovation was one that satisfied. The opening composition has been played here before. Then it was a genuine treat in the matter of being something out of the common in musical construction. Heard again it did not seem so effective, though the manner in which it was interpreted was consummate art and the acme of intelligence. The Wagner features were offered with a view to showing, perhaps, what the orchestra was capable of doing in that line as a contrast to the performances of the Damrosch orchestra. At any rate, the execution of each one of them was splendidly perfect in every detail. Mr. Paur's reading was careful and close, and his musicians were in the most sympathetic and responsive mood. Indeed it would seem impossible that the Boston Symphony players could be improved upon in any of their achievements.

Mr. Davies was heard with renewed gratification. His voice is a solace and an inspiration, his method is the cream of accuracy and the results he obtains are superb from the musical standpoint. The reception that he got was a fine one, and it impelled him to a display of his powersthat threw the audience into paroxisms of appreciation.

The final departure of the orchestra is something which Providence keenly regrets. It is a balm for sorrowing minds, however, that the grand force is to return to the city another season, to begin anew a series of its unsurpassed diversions, and its patrons will be only too glad to welcome it when the night of its reappearance next fall arrives.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCIX., NO. 117.

SUNDAY, APRIL 26, 1896.

MR. CARL BAERMANN, THE SOLOIST

Twenty-Third Concert of the Season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The 23d concert of the season by the Boston Symphony orchestra was given in Music Hall last evening, with the following programme:

Symphonic poem, "Vysehrad".....Smetana
Overture, "Fingal's Cave".....Mendelssohn
Symphony, A-major.....Beethoven
"Invitation to the Dance".....Weber-Berlioz
Overture, "1812".....Tschaikowsky

Mr. Carl Baermann was to have played Liszt's pianoforte concerto No. 2, but he was unable to appear, on account of illness, and there was no soloist. The Smetana symphonic poem was the novelty among the selections. It is the first of seven compositions in kind, entitled collectively, "My Country." "Vysehrad" is the name of a famous fortress whose pride in its day of strength, whose downfall amid wild scenes of carnage, and whose solitariness in its ruined state the composer essays to paint in music. Smetana thought it necessary to prefix a description of the meaning of the work to his score, but it does little to enlighten the hearer. "Lumir's varyto," "the edifices of the Premslide kings," and "the echo of the long silent song of the singer prince" remain as much a mystery after the last note of the tone poem has sounded as they were before the first note was heard.

It was hard to become interested in "Vysehrad," whether it trembled "with splendid hymns of praise," or with "wild scenes of carnage"; whether it "rises before Lumir's eyes in its former glory," or is become "a dumb, deserted monument." It is programme music, pure and simple, and without the description the composer has given it would puzzle the cleverest solver of musical riddles to discover what it is all about, and even with the guide thus considerately set down, there is nothing for the listener to do but to take it all on trust, for the music says little that is clear and less that makes any very strong appeal to the understanding. It is brilliantly scored, and at times with massive effect, and there is a bit of graceful melody that breaks like a welcome gleam of sunshine through the general cloudiness; but as a whole the work is unimpressive, dull, and almost tedious. Was it by accident or by design that the concert began and ended with compositions inspired by patriotism? The Bohemian was less felicitous than was the Russian. The Tschaikowsky overture is sensational and ear-splitting in its noisiness, and perhaps vulgar in its blatant uproar, but it is at least clear in meaning and exciting in its fire and its steady and massive tread toward its tremendous climax, with its bell ringing, its drum thundering and its hoarse and stormy blare of brass.

The work was read and played with immense vigor, especially in its whirlwind of a coda. The symphony was interpreted by Mr. Paur along traditional lines, perhaps a little rigidly in the first allegro, and yet with an exceptionally careful observance of the nuances. The perennially fresh and beautiful allegretto was charmingly rendered throughout, and the finale was for once taken at a just pace, and not as a means for illustrating how rapidly an orchestra can be driven into playing it without falling into disaster. Berlioz's orchestral version of the Weber waltz was never read with a finer and more intelligent appreciation of its possibilities in regard to color and effect, and more brilliantly and inspiritingly played here than it was last night. The rendering of the poetic Mendelssohn overture was gracefully sympathetic in the reading and perfect in the precision and finish of its performance.

The concert may be ranked among the marked successes of the season. The last concert of the 15th year of the organization will take place next Saturday evening, when the programme will be devoted wholly to Wagner. It includes the "Rienzi" overture, the "Siegfried" idyl, the "Faust" overture, the prelude to the third act of "Lohengrin," the "Waldweben," from "Siegfried"; the prelude and love-death from "Tristan and Isolde" and the "Meistersinger" overture. There will be no soloist.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 26.

The Symphony Concert.

The twenty-third concert of the Symphony orchestra was given in Music Hall, last evening with the following programme:

"Symphonic Poem".....Smetana
Overture, "Fingal's Cave".....Mendelsshon
Symphony No. 7.....Beethoven
Invitation to the Dance.....Weber
(scored by Berlioz).
Overture "1812".....Tschaikowsky

The Smetana work belongs to the programme order or music, and assisted by the descriptive test, one easily understands the intention of the composer and sympathizes with him. He suggests Macpherson's Ossian; there are in both spasmodic outbursts that suggest enthusiasm and cunningly arranged phrases hinting at sentiment. The following brief extracts from the descriptive programme will describe the music: "Warlike fame" in castle courts "brave knights assemble to the sound of cymbals and trumpets" then; "unchained passion overthrows the grand towers," "wild scenes of carnage," "ruins," and a "long-silent song" resounding "through the sad stillness." The music, despite its descriptive character, is most effective in scoring, and it received a fine interpretation from Mr. Paur and his orchestra.

Mr. Baermann, who was to have been the soloist at this concert, was taken suddenly ill at so late an hour that it was impossible to supply his place. The concert, however, was most enjoyable, the Beethoven symphony receiving a masterly interpretation, and the readings and playing throughout being of the highest quality.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 26, 1896.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT, ETC.

Deep, sincere regret fell upon the Music Hall audience to learn that illness would prevent Mr. Carl Baermann from playing, as had been expected, the second pianoforte concerto of Liszt in the course of the twenty-third Symphony programme. For apart from the interest of the composition itself, that artists' penetrant mentality, his approved taste, his sympathetic nature, nervous energy and noble technique especially qualify him for the playing of an author whose composition is often no less puzzling intellectually than it is mechanically exacting.

The programme was necessarily changed, and it began with its one novelty, which Smetana's patriotic poem about the old historic castle of Vysehrad, whose name it bears. It is a sort of "Lay of the Last Minstrel" in little, depicting symbolically the pristine glories of the place, the disaster and desolation which had swept over it, and the sad but still stately memories which cling about it yet. Smetana's music has a stamp and a spirit of its own, and this piece is fervid, romantic, grandiose, agitated and pathetic by turns. It opens with a swelling, free prelude for the harp, out of which develop harmonies in the wooden wind and horns which are half chant and half processional. Then with the entrance of the full orchestra, the movement increases and the passions arise contestingly until the nobility of the past is torn away, and nothing is left to brood upon what once was so high and proud.

Following this came Mendelssohn's "Fingal's Cave" overture, whose cavern soundings and sea storms are always fresh in spirit; Beethoven's seventh symphony; Berlioz's fascinating arrangement of Weber's "Invitation to the Dance," and Tschaikowsky's high wrought, high-colored, clangorous, turbulent and vehemently noisy "1812" overture, from before which many who had heard it before arose and fled.

The orchestral work was all of the highest order. In the Smetana were grace, breadth, dignity, depth and sentiment; in the Beethoven delicacy, softness and reserve for the andante, vivacity for the scherzo and immense energy for the finale; in the Berlioz a splendid dash and sparkle; in the Mendelssohn the dreamy and the earnest found expression; and in the Tschaikowsky harmonious uproar voluminously prevailed.

For the last concert Mr. Paur announces that Wagner programme which recently brought New York criticism to its senses in regard to this orchestra and its triumphs. The programme stands thus: 'Rienzi," overture; "Siegfried," Idyll; A "Faust" overture; "Lohengrin," prelude to Act III.; "Siegfried," Waldweben; "Tristan and Isolde," prelude and love death; "Die Meistersinger," prelude.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, APRIL 26, 1896.

Enjoyable Program at Symphony Concert.

An unusually varied and thoroughly enjoyable program was provided by conductor Paur for last evening's symphony concert. The offerings were:

Symphonic poem, Vyschrad (My Country, No. 1,) first time.....Bedrich Smetana
Overture to Fingal's Cave, in B minor, op 26.....Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy
Symphony No. 7, in A major, op 92
Ludwig van Beethoven
Invitation to the dance.....Karl Maria Von Weber
(Scored for orchestra by Hector Berlios.)
Overture, 1812, in E-flat major, op 49
Peter Ilyitch Tschaikowsky

Mr Carl Baermann was announced as soloist, but owing to a sudden illness he was unable to appear.

Rarely has the orchestra played more brilliantly, every number was given with splendid spirit, expression and artistic finish. The ahdience was cordially appreciative and bestowed more applause upon the orchestra than is often granted at these concerts.

The "Vysehrad" is the first of a series of seven symphonic poems written by Smetana and entitled "My Country." It is descriptive music in the strict meaning of the term and is written in modern style. The score is very elaborate, its interpretation requiring the full resources of the symphony orchestra. Drums, cymbals and trumpets are very prominent and the composition is, for the most part, of a patriotic and pulse-moving character. Its performance was heartily applauded.

The overture, "Fingal's Cave," was also heard with great pleasure. It is a wonderfully beautiful composition, rich in weirdly suggestive melody and remarkable for effective contrasts of tonal color. The delicate shading of the score was exquisitely portrayed by the orchestra.

Beethoven's magnificent seventh symphony has never been given a more thoroughly satisfying performance. It even excelled former interpretations by Mr Paur, and it has been generally conceded that he is entitled to highest praise for scholarly reading of Beethoven's works. The many and varied dance rhythms with which the symphony abounds were played with charming grace, and the grand harmonies were given with impressive effect. It was an intelligent and faithful interpretation, representative of the individuality of the composer. There was no attempt to "embellish" the work with original ideas; it was simply an honest reading of the score by the able conductor of the best orchestra in the country.

Berlioz' brilliant arrangement of Weber's delightful "Invitation to the Dance" was rarely enjoyable as played last evening, and the audience was stirred to great enthusiasm by the fine performance of Tschaikowsky's showy "1812" overture.

The last symphony concert of the season will be given this week. It will be a Wagner program, and consist of the following selections:

"Rienzi," overture; "Siegfried," idyll; a "Faust" overture; "Lohengrin," prelude to act III; "Siegfried," Waldweben; "Tristan and Isolde," prelude and love-death; "Die Meistersinger," prelude.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, APRIL 26, 1896.

Twenty-Third Concert of the Symphony Orchestra, Emil Paur Conductor, Last Evening in Music Hall.

The program was as follows:

Symphonic Poem, "Wyschehrad" ("My Country," No. 1).....Smetana
(First time.)
Overture to "Fingal's Cave".....Mendelssohn
Symphony No. 7, in A major.....Beethoven
"Invitation to the Dance".....Weber
(Scored for orchestra by Berlioz.)
Overture, "1812".....Tschaikowsky

Smetana's "Wyschehrad" is the first of a cyclus of six—not seven, as the program book states—symphonic poems, entitled "My Country." The second of these, "The Moldau," was played here Dec. 2, 1893; the third, "Scharka," was played here Jan. 26, 1895.

The cyclus is the patriotic tribute of the talented Bohemian to his dearly beloved land. "Wyschehrad" is a far-famed fortress, and the sight of it suggested to the composer the glory and the downfall of Princes and Kings who once inhabited it. "Wyschehrad is become a dumb, deserted monument of past glory; from its ruins resounds the echo of the long silent song of the singer Prince, Lumir, through the sad stillness!"

Here is program music of exotic flavor. Yet there is no slavish attempt at panoramic music. There is the reminder of old-time glory with a dash of semi-barbaric pomp. The harper is for the moment Lumir with his "varyto." There are knights wearing the favors of fair women. A mighty descending scale announces the end of strength and rejoicing, love-lays and pride of battle. It is true that you must read the program to know the exact story; but surely this music has much to say, in the absence of any text, to an imaginative hearer. The originality of the composer is without eccentricity; you know that the occasional quaintness is inherent, not affected; there is an authority in technical treatment, and there is a skill in orchestration that in each case commands respect and admiration. The music is more than interesting; it is poetic. The piece was finely played, as was the beautiful overture by Mendelssohn, which is, perhaps, all in all, the most thoroughly artistic of all his orchestral works.

* * *

I confess that I did not like Mr. Paur's reading of the first movement of the symphony. His announcement of the first theme of the vivace was too conscious and finical. And throughout this movement there was dallying and there were attempts at little effects that made this frank, jolly, impetuous piece of music insincere and tedious. His choice of tempo in the allegretto was happy; but on account of his liberties in the first movement, there was not sufficient contrast between the vivace and the allegretto, and the latter suffered thereby. The scherzo was played with dash, and the association that Chorley refers to as always existing in his mind when he heard the trio did not seem utterly fantastical; for he associated it with the passage of the Egyptian Queen down the Cyndus as described by Shakspeare with the assistance of Sir Thomas North's brave Englishing of Plutarch:

"The barge she sat in, like a burnish'd throne,
Burn'd on the water: the poop was beaten gold."

Paur was seen to best advantage in the finale, for it was given with amazing spirit.

* * *

The orchestral arrangement by Berlioz of Weber's "Invitation to the Dance" is familiar to all concert-goers. Why did not Mr. Paur give us an opportunity of hearing Felix Weingartner's arrangement, which was produced in Berlin Jan. 31 of this year? It is said to be a remarkable composition, not so much as a literal transcription as a free paraphrase. Melodically Weingartner's version is said to be faithful to the original, but he has played all manner of contrapuntal tricks with the material. At the end four different themes are woven together. Aesthetically this is, no doubt, all wrong, but the ingenuity displayed and the splendor of instrumentation have been loudly praised.

Still, the orchestration of Berlioz is probably a richer treat than that of Weingartner, because from what we know of the two men the Frenchman's touch is the more discreetly brilliant. Sensuousness and brilliancy are demanded in such an arrangement, and not a profundity that is incongruous.

Tschaikowsky's "1812" overture, with its church-hymn, its Marsellaise, its Cossack tune, its flame and smoke and fury, its overwhelming popular rejoicing with chiming of bells and throwing hats skyward and irresistible suggestion of free vodka, brought the tumultuous end.

* * *

Mr. Baermann had been announced as the pianist, and his piece was to have been Liszt's second concerto. Siskness prevented his appearance.

PHILIP HALE.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 26, 1896.
(Copyright 1896, Post Publishing Company.)

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

At the twenty-third Symphony last night a potpourri of popular composers was served up for the delectation of the audience. Among the list fine, however, was one whose works are seldom heard here, Smetana, whose symphonic poem, "Vysehrad" (My Country), was heard here for the first time. The number is the first of a cyclus of seven symphonic poems, and considered as a whole the composition is of a dignified, stately character, rather free in form and shows much originality in the general development of its single principal theme. In the opening measures the harp is introduced with charming effect, this instrument being gradually swallowed up in a volume of strings; but the harp reappears several times later on, greatly enhancing the beauty of the number, which is gracefully and smoothly written.

Mendelssohn's overture to "Fingal's Cave" was the second number. It has frequently been heard in past seasons, and as an original, poetic composition it is always welcome. Beethoven's No. 7 symphony followed and was played in a masterly manner. This is one of the most familiar and perhaps the most popular of this composer's symphonies, with the possible exception of his Scotch symphony. Each of the four movements was liberally applauded, though it is always the third, the scherzo, in which an audience always seems to take especial delight.

Mr. Carl Baermann, who was to have been the soloist, was unable to be present through illness, and Weber's "Invitation to the Dance" was substituted in place of his number. This composition, scored for orchestra by Berlioz, is always a favorite in whatever form it is played. On this occasion it was magnificently played, Mr. Paur bringing out all the subtle beauties of the score. That strange, noisy Tschaikowsky overture, "1812," ended the programme, its grand orchestral maelstrom at the close being quite sufficient to suit the lover of noise. It was wildly applauded, which was perhaps an evidence that this wild, furious kind of music is occasionally demanded after all.

The next concert, the last one of the season, will be given over wholly to Wagner, seven of his compositions being down on the programme.

The Boston Traveler

MONDAY, APRIL 27, 1896.

Mr. Baermann Did Not Play, But the Concert Was an Excellent One.

Symphonic poem, "Vysehrad".....Smetana
Overture, "Fingal's Cave".....Mendelssohn
Symphony, A-major.....Beethoven
"Invitation to the Dance".....Weber-Berlios
Overture, "1812".....Tschaikowsky

Mr. Baermann had been expected to play the No. 2 concerto of Liszt, but illness prevented, and there was no soloist. Yet the concert was an extremely good and inspiring one, and everything was played with that lately regained precision and elegance on the part of the orchestra. The Smetana symphonic poem was new to us. His "Vltara," belonging to the My Country" series, is a deserved favorite in Boston, from the poetry of its concepts and the beauty of its scoring. "Vysehrad" is not quite so captivating, and it is programme music that needs the elucidation of Mr. Apthorp's book at every point, which "Vltara" did not. It has very rich and effective scoring, and at times its melodic development is graceful and interesting.

The ever-beautiful "Fingal's Cave" was played with delightful swing and sentiment. Here is tone painting that has never been surpassed. Mendelssohn's waves rise and fall in long, swelling billows, the poetry of motion. The Beethoven symphony was excellently read, and it created a marked impression of renewed freshness and vitality. Nor did Mr. Paur make the mistake of dashing through the finale as if in a hurry to get out of the thing without taking breath.

After a very lovely rendering of the "Invitation to the Dance," came the fury and tumult of "1812." We have now had Tschaikowsky and his best and worst in the same season. The grand "Pathetique" symphony is unsurpassable among modern works; the overture is cheap, bombastic and sensational. It was played with great vigor.

The last concert of the season takes place this week. The programme will be devoted wholly to Wagner and will include the "Rienzi" overture, the "Siegfried" idyl, the "Faust" overture, the prelude to the third act of "Lohengrin," the "Waldweben," from "Siegfried," the prelude and love-death from "Tristan and Isolde" and the "Meistersinger" overture. There will be no soloist.

[12]

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCIX., NO. 117.

SUNDAY, APRIL 26, 1896.

MR. CARL BAERMANN, THE SOLOIST

Twenty-Third Concert of the Season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The 23d concert of the season by the Boston Symphony orchestra was given in Music Hall last evening, with the following programme:

Symphonic poem, "Vysehrad".....Smetana
Overture, "Fingal's Cave".....Mendelssohn
Symphony, A-major.....Beethoven
"Invitation to the Dance".....Weber-Berlioz
Overture, "1812".....Tschaikowsky

Mr. Carl Baermann was to have played Liszt's pianoforte concerto No. 2, but he was unable to appear, on account of illness, and there was no soloist. The Smetana symphonic poem was the novelty among the selections. It is the first of seven compositions in kind, entitled collectively, "My Country." "Vysehrad" is the name of a famous fortress whose pride in its day of strength, whose downfall amid wild scenes of carnage, and whose solitariness in its ruined state the composer essays to paint in music. Smetana thought it necessary to prefix a description of the meaning of the work to his score, but it does little to enlighten the hearer. "Lumir's varyto," "the edifices of the Premslide kings," and "the echo of the long silent song of the singer prince" remain as much a mystery after the last note of the tone poem has sounded as they were before the first note was heard.

It was hard to become interested in "Vysehrad," whether it trembled "with splendid hymns of praise," or with "wild scenes of carnage"; whether it "rises before Lumir's eyes in its former glory," or is become "a dumb, deserted monument." It is programme music, pure and simple, and without the description the composer has given it would puzzle the cleverest solver of musical riddles to discover what it is all about, and even with the guide thus considerately set down, there is nothing for the listener to do but to take it all on trust, for the music says little that is clear and less that makes any very strong appeal to the understanding. It is brilliantly scored, and at times with massive effect, and there is a bit of graceful melody that breaks like a welcome gleam of sunshine through the general cloudiness; but as a whole the work is unimpressive, dull, and almost tedious. Was it by accident or by design that the concert began and ended with compositions inspired by patriotism? The Bohemian was less felicitous than was the Russian. The Tschaikowsky overture is sensational and ear-splitting in its noisiness, and perhaps vulgar in its blatant uproar, but it is at least clear in meaning and exciting in its fire and its steady and massive tread toward its tremendous climax, with its bell ringing, its drum thundering and its hoarse and stormy blare of brass.

The work was read and played with immense vigor, especially in its whirlwind of a coda. The symphony was interpreted by Mr. Paur along traditional lines, perhaps a little rigidly in the first allegro, and yet with an exceptionally careful observance of the nuances. The perenially fresh and beautiful allegretto was charmingly rendered throughout, and the finale was for once taken at a just pace, and not as a means for illustrating how rapidly an orchestra can be driven into playing it without falling into disaster. Berlioz's orchestral version of the Weber waltz was never read with a finer and more intelligent appreciation of its possibilities in regard to color and effect, and more brilliantly and inspiritingly played here than it was last night. The rendering of the poetic Mendelssohn overture was gracefully sympathetic in the reading and perfect in the precision and finish of its performance.

The concert may be ranked among the marked successes of the season. The last concert of the 15th year of the organization will take place next Saturday evening, when the programme will be devoted wholly to Wagner. It includes the "Rienzi" overture, the "Siegfried" idyl, the "Faust" overture, the prelude to the third act of "Lohengrin," the "Waldweben," from "Siegfried"; the prelude and love-death from "Tristan and Isolde" and the "Meistersinger" overture. There will be no soloist.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 26.

The Symphony Concert.

The twenty-third concert of the Symphony orchestra was given in Music Hall, last evening with the following programme:

"Symphonic Poem".....Smetana
Overture, "Fingal's Cave".....Mendelsshon
Symphony No. 7.....Beethoven
Invitation to the Dance.....Weber
(scored by Berlioz).
Overture "1812".....Tschaikowsky

The Smetana work belongs to the programme order or music, and assisted by the descriptive test, one easily understands the intention of the composer and sympathizes with him. He suggests Macpherson's Ossian; there are in both spasmodic outbursts that suggest enthusiasm and cunningly arranged phrases hinting at sentiment. The following brief extracts from the descriptive programme will describe the music: "Warlike fame" in castle courts "brave knights assemble to the sound of cymbals and trumpets" then; "unchained passion overthrows the grand towers," "wild scenes of carnage," "ruins," and a "long-silent song" resounding "through the sad stilness." The music, despite its descriptive character, is most effective in scoring, and it received a fine interpretation from Mr. Paur and his orchestra.

Mr. Baermann, who was to have been the soloist at this concert, was taken suddenly ill at so late an hour that it was impossible to supply his place. The concert, however, was most enjoyable, the Beethoven symphony receiving a masterly interpretation, and the readings and playing throughout being of the highest quality.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 26, 1896.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT, ETC.

Deep, sincere regret fell upon the Music Hall audience to learn that illness would prevent Mr. Carl Baermann from playing, as had been expected, the second pianoforte concerto of Liszt in the course of the twenty-third Symphony programme. For apart from the interest of the composition itself, that artists' penetrant mentality, his approved taste, his sympathetic nature, nervous energy and noble technique especially qualify him for the playing of an author whose composition is often no less puzzling intellectually than it is mechanically exacting.

The programme was necessarily changed, and it began with its one novelty, which Smetana's patriotic poem about the old historic castle of Vysehrad, whose name it bears. It is a sort of "Lay of the Last Minstrel" in little, depicting symbolically the pristine glories of the place, the disaster and desolation which had swept over it, and the sad but still stately memories which cling about it yet. Smetana's music has a stamp and a spirit of its own, and this piece is fervid, romantic, grandiose, agitated and pathetic by turns. It opens with a swelling, free prelude for the harp, out of which develop harmonies in the wooden wind and horns which are half chant and half processional. Then with the entrance of the full orchestra, the movement increases and the passions arise contestingly until the nobility of the past is torn away, and nothing is left to brood upon what once was so high and proud.

Following this came Mendelssohn's "Fingal's Cave" overture, whose cavern soundings and sea storms are always fresh in spirit; Beethoven's seventh symphony; Berlioz's fascinating arrangement of Weber's "Invitation to the Dance," and Tschaikowsky's high wrought, high-colored, clangorous, turbulent and vehemently noisy "1812" overture, from before which many who had heard it before arose and fled.

The orchestral work was all of the highest order. In the Smetana were grace, breadth, dignity, depth and sentiment; in the Beethoven delicacy, softness and reserve for the andante, vivacity for the scherzo and immense energy for the finale; in the Berlioz a splendid dash and sparkle; in the Mendelssohn the dreamy and the earnest found expression; and in the Tschaikowsky harmonious uproar voluminously prevailed.

For the last concert Mr. Paur announces that Wagner programme which recently brought New York criticism to its senses in regard to this orchestra and its triumphs. The programme stands thus: 'Rienzi," overture; "Siegfried," Idyll; A "Faust" overture; "Lohengrin," prelude to Act III.; "Siegfried," Waldweben; "Tristan and Isolde," prelude and love death; "Die Meistersinger," prelude.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, APRIL 26, 1896.

Enjoyable Program at Symphony Concert.

An unusually varied and thoroughly enjoyable program was provided by conductor Paur for last evening's symphony concert. The offerings were:

Symphonic poem, Vyschrad (My Country, No. 1,) first time.....Bedrich Smetana
Overture to Fingal's Cave, in B minor, op 26.....Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy
Symphony No. 7, in A major, op 92
Ludwig van Beethoven
Invitation to the dance.....Karl Maria Von Weber
(Scored for orchestra by Hector Berlioz.)
Overture, 1812, in E-flat major, op 49
Peter Ilyitch Tschaikowsky

Mr Carl Baermann was announced as soloist, but owing to a sudden illness he was unable to appear.

Rarely has the orchestra played more brilliantly, every number was given with splendid spirit, expression and artistic finish. The ahdience was cordially appreciative and bestowed more applause upon the orchestra than is often granted at these concerts.

The "Vysehrad" is the first of a series of seven symphonic poems written by Smetana and entitled "My Country." It is descriptive music in the strict meaning of the term and is written in modern style. The score is very elaborate, its interpretation requiring the full resources of the symphony orchestra. Drums, cymbals and trumpets are very prominent and the composition is, for the most part, of a patriotic and pulse-moving character. Its performance was heartily applauded.

The overture, "Fingal's Cave," was also heard with great pleasure. It is a wonderfully beautiful composition, rich in weirdly suggestive melody and remarkable for effective contrasts of tonal color. The delicate shading of the score was exquisitely portrayed by the orchestra.

Beethoven's magnificent seventh symphony has never been given a more thoroughly satisfying performance. It even excelled former interpretations by Mr Paur, and it has been generally conceded that he is entitled to highest praise for scholarly reading of Beethoven's works. The many and varied dance rhythms with which the symphony abounds were played with charming grace, and the grand harmonies were given with impressive effect. It was an intelligent and faithful interpretation, representative of the individuality of the composer. There was no attempt to "embellish" the work with original ideas; it was simply an honest reading of the score by the able conductor of the best orchestra in the country.

Berlicz' brilliant arrangement of Weber's delightful "Invitation to the Dance" was rarely enjoyable as played last evening, and the audience was stirred to great enthusiasm by the fine performance of Tschaikowsky's showy "1812" overture.

The last symphony concert of the season will be given this week. It will be a Wagner program, and consist of the following selections:

"Rienzi," overture; "Siegfried," idyll; a "Faust" overture; "Lohengrin," prelude to act III; "Siegfried," Waldweben; "Tristan and Isolde," prelude and love-death; "Die Meistersinger," prelude.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, APRIL 26, 1896.

Twenty-Third Concert of the Symphony Orchestra, Emil Paur Conductor, Last Evening in Music Hall.

The program was as follows:

Symphonic Poem, "Wyschehrad" ("My Country," No. 1).....Smetana
(First time.)
Overture to "Fingal's Cave"....Mendelssohn
Symphony No. 7, in A major.....Beethoven
"Invitation to the Dance".....Weber
(Scored for orchestra by Berlioz.)
Overture, "1812" ..... Tschaikowsky

Smetana's "Wyschehrad" is the first of a cyclus of six—not seven, as the program book states—symphonic poems, entitled "My Country." The second of these, "The Moldau," was played here Dec. 2, 1893; the third, "Scharka," was played here Jan. 26, 1895.

The cyclus is the patriotic tribute of the talented Bohemian to his dearly beloved land. "Wyschehrad" is a far-famed fortress, and the sight of it suggested to the composer the glory and the downfall of Princes and Kings who once inhabited it. "Wyschehrad is become a dumb, deserted monument of past glory; from its ruins resounds the echo of the long silent song of the singer Prince, Lumir, through the sad stillness!"

Here is program music of exotic flavor. Yet there is no slavish attempt at panoramic music. There is the reminder of old-time glory with a dash of semi-barbaric pomp. The harper is for the moment Lumir with his "varyto." There are knights wearing the favors of fair women. A mighty descending scale announces the end of strength and rejoicing, love-lays and pride of battle. It is true that you must read the program to know the exact story; but surely this music has much to say, in the absence of any text, to an imaginative hearer. The originality of the composer is without eccentricity; you know that the occasional quaintness is inherent, not affected; there is an authority in technical treatment, and there is a skill in orchestration that in each case commands respect and admiration. The music is more than interesting; it is poetic. The piece was finely played, as was the beautiful overture by Mendelssohn, which is, perhaps, all in all, the most thoroughly artistic of all his orchestral works.

* * *

I confess that I did not like Mr. Paur's reading of the first movement of the symphony. His announcement of the first theme of the vivace was too conscious and finical. And throughout this movement there was dallying and there were attempts at little effects that made this frank, jolly, impetuous piece of music insincere and tedious. His choice of tempo in the allegretto was happy; but on account of his liberties in the first movement, there was not sufficient contrast between the vivace and the allegretto, and the latter suffered thereby. The scherzo was played with dash, and the association that Chorley refers to as always existing in his mind when he heard the trio did not seem utterly fantastical; for he associated it with the passage of the Egyptian Queen down the Cyndus as described by Shakspeare with the assistance of Sir Thomas North's brave Englishing of Plutarch:

"The barge she sat in, like a burnish'd throne,
Burn'd on the water: the poop was beaten gold."

Paur was seen to best advantage in the finale, for it was given with amazing spirit.

* * *

The orchestral arrangement by Berlioz of Weber's "Invitation to the Dance" is familiar to all concert-goers. Why did not Mr. Paur give us an opportunity or hearing Felix Weingartner's arrangement, which was produced in Berlin Jan. 31 of this year? It is said to be a remarkable composition, not so much as a literal transcription as a free paraphrase. Melodically Weingartner's version is said to be faithful to the original, but he has played all manner of contrapuntal tricks with the material. At the end four different themes are woven together. Aesthetically this is, no doubt, all wrong, but the ingenuity displayed and the splendor of instrumentation have been loudly praised.

Still, the orchestration of Berlioz is probably a richer treat than that of Weingartner, because from what we know of the two men the Frenchman's touch is the more discreetly brilliant. Sensuousness and brilliancy are demanded in such an arrangement, and not a profundity that is incongruous.

Tschaikowsky's "1812" overture, with its church-hymn, its Marsellaise, its Cossack tune, its flame and smoke and fury, its overwhelming popular rejoicing with chiming of bells and throwing hats skyward and irresistible suggestion of free vodka, brought the tumultuous end.

* * *

Mr. Baermann had been announced as the pianist, and his piece was to have been Liszt's second concerto. Siskness prevented his appearance.

PHILIP HALE.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 26, 1896.
(Copyright 1896, Post Publishing Company.)

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

At the twenty-third Symphony last night a potpourri of popular composers was served up for the delectation of the audience. Among the list fine, however, was one whose works are seldom heard here, Smetana, whose symphonic poem, "Vysehrad" (My Country), was heard here for the first time. The number is the first of a cyclus of seven symphonic poems, and considered as a whole the composition is of a dignified, stately character, rather free in form and shows much originality in the general development of its single principal theme. In the opening measures the harp is introduced with charming effect, this instrument being gradually swallowed up in a volume of strings; but the harp reappears several times later on, greatly enhancing the beauty of the number, which is gracefully and smoothly written.

Mendelssohn's overture to "Fingal's Cave" was the second number. It has frequently been heard in past seasons, and as an original, poetic composition it is always welcome. Beethoven's No. 7 symphony followed and was played in a masterly manner. This is one of the most familiar and perhaps the most popular of this composer's symphonies, with the possible exception of his Scotch symphony. Each of the four movements was liberally applauded, though it is always the third, the scherzo, in which an audience always seems to take especial delight.

Mr. Carl Baermann, who was to have been the soloist, was unable to be present through illness, and Weber's "Invitation to the Dance" was substituted in place of his number. This composition, scored for orchestra by Berlioz, is always a favorite in whatever form it is played. On this occasion it was magnificently played, Mr. Paur bringing out all the subtle beauties of the score. That strange, noisy Tschaikowsky overture, "1812," ended the programme, its grand orchestral maelstrom at the close being quite sufficient to suit the lover of noise. It was wildly applauded, which was perhaps an evidence that this wild, furious kind of music is occasionally demanded after all.

The next concert, the last one of the season, will be given over wholly to Wagner, seven of his compositions being down on the programme.

The Boston Traveler

MONDAY, APRIL 27, 1896.

Mr. Baermann Did Not Play, But the Concert Was an Excellent One.

Symphonic poem, "Vysehrad".....Smetana
Overture, "Fingal's Cave".....Mendelssohn
Symphony, A-major.....Beethoven
"Invitation to the Dance".....Weber-Berlioz
Overture, "1812".....Tschaikowsky

Mr. Baermann had been expected to play the No. 2 concerto of Liszt, but illness prevented, and there was no soloist. Yet the concert was an extremely good and inspiring one, and everything was played with that lately regained precision and elegance on the part of the orchestra. The Smetana symphonic poem was new to us. His "Vltara," belonging to the My Country" series, is a deserved favorite in Boston, from the poetry of its concepts and the beauty of its scoring. "Vysehrad" is not quite so captivating, and it is programme music that needs the elucidation of Mr. Apthorp's book at every point, which "Vltara" did not. It has very rich and effective scoring, and at times its melodic development is graceful and interesting.

The ever-beautiful "Fingal's Cave" was played with delightful swing and sentiment. Here is tone painting that has never been surpassed. Mendelssohn's waves rise and fall in long, swelling billows, the poetry of motion. The Beethoven symphony was excellently read, and it created a marked impression of renewed freshness and vitality. Nor did Mr. Paur make the mistake of dashing through the finale as if in a hurry to get out of the thing without taking breath.

After a very lovely rendering of the "Invitation to the Dance," came the fury and tumult of "1812." We have now had Tschaikowsky and his best and worst in the same season. The grand "Pathetique" symphony is unsurpassable among modern works; the overture is cheap, bombastic and sensational. It was played with great vigor.

The last concert of the season takes place this week. The programme will be devoted wholly to Wagner and will include the "Rienzi" overture, the "Siegfried" idyl, the "Faust" overture, the prelude to the third act of "Lohengrin," the "Waldweben," from "Siegfried," the prelude and love-death from "Tristan and Isolde" and the "Meistersinger" overture. There will be no soloist.

[12]

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 27, 1896.

Purely Orchestral Programme at the Symphony Concert.

Spite of the disappointment caused by the non-appearance of Mr. Carl Baermann, the purely orchestral programme given on Saturday evening was evidently relished by the large audience in attendance, since there were no departures before the final cadence and the enthusiasm grew steadily more demonstrative from the first number to the last, and both of these numbers happened to be of a very intense national character.

The whole world ought to be interested in the renascence of art which the last half-century has brought forth from Bohemia. The history of that country may be dark enough, its traits often savage and over-intense, but it is a land of poetry nevertheless, and it affords a very short cut to the spirit and style of the middle ages. Not the battle of the White Mountain, not the decree of Maria Theresa aimed at the abolition of the language, was able to crush out altogether the national spirit, and in these present days the poetry and music of the nation are lifting their heads again, like some of the odorous plants, all the more fragrant for the bruises which they have received. What Puchmayer Wocel Czelakowsky and others have done for poetry in the new Bohemia, that Smetana and his pupil Dvorak have done and are doing for music, and when the tonal treasures of Bohemia are fully revealed the whole world will delight in them.

All this as preamble to a very remarkable piece of Czech music celebrating the old Visegrad fortress, composed by Smetana as the first of a set of six national pieces entitled "My Country," this number bearing the name "Vyschrad." It would be impossible for a foreigner to enter into the full meaning of this poetic record of the glories and downfall of the Premysl dynasty in the 13th and 14th centuries, but one cannot but be impressed with the earnestness with which the Bohemian composer tells the story of his fatherland. The bardic beginning upon the harp alone (of course Mr. Schuecker played it nobly) gave just the mediaeval atmosphere necessary to the picture, and from this preluding there was a gradual working up to military fervor, with much trumpeting (also excellently performed) and some crisp and recurring single strokes upon the violins that cut through the music as with a scimetar. But the reminiscence of the former glories, with which the work closed, was of Ossianic melancholy; it pictured a loneliness not unlike that which Mendelssohn used in the finale of the Scotch symphony. The work received a sympathetic reading, but requires more than one hearing in order that its full beauty may be understood.

Mendelssohn's "Hebrides" overture followed. It was given on the programme by its other title—"Fingal's Cave." About a year ago, this double title led a Berlin critic into a dire mistake: "The Hebrides" had been announced on a certain programme and, in reviewing it, our sapient writer stated that "the 'Fingal's Cave' overture would have made a better effect!!!" Mendelssohn was the father of the concert-overture (the overture unattached to any opera or play and intended purely for concert performance) and of all of his works in this vein, none is more attractive or more spontaneous than this particular overture; it is a splendid example of how much of free expression and dramatic power can be obtained in music, without deserting the strict form of the sonata-allegro.

The chief theme of this overture, with its wonderful wave-figure, is one of the famous instances of spontaneity in composition. Mendelssohn was deeply impressed with the Isle of Staffa, in the Hebrides, and in the impression at once transmuted itself into music. "August 7, 1829. ...e wrote to his dearest chum, his sister Fanny: "In order to show you what a strange sensation has come to me on the Hebrides, I jotted down the following, which came into my mind," and enclosed the chief theme of the overture. One can find confirmation of this (it is always well to confirm musical anecdotes,—there are too many fictitious ones) in Hiller's account of his meeting with Mendelssohn after the Scotch voyage; he says: "Mendelssohn has brought with him also the sketch-score of the 'Hebrides' overture. He told me how the thing came to him in its full form and color on his view of Fingal's cave, and he also informed me how the first measures, containing the leading theme, came into his mind." The idea came to him fully clothed in its orchestral dress, for the theme sent to Fanny Mendelssohn is not a mere sketch but a full score, for violins, viola, celli, contrabasses, trumpets and kettledrums!

The ensemble of the performance of the work was excellent, although not all of the delicacy possible was attained. Especially commendable was the work of the violoncellos in the subordinate theme, and the clear presentation of the interesting development. The interpretation won very much applause from the audience.

Now followed Beethoven's seventh symphony, the most romantic of all the nine. Possibly the fact that the composer had fallen in love with Amalia Seebald had something to do with the passion which glows in this particular symphony and also with its many bright touches. One could have borne with more caprice in the performance, particularly in the transition from the introduction to the chief theme of the first movement. The second movement, the gem of the symphony, was admirably played, the ever pulsating figure and the suggestion of constant brooding being poetically interpreted. The horns gave their long organ point with good effect in the trio of the Scherzo, but this same Scherzo seems to the reviewer the weakest point of the work.

The Scherzo form, when following the Minuet lines, has too much of repetition, and here we have Beethoven repeating the trio besides,—prolonging a form that is too long already! The marked tendency of the present age is to do away with the repeats which were borne with such placidity by our forefathers, and one would not be sorry if some day an iconoclast with a pair of shears came along and cut off the last two fifths of this movement. But this idea of repeating a trio led Schumann to the introduction of a second trio in contrast with the first one; and it is astonishing [illegible] did not think of this so quick in fact that one could not hear all of the notes of the chief figure of the first theme, but its brilliancy was exciting; the end of the work was followed by enthusiastic applause, and it was certainly a pleasure to the critic to have, in this number and the one before it, a couple of instances of logical music, works in which it was not deemed necessary to destroy all musical laws before beginning the utterance of passion.

Next came Berlioz's scintillant scoring of Weber's "Invitation to the Dance," and it was given with praiseworthy elasticity and daintiness. Violoncello and flute gave their graphic conversation in a flawless manner. Probably these musical conversations are legitimate enough, but they are somewhat overdone; one recalls the cello wooing the violin in the "Romeo and Juliet" symphony, the English horn sighing for the oboe in the "Symphonie Fantastique," etc., etc. In this instance the violoncello begins conversation at once. One can imagine it about as follows:—

Cello. "Is your card all full? Or can I beg the next?"

Flute. "The next is engaged, but I can give you part of the waltz after."

Cello. "Oh, thank you. Aw'fly warm isn't it? So kind of you!"

Now follows some conversation about the relative merits of the dog and the horse show, the new bicycle costumes, cathode rays, athletic contests at college, etc., etc. Then follows the waltz, after which the flute is escorted to her seat and the cello bids goodbye. Now the audience begins to applaud, but it is too soon; the tiresome fellow, or cello, come back and says—Aw'fly sorry that you can't give me another dance," and then goes off for good. That bothersome Coda! it has no more right to be there than a peroration after an "Amen" in a prayer. It is merely a musical trap for unwary auditors, and it might be as well to abolish it altogether.

Now followed a sweet little slumber song entitled "1812," by Tschaikowsky. On a second hearing, or rather a second deafening, one finds some really great points in this overture, beauty of themes, skill of development, splendor of contrast; but its coda is festival work pure and simple and must ever remain somewhat grotesque and exaggerated when shorn of its legitimate surroundings. The body of the work is not open to this objection, and it was admirably played. The coda was as loud as the explosion of a powder-mill. While we disliked it we must hasten to add that it was "simply stunning." Although not a barcarolle the roar of the serf was plainly audible in its dynamite explosions. The fight between the "Marseillaise" and a Russian melody came to an end in one round, the former being knocked out completely. Mr. Paur maintained his post on the director's stand in a Casabianca-like manner all through the terrific explosions. The public will be glad to learn that his hearing has not been seriously affected. Altogether one can best sum up this remarkable musical earthquake by altering the old Shakesperian quotation and saying that it is "sound and fury, signifying—something."

Louis C. Elson.

NOTE

The Musical Courier.
NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 29, 1896.

The program of the twenty-third Symphony concert was as follows:

Symphonic poem, Wyschehrad.....Smetana
(First Time.)
Overture, Fingal's Cave.....Mendelssohn
Symphony No. 7.....Beethoven
Invitation to the Dance.....Weber-Berlioz
Overture, 1812.....Tschaikowsky

This program differed from the one announced a week ago, which began with the seventh symphony, was followed by the symphonic poem of Smetana, and then announced the appearance of Mr. Carl Baermann with Liszt's second concerto.

Mr. Baermann did not play. It appears that there was a misunderstanding between him and Mr. Paur. Mr. Baermann—the story is known to many musicians here, so I am betraying the confidence of no one—objected at first to his place on the program; then to the tonality of the orchestral works that preceded the concerto. Mr. Paur behaved amiably and generously in the matter; he offered to do everything or anything to make life agreeable to the eminent pianist. But Mr. Baermann, like the policemen in the Pirates of Penzance, was in a highly nervous state, so he took to his bed, and hence the appearance of the overtures by Mendelssohn and Tschaikowsky on the program of last night.

The symphonic poem by Smetana—the first of the cyclus, My Country—is an interesting and impressive example of program music. The fortress Wyschehrad reminds the composer of the glory of the princes and kings that once inhabited it. He remembers the pomp, the tourney, the knights and the noble dames, the clang of battle and the delight in the fight. He, alas! remembers also the downfall, the present melancholy and the horrid stillness.

Now in such panoramic music a program is indispensable to the hearer who wishes to put his finger on each particular spot, the hearer that feels a thrill of pride because he is able to recognize the cuckoo in the pastoral symphony, and is uneasy until the bird utters the irritating notes. And yet the music itself interests without any gloss and commentary. You feel that the exotic flavor of the harmonic progressions is inherent and of the soil; not searched after, not brought in a vial by abstemious camel over prolix plains. The program book says that the composition is "absolutely free in form." Look me in the eye, Mr. Apthorp, now that you have heard the piece, and repeat the statement without a wink!

This symphonic poem was nobly played, as was the Fingal's Cave overture. But Mr. Paur made sad work of the first movement of the symphony. He coquetted like a college widow with the hilarious and healthy first theme of the vivace, and all through the movement he sought after effects. The result was that the music seemed labored, insincere and tedious. The allegretto suffered, for there was not any marked contrast. The most satisfactory of the movements was the finale, for there was a nice appreciation of tempo, and the orchestra played with amazing spirit.

The audience was highly delighted with the Invitation to the Dance, but, if only for gratifying curiosity, Weingartner's arrangement would have been a more welcome number.

Tschaikowsky's overture, with church hymn, Marseillaise, Cossack tune, flame and smoke and fury, overwhelming popular rejoicing, chiming of bells, throwing hats skyward, vodka flowing in the streets, brought a tumultuous end.

PHILIP HALE.

MONDAY, APRIL 27, 1896.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orches...

The programme of the twenty-third S... phony Concert, given in the Music Hall ... Saturday evening, was as follows:

Smetana: Symphonic Poem, "Vyschrad" ("Ma Vlast," No. 1).
Mendelssohn: Overture to "Fingal's Cave," opus 26.
Beethoven: Symphony No. 7, in A major, opus 92.
Weber: "Invitation à la Valse."
(Scored for Orchestra by Berlioz).
Tschaikowsky: Overture, "1812," opus 49.

Smetana's "Vyschrad"—on the old Bohemian fortress of that name, and the first symphonic poem in his cyclus "Ma Vlast"—was given for the first time in Boston on this occasion. Two other poems in the cyclus have already been heard here—"Vltava" and "Sarka." The "Vyschrad" is not without a certain dignified beauty, if tending a little in the direction of the commonplace at times. It is sonorously scored, without noisiness, and is pleasant to listen to once. It was admirably played.

Mendelssohn's "Fingal's Cave," to our thinking the most perfect of his concert overtures, is always welcome. It does not perhaps show the wonderful wealth of musical invention one finds in his "Midsummer Night's Dream," but in perfection of development it touches Mendelssohn's high-water mark. It was excellently well played.

Of the performance of Beethoven's seventh symphony may be said heartily that, in point of technical perfection and beauty of tone, it can rank only with what is finest that our orchestra has yet done. In other respects, however, it calls for a much more restricted admiration. Saving the slow introduction (Poco sostenuto) of the first movement, and the whole of the finale, it seemed to us a direct slap in the face of Beethoven's great work. The main body (Vivace) of the first movement was taken at a tempo that recalled nothing more forcibly than the first timid reading-at-sight of a difficult composition by an amateur orchestra. A more melancholy "Vivace" were hard to imagine. Then that terrible monotony in the "modifications of the tempo!" An accelerando coming regularly at the beginning of every crescendo, with a correspondingly regular slargando just before the end of the climax. This sort of thing is not expressiveness; it is nervous debility. It has been remarked of the second movement of this symphony how almost without exception Berlioz and other French writers of his day speak of it as "the adagio." Was Mr. Paur's tempo a tribute to this mistake of French musicians? Could the walls of the Ruth Burrage room speak, they could tell of many an eight-hand performance of this Allegretto—for it is an Allegretto, not an Adagio—at just this tempo. But the eight-hand readings in the Ruth Burrage room often go slow for excellent practical reasons with which our Symphony Orchestra has nothing to do. The scherzo went more nearly fast enough, though in the main rather too sedately; the slow tempo of the trio is unusual, though we own to liking it. The finale went just right; that is, not too fast. This movement is often played ventre a terre, as if to the crack of the ringmaster's long whip; Mr. Paur is to be thanked for taking it no faster than it is possible to "think it."

Berlioz's inimitable orchestral version of Weber's bewitching "Invitation" went to a charm; such playing of such music is a pure delight.

The oftener one hears Tschaikowsky's "1812," the more does one find in it. Few "occasional" compositions have so much fine stuff, so much excellent workmanship, in them. It was well played on Saturday evening, if without that tremendous volume of tone in the coda that has marked previous performances of the work.

The Mendelssohn and Tschaikowsky overtures were put upon the programme at the last moment, to take the place of Liszt's A major pianoforte concerto, announced to be played by Mr. Carl Baermann. The news of Mr. Baermann's illness came too late for the management to secure another solo performer.

The next—twenty-fourth and last—concert will bring a Wagner programme: overture to "Rienzi;" Siegfried-Idyll; Eine Fause-Ouvertüre; prelude to Act III. of "Lohengrin;" "Waldweben" from "Siegfried;" Prelude and "Isoldens Liebestod" from "Tristan und Isolde;" prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg."

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.

MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 27, 1896.

Purely Orchestral Programme at the Symphony Concert.

Spite of the disappointment caused by the non-appearance of Mr. Carl Baermann, the purely orchestral programme given on Saturday evening was evidently relished by the large audience in attendance, since there were no departures before the final cadence and the enthusiasm grew steadily more demonstrative from the first number to the last, and both of these numbers happened to be of a very intense national character.

The whole world ought to be interested in the renascence of art which the last half-century has brought forth from Bohemia. The history of that country may be dark enough, its traits often savage and over-intense, but it is a land of poetry nevertheless, and it affords a very short cut to the spirit and style of the middle ages. Not the battle of the White Mountain, not the decree of Maria Theresa aimed at the abolition of the language, was able to crush out altogether the national spirit, and in these present days the poetry and music of the nation are lifting their heads again, like some of the odorous plants, all the more fragrant for the bruises which they have received. What Puchmayer Wocel Czelakowsky and others have done for poetry in the new Bohemia, that Smetana and his pupil Dvorak have done and are doing for music, and when the tonal treasures of Bohemia are fully revealed the whole world will delight in them.

All this as preamble to a very remarkable piece of Czech music celebrating the old Visegrad fortress, composed by Smetana as the first of a set of six national pieces entitled "My Country," this number bearing the name "Vysehrad." It would be impossible for a foreigner to enter into the full meaning of this poetic record of the glories and downfall of the Premysl dynasty in the 13th and 14th centuries, but one cannot but be impressed with the earnestness with which the Bohemian composer tells the story of his fatherland. The bardic beginning upon the harp alone (of course Mr. Schuecker played it nobly) gave just the mediaeval atmosphere necessary to the picture, and from this preluding there was a gradual working up to military fervor, with much trumpeting (also excellently performed) and some crisp and recurring single strokes upon the violins that cut through the music as with a scimetar. But the reminiscence of the former glories, with which the work closed, was of Ossianic melancholy; it pictured a loneliness not unlike that which Mendelssohn used in the finale of the Scotch symphony. The work received a sympathetic reading, but requires more than one hearing in order that its full beauty may be understood.

Mendelssohn's "Hebrides" overture followed. It was given on the programme by its other title—"Fingal's Cave." About a year ago, this double title led a Berlin critic into a dire mistake: "The Hebrides" had been announced on a certain programme and, in reviewing it, our sapient writer stated that "the 'Fingal's Cave' overture would have made a better effect!!!" Mendelssohn was the father of the concert-overture (the overture unattached to any opera or play and intended purely for concert performance) and of all of his works in this vein, none is more attractive or more spontaneous than this particular overture; it is a splendid example of how much of free expression and dramatic power can be obtained in music, without deserting the strict form of the sonata-allegro.

The chief theme of this overture, with its wonderful wave-figure, is one of the famous instances of spontaneity in composition. Mendelssohn was deeply impressed with the Isle of Staffa, in the Hebrides, and in the impression at once transmuted itself into music. "August 7, 1829. ...e wrote to his dearest chum, his sister Fanny: "In order to show you what a strange sensation has come to me on the Hebrides, I jotted down the following, which came into my mind," and enclosed the chief theme of the overture. One can find confirmation of this (it is always well to confirm musical anecdotes,—there are too many fictitious ones) in Hiller's account of his meeting with Mendelssohn after the Scotch voyage: he says: "Mendelssohn has brought with him also the sketch-score of the 'Hebrides' overture. He told me how the thing came to him in its full form and color on his view of Fingal's cave, and he also informed me how the first measures, containing the leading theme, came into his mind." The idea came to him fully clothed in its orchestral dress, for the theme sent to Fanny Mendelssohn is not a mere sketch but a full score, for violins, viola, celli, contrabasses, trumpets and kettledrums!

The ensemble of the performance of the work was excellent, although not all of the delicacy possible was attained. Especially commendable was the work of the violoncellos in the subordinate theme, and the clear presentation of the interesting development. The interpretation won very much applause from the audience.

Now followed Beethoven's seventh symphony, the most romantic of all the nine. Possibly the fact that the composer had fallen in love with Amalia Seebald had something to do with the passion which glows in this particular symphony and also with its many bright touches. One could have borne with more caprice in the performance, particularly in the transition from the introduction to the chief theme of the first movement. The second movement, the gem of the symphony, was admirably played, the ever pulsating figure and the suggestion of constant brooding being poetically interpreted. The horns gave their long organ point with good effect in the trio of the Scherzo, but this same Scherzo seems to the reviewer the weakest point of the work.

The Scherzo form, when following the Minuet lines, has too much of repetition, and here we have Beethoven repeating the trio besides,—prolonging a form that is too long already! The marked tendency of the present age is to do away with the repeats which were borne with such placidity by our forefathers, and one would not be sorry if some day an iconoclast with a pair of shears came along and cut off the last two fifths of this movement. But this idea of repeating a trio led Schumann to the introduction of a second trio in contrast with the first one; and it is astonishing that Beethoven did not think of this

The finale was taken at a rattling pace, so quick in fact that one could not hear all of the notes of the chief figure of the first theme, but its brilliancy was exciting; the end of the work was followed by enthusiastic applause, and it was certainly a pleasure to the critic to have, in this number and the one before it, a couple of instances of logical music, works in which it was not deemed necessary to destroy all musical laws before beginning the utterance of passion.

Next came Berlioz's scintillant scoring of Weber's "Invitation to the Dance," and it was given with praiseworthy elasticity and daintiness. Violoncello and flute gave their graphic conversation in a flawless manner. Probably these musical conversations are legitimate enough, but they are somewhat overdone; one recalls the cello wooing the violin in the "Romeo and Juliet" symphony, the English horn sighing for the oboe in the "Symphonie Fantastique," etc., etc. In this instance the violoncello begins conversation at once. One can imagine it about as follows:—

Cello. "Is your card all full? Or can I beg the next?"

Flute. "The next is engaged, but I can give you part of the waltz after."

Cello. "Oh, thank you. Aw'fly warm isn't it? So kind of you!"

Now follows some conversation about the relative merits of the dog and the horse show, the new bicycle costumes, cathode rays, athletic contests at college, etc., etc. Then follows the waltz, after which the flute is escorted to her seat and the cello bids goodbye. Now the audience begins to applaud, but it is too soon; the tiresome fellow, or cello, come back and says—Aw'fly sorry that you can't give me another dance," and then goes off for good. That bothersome Coda! it has no more right to be there than a peroration after an "Amen" in a prayer. It is merely a musical trap for unwary auditors, and it might be as well to abolish it altogether.

Now followed a sweet little slumber song entitled "1812," by Tschaikowsky. On a second hearing, or rather a second deafening, one finds some really great points in this overture, beauty of themes, skill of development, splendor of contrast; but its coda is festival work pure and simple and must ever remain somewhat grotesque and exaggerated when shorn of its legitimate surroundings. The body of the work is not open to this objection, and it was admirably played. The coda was as loud as the explosion of a powder-mill. While we disliked it we must hasten to add that it was "simply stunning." Although not a barcarolle the roar of the serf was plainly audible in its dynamite explosions. The fight between the "Marseillaise" and a Russian melody came to an end in one round, the former being knocked out completely. Mr. Paur maintained his post on the director's stand in a Casabianca-like manner all through the terrific explosions. The public will be glad to learn that his hearing has not been seriously affected. Altogether one can best sum up this remarkable musical earthquake by altering the old Shakesperian quotation and saying that it is "sound and fury, signifying—something."

Louis C. Elson.

NOTE

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 29, 1896.

The program of the twenty-third Symphony concert was as follows:

Symphonic poem, Wyschehrad.....Smetana
(First Time.)
Overture, Fingal's Cave.....Mendelssohn
Symphony No. 7.....Beethoven
Invitation to the Dance.....Weber-Berlioz
Overture, 1812.....Tschaikowsky

This program differed from the one announced a week ago, which began with the seventh symphony, was followed by the symphonic poem of Smetana, and then announced the appearance of Mr. Carl Baermann with Liszt's second concerto.

Mr. Baermann did not play. It appears that there was a misunderstanding between him and Mr. Paur. Mr. Baermann—the story is known to many musicians here, so I am betraying the confidence of no one—objected at first to his place on the program; then to the tonality of the orchestral works that preceded the concerto. Mr. Paur behaved amiably and generously in the matter; he offered to do everything or anything to make life agreeable to the eminent pianist. But Mr. Baermann, like the policemen in the Pirates of Penzance, was in a highly nervous state, so he took to his bed, and hence the appearance of the overtures by Mendelssohn and Tschaikowsky on the program of last night.

The symphonic poem by Smetana—the first of the cyclus, My Country—is an interesting and impressive example of program music. The fortress Wyschehrad reminds the composer of the glory of the princes and kings that once inhabited it. He remembers the pomp, the tourney, the knights and the noble dames, the clang of battle and the delight in the fight. He, alas! remembers also the downfall, the present melancholy and the horrid stillness.

Now in such panoramic music a program is indispensable to the hearer who wishes to put his finger on each particular spot, the hearer that feels a thrill of pride because he is able to recognize the cuckoo in the pastoral symphony, and is uneasy until the bird utters the irritating notes. And yet the music itself interests without any gloss and commentary. You feel that the exotic flavor of the harmonic progressions is inherent and of the soil; not searched after, not brought in a vial by abstemious camel over prolix plains. The program book says that the composition is "absolutely free in form." Look me in the eye, Mr. Apthorp, now that you have heard the piece, and repeat the statement without a wink!

This symphonic poem was nobly played, as was the Fingal's Cave overture. But Mr. Paur made sad work of the first movement of the symphony. He coquetted like a college widow with the hilarious and healthy first theme of the vivace, and all through the movement he sought after effects. The result was that the music seemed labored, insincere and tedious. The allegretto suffered, for there was not any marked contrast. The most satisfactory of the movements was the finale, for there was a nice appreciation of tempo, and the orchestra played with amazing spirit.

The audience was highly delighted with the Invitation to the Dance, but, if only for gratifying curiosity, Weingartner's arrangement would have been a more welcome number.

Tschaikowsky's overture, with church hymn, Marseillaise, Cossack tune, flame and smoke and fury, overwhelming popular rejoicing, chiming of bells, throwing hats skyward, vodka flowing in the streets, brought a tumultuous end.

Philip Hale.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, APRIL 27, 1896.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the twenty-third Symphony Concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:
Smetana: Symphonic Poem, "Vysehrad" ("Ma Vlast," No. 1).
Mendelssohn: Overture to "Fingal's Cave," opus 26.
Beethoven: Symphony No. 7, in A major, opus 92.
Weber: "Invitation à la Valse."
(Scored for Orchestra by Berlioz).
Tschaikowsky: Overture, "1812," opus 49.

Smetana's "Vysehrad"—on the old Bohemian fortress of that name, and the first symphonic poem in his cyclus "Ma Vlast"—was given for the first time in Boston on this occasion. Two other poems in the cyclus have already been heard here—"Vltava" and "Sarka." The "Vysehrad" is not without a certain dignified beauty, if tending a little in the direction of the commonplace at times. It is sonorously scored, without noisiness, and is pleasant to listen to once. It was admirably played.

Mendelssohn's "Fingal's Cave," to our thinking the most perfect of his concert overtures, is always welcome. It does not perhaps show the wonderful wealth of musical invention one finds in his "Midsummer Night's Dream," but in perfection of development it touches Mendelssohn's high-water mark. It was excellently well played.

Of the performance of Beethoven's seventh symphony may be said heartily that, in point of technical perfection and beauty of tone, it can rank only with what is finest that our orchestra has yet done. In other respects, however, it calls for a much more restricted admiration. Saving the slow introduction (Poco sostenuto) of the first movement, and the whole of the finale, it seemed to us a direct slap in the face of Beethoven's great work. The main body (Vivace) of the first movement was taken at a tempo that recalled nothing more forcibly than the first timid reading-at-sight of a difficult composition by an amateur orchestra. A more melancholy "Vivace" were hard to imagine. Then that terrible monotony in the "modifications of the tempo!" An accelerando coming regularly at the beginning of every crescendo, with a correspondingly regular slargando just before the end of the climax. This sort of thing is not expressiveness; it is nervous debility. It has been remarked of the second movement of this symphony how almost without exception Berlioz and other French writers of his day speak of it as "the adagio." Was Mr. Paur's tempo a tribute to this mistake of French musicians? Could the walls of the Ruth Burrage room speak, they could tell of many an eight-hand performance of this Allegretto—for it is an Allegretto, not an Adagio—at just this tempo. But the eight-hand readings in the Ruth Burrage room often go slow for excellent practical reasons with which our Symphony Orchestra has nothing to do. The scherzo went more nearly fast enough, though in the main rather too sedately; the slow tempo of the trio is unusual, though we own to liking it. The finale went just right; that is, not too fast. This movement is often played ventre a terre, as if to the crack of the ringmaster's long whip; Mr. Paur is to be thanked for taking it no faster than it is possible to "think it."

Berlioz's inimitable orchestral version of Weber's bewitching "Invitation" went to a charm; such playing of such music is a pure delight.

The oftener one hears Tschaikowsky's "1812," the more does one find in it. Few "occasional" compositions have so much fine stuff, so much excellent workmanship, in them. It was well played on Saturday evening, if without that tremendous volume of tone in the coda that has marked previous performances of the work.

The Mendelssohn and Tschaikowsky overtures were put upon the programme at the last moment, to take the place of Liszt's A major pianoforte concerto, announced to be played by Mr. Carl Baermann. The news of Mr. Baermann's illness came too late for the management to secure another solo performer.

The next—twenty-fourth and last—concert will bring a Wagner programme: overture to "Rienzi;" Siegfried-Idyll; Eine Fause-Ouvertüre; prelude to Act III. of "Lohengrin;" "Waldweben" from "Siegfried;" Prelude and "Isoldens Liebestod" from "Tristan und Isolde;" prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg."

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. LVIX., NO. 124.

SUNDAY, MAY 3, 1896.

CLOSING SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Fifteenth Season Ended in a Storm of Applause.

A Wagner Night — Brilliant Programme Brilliantly Interpreted — Conductor Paur and His Orchestra at Their Best — Large Audience Very Enthusiastic in Its Approval.

Last evening the Boston Symphony orchestra gave its closing concert of its 15th season, with the following Wagner programme:

Overture to "Rienzi."
A "Siegfried" Idyl.
A "Faust" overture.
Prelude to act 3 of "Lohengrin."
"Forest Sounds," from "Siegfried," act 2.
Prelude and "Isolde's Love-Death," from "Tristan and Isolde."
Prelude to "The Master Singers of Nuremberg."

There was an immense audience, and the enthusiasm over the performances was very great. The selections had all been heard here many times, but never when they were more splendidly interpreted from beginning to end. Mr. Paur had arranged his programme with exceeding felicity, and in an order that gave every contrast that was possible. In addition, the works given were of a nature that permitted them to be separated from their original surroundings without doing violence to them; in other words, they were purely orchestral.

Listening to Wagner in so large an instalment, however, emphasizes very impressively his limitations, especially in his more sentimental vein. The "Siegfried" Idyl, the "Waldweben" and the "Liebestod" are very much alike in effect, color and treatment. There is a short and sensuous theme which modulates ceaselessly through a wide variety of keys; there is a long crescendo that works up to a powerful climax and stops suddenly when it gets there, and then it begins pianissimo again, and starts afresh in another crescendo with the same aim and result; there is an unexpected fortissimo, followed immediately by an equally unexpected pianissimo; and there comes, invariably, a moment when the horn plays the calm and sugary theme against an agitated accompaniment by the strings. There is also a crescendo whenever the music ceases its chromatic harmonies to modulate into a major triad, and other devices that impart a mannerism to the score that is almost perfunctory in effect, owing to the certainty with which they may be anticipated. Taken by itself, each of these compositions is abundant in beauty, but when heard one after the other, they sound singularly alike, particularly in their instrumentation and its dynamic coloring.

Then, too, it appeared as if Wagner were losing his freshness in his purely orchestral music, and that something resembling a worn out fashion was creeping slowly over him. Familiarity with a style which, not so very long ago was striking in its originality, in its overturning of old methods and in its then unparalleled richness, has made it possible to listen to him with less of wonder at his daring and impressive innovations; the novelty has worn off, and the effects, so persistently repeated, are beginning to grow stale.

However, these considerations in no wise derogate from the magnificently brilliant performances of last night. Mr. Paur's readings were surprisingly flexible and sympathetic, and never has the masterly quality of his skill and intellectuality of his conducting been made more satisfyingly clear than by his efforts at this concert. The "Rienzi" overture, with its noise and the circus-recalling themes of its allegro, was given with exciting dramatic fire and gorgeousness of tone-color, and the crabbed "Faust" overture was interpreted with an intelligence and a force that for once made it not only clear, but interesting. Very beautiful was the reading of the "Waldweben," especially in its discreetly and effectively marked changes of temps, and the "Lohengrin" prelude was given with a dash and a vigor that aroused the audience to a prolonged demand for an encore, which, of course, was not accorded.

In fact, the entire programme was nobly given, and it may be confidently said that Wagner was shown at his very best by the thoughtful and masterly treatment he received at the hands of Mr. Paur, who, more than ever, proved himself to be the right man in the right place.

Of the glorious playing of the orchestra too much cannot be written in the way of admiring tribute. Nothing finer or more perfect has been heard from it. A more brilliant evidence of its capacity and its discipline could not possibly be imagined.

The plaudits were frequent and stormy through the whole evening. Mr. Paur was greeted with prolong applause on his first appearance at the conductor's stand, and at the end of the concert was recalled again and again by way of a hearty and warmly appreciative leave-taking.

SYMPHONY SEASON IN BOSTON

Review of the Work of the Famous Orchestra.

The Music, the Composers and the Soloists — "Robin Hood," "The Huguenots" and Sousa's Band This Week's Musical Attractions — The "Pops" Soon to Begin Again.

With last night's concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, a notice of which will be found in another column, the 15th season of that organization ended. In point of interest it has been fully as strong as any of its predecessors, and the efficiency of the splendid orchestra has never reached a higher point. Mr. Paur has convincingly established himself as a conductor of the first rank, and has increased in favor with his public [illegible] of the [illegible] concerts have not been invariably well [illegible] but the same may be said of all the conductors who came before him except Mr. Henschel, who seems to have had a special gift in this regard. The trouble seems to lie with the brief space of time within which it has become the rule to limit these concerts. It is not always easy to give the necessary variety in a performance that it has become an unwritten law to confine within an hour and a half. The modern symphony fills out the better part of an hour, and an instrumental solo absorbs the greater portion of the time remaining, and what is left for other music? Very little. Still, now and then the programmes have been unnecessarily monotonous, not to say dull, though this season has been an improvement on the last in this respect. Of the performances, however, it may be justly said that they have been, on the whole, of greater freedom, brilliancy and general perfection than ever before.

A new and strong interest would be imparted to the coming season, of which the opening concert is to take place Saturday evening, Oct. 7, if the programmes included a large choral work now and then. There is no reason why they should not include some of the great oratorios. Four such entertainments might be given, with the assistance of a picked chorus, numbering not more than 150, or at the most 200, singers. The works selected should be those which have not become hackneyed through too frequent performances here. It is scarcely open to doubt that such an innovation would be warmly welcomed by the patrons of these concerts, in the opportunities it would afford them to hear choral masterpieces properly presented, after such careful and thorough rehearsing as that which is the rule for the performances of the Boston Symphony orchestra. It is to be hoped that Mr. Higginson and Mr. Paur may take this suggestion into consideration in their plans for next season.

A list of the works performed this season is here given in the alphabetical order of their composers:

SYMPHONIES.

Beethoven. Symphony No. 5, in C minor, opus 67. Symphony No. 1, in C major, opus 21. Symphony No. 6, in F major, "Pastorale," opus 68. Symphony No. 7, in A major, opus 92.
Berlioz. Symphony No. 3, "Harold en Italie," opus 16. Three movements from the "Romeo et Juliette" symphony, opus 17.
Brahms. Symphony No. 1, in C minor, opus 68. Symphony No. 4, in E minor, opus 98. Symphony No. 2, in D major, opus 73.
Dvorak. Symphony No. 2, in D minor, opus 70.
Goetz. Symphony in F major, opus 9.
Goldmark. Symphony No. 1, in E-flat major, "Landliche Hochzeit," opus 26.
Haydn. Symphony in G major, "Surprise."
Mendelssohn. Symphony No. 3, in A minor, "Scotch," opus 56.
Mozart. Symphony in D major, "Parisian." Symphony in G minor (Kochel, No. 550).
Raff. Symphony No. 5, in E major, "Lenore," opus 177.
Rubinstein. Symphony No. 4, in D minor, "Dramatic," opus 95.
Schubert. Unfinished symphony in B minor.
Schumann. Symphony No. 1, in B-flat major, opus 38.
Strube, G. Symphony in C minor, MS., opus 11.
Tschaikowsky. Symphony No. 6, in B minor, "Pathetique," opus 74 (twice).

SUITES.

Bach. Suite in D major.
Foote. Suite in D minor, opus 36.
Godard. Suite No. 1, from "Jocelyn."
Lalo. Suite, "Namouna."
MacDowell. Suite in A minor, opus 42. Suite No. 2, in E minor, "Indian," opus 48.

OVERTURES AND SYMPHONIC POEMS.

D'Albert. Prelude to "Der Rubin."
Beethoven. Overture to "Leonore," No. 3, opus 72. Overture, "Die Weihe des Hauses," opus 124. Overture to "Egmont," opus 84. Overture to "Konig Stephan," opus 117.
Berlioz. Overture to "Le Corsaire," opus 21.
Bizet. Overture, "Patrie."
Borodin. "Eine Steppen-Skizze aus Mittel-Asien."
Brahms. Tragische Ouverture, opus 81. Akademische Fest-Ouverture, opus 80.
Chadwick. Dramatic overture, "Melpomene."
Dvorak. Overture, "In der Natur," opus 91.
Goldmark. Overture to "Sakuntala," opus 13.
Liszt. Symphonic Poem No. 2, "Tasso."
Mendelssohn. Overture to "Fingal's Cave," opus 26.
Nesnicek. Overture to "Donna Diana."
Rubinstein. Overture to "Dimitri Donskoi."
Saint-Saens. Symphonic Poem, "Le Rouet d'Omphale," opus 31.
Schumann. Overture to "Genoveva," opus 81.
Smetana. Symphonic Poem, "Vyschrad."
Spohr. Overture to "Jessonda," opus 63.
Strauss, R. Preludes to Acts I. and II. of "Guntram."
Tschaikowsky. Fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini," opus 32. Overture-Fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet." Overture, "1812," opus 49.
Volkmann. Festival Overture in F major, opus 50.
Wagner. Overture to "Der fliegende Hollander." Prelude to "Lohengrin." Overture to "Rienzi." Eine Faust-Overture. Prelude to Act III. of "Lohengrin." Prelude to "Tristan und Isolde." Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg."
Weber. Overture to "Oberon." Overture to "Abu Hassan."
Zollner, H. "Mittermacht bei Sedan."

CONCERTOS AND INSTRUMENTAL SOLOS.

Beethoven. Concerto for violin, in D major, opus 61 (Franz Ondricek).
Brahms. Concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, in B-flat major, opus 83 (Rafael Joseffy).
Bruch. Fantasia for violin on Scotch Folk-melodies, opus 46 (Timothee Adamowski).
Moszkowski. Concerto for violin, in C major, opus 30 (Emile Sauret).
Raff. Concerto for pianoforte, in C minor, opus 185 (Carl Faelten).
Saint-Saens. Concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, in G minor, opus 22 (given twice: Martinus Sieveking and Antoinette Szumowska).
Schumann. Concerto for violoncello, in A minor, opus 129 (Leo Schulz).
Vieuxtemps. Concerto for violin, No. 4, in D minor, opus 31 (Marsick).
Viotti. Concerto for violin, No. 22, in A minor (Franz Kneisel).

SCENAS, ARIAS, SONGS.

Bach. Aria, "Mein Glaubiges Herze (Caroline Gardner Clark).
Beethoven. Scena and Aria, "Ah! Perfido," opus 65 (Mme. De Vere-Saplo).
Delibes. "La Legende de la Fille du Paria," from "Lakme" (Mme. Melba).
Gounod. Aria from "La Reine de Saba" (Caroline Gardiner Clarke).
Handel. Recitative, "Deep and Deeper Still," and aria, "Waft Her, Angels," from "Jeptha" (Ben Davies).
Henschel. Song, with orchestra, "Spring" (Mrs. Henschel). Ballad, with pianoforte, "Jung Dietrich," opus 45 (Georg Henschel).
Lang, M. R. Concert aria, "Armida," MS., opus 24 (Gertrude Franklin).
Liszt. Song, with orchestra, "Kennst du das Land?" (Mrs. Henschel).
Meyerbeer. Arioso, "Ah! mon fils," from "Le Prophete" (Rosa Olitzka).
Mozart. Aria, "Parto, Parto," from "La Clemenza di Tito" (Rosa Olitzka).
Parry, Dr. C. H. "King Saul's Dream" (Georg Henschel).
Saint-Saens. Air, "Mon coeur s'ouvre a ta voix," from "Samson et Dalila" (Kate Rolla).
Thomas, A. Ophelie's mad-scene from "Hamlet" (Mme. De Vere-Saplo).
Wagner. Elizabeth's Greeting, from "Tannhauser" (Mme. Melba); Walther's prieslied, from "Die Meistersinger" (Ben Davies).

MISCELLANEOUS.

Brahms. Three Hungarian dances, Nos. 15, 17, 21 (scored by Dvorak).
Dvorak. Scherzo Capriccioso in D flat major, opus 66.
Handel. Largo from "Serse" (arranged by Hellmesberber).
Humperdinck. Dream-Pantomime from "Hansel und Gretel."
Liszt. Hungarian Rhapsody No. 2 (scored by Muller-Berghaus).
Mozart. Andante and variations in D minor, from Divertimento No. 3. Turkish march from Sonata in A major (scored by Herbeck).
Schubert. Fantasia in F minor (scored by Mottl). Trauer-Marschin E flat minor (scored by Liszt).
Strauss, R. "Till Eulenspiegels lustige Streiche."
Wagner. Huldigungs-Marsch. Siegfried-Idyll. "Waldweben," from "Siegfried." Isoldens Liebestod, from "Tristan und Isolde."
Weber. Invitation a la Valse (scored by Berlioz).

Of resident composers, Mr. G. W. Chadwick, Mr. A. Foote, Mr. E. A. MacDowell, Miss M. R. Lang, and Mr. G. Strube were represented. The soloists were, in alphabetical order: Mr. Timothee Adamowski, Miss Caroline Gardner Clarke, Mr. Ben Davies, Mr. Carl Faelten, Miss Gertrude Franklin, Mr. Georg Henschel, Mrs. Georg Henschel, Mr. Rafael Joseffy, Mr. Franz Kneisel, Mr. M. Marsick, Mme. Melba, Miss Rosa Olitzka, Mr. Franz Ondricek, Mme. Kate Rolla, Mr. Emile Sauret, Mr. Leo Schulz, Mr. Martinus Sieveking, Miss Antoinette Szumowska, Mme. De Vere-Sapio.

Beethoven was represented by 10 compositions, and Wagner by 12. Brahms comes next with seven works, and Mozart and Tschaikowsky follow with five works each. Schubert and Schumann and Berlioz were each heard in three works. Hayden was heard in one! The total number of compositions given during the season was 105. Of these, omitting vocal solos, 17 were given for the first time, the most important being Tschaikowsky's "Francesca da Rimini," Mr. Strube's symphony, Mr. MacDowell's "Indian" suite, Mr. Foote's suite and Mozart's andante and variations.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, MAY 3, 1896.

Last Symphony Concert.

The last of this season's Symphony concerts in Music hall was given yesterday evening. The size of the audience was limited only by the capacity of the hall, and the heartiness of the applause bestowed upon Conductor Paur was pleasing evidence of the high regard which Bostonians have for this admirably equipped leader.

The program last evening was composed exclusively of works by Richard Wagner. The selections were:

Overture to "Rienzi"; A "Siegfried" Idyl; a "Faust" overture; prelude to act III of "Lohengrin"; "Forest Sounds," from "Siegfried," act II; prelude and "Isolde's Love-Death," from "Tristan and Isolde"; prelude to "The Master Singers of Nuremberg."

Extended comment upon the performance of these works is quite unnecessary. Most of them have been played before by the Symphony orchestra, and the interpretations have been of unvarying excellence. The love music of "Tristan and Isolde" had not before been heard at these concerts, and the performance yesterday revealed more beauties in the score than was made evident by the orchestras of the several opera companies which have given the work here.

Mr Paur deserves to be warmly complimented for the able maner in which he has directed the Boston Symphony orchestra during the three years it has been in his charge. Under his intelligent direction the orchestra has attained a degree of excellence unapproached heretofore. The discipline of the organization has been perfect, and the results attained most gratifying.

During Mr Paur's first season in charge of the orchestra he had to overcome many obstacles, not the least discouraging of which was the non-support, even hindrance of certain influential people, whose devotion to a former conductor was so great that they refused to recognize any merit in his successor.

The real worth of the man as a musician, his conscientious performance of the duties assigned him, and his courteous and unassuming manners have gradually overcome the unreasonable prejudice against him, and he can now count among his most cordial supporters many of those who two years ago looked upon him with slight favor.

That Mr Paur shall continue in charge of the Symphony orchestra is the very evident desire of the majority of its patrons.

In the matter of program arrangement and selections Mr Paur has given general satisfaction, although there has naturally been a difference of opinion on this subject. It is impossible to satisfy the tastes of all.

His selections have been made from works of standard classic character, as a rule, but he has not denied recognition to new composers, neither has he refused to occasionally give his audience the pleasure of hearing a light and tuneful composition. His readings have been faithful to the composers, for Mr Paur is not one of those conceited conductors who endeavor to improve upon the original.

In yesterday's program were printed several interesting tabulations, compiled by Mr F. R. Comee, assistant manager of the Symphony.

In addition to the usual summary of works played during the year, Mr Comee publishes a list of all the soloists who have appeared in these concerts since the founding of the orchestra in 1881.

Piano soloists have been given chief recognition, for they have appeared at 103 of the concerts. Next among the instrumentalists come the violinists, with a record of 71 appearances. Soloists on the cello have been heard 22 times, the flute four times, the harp three times and the oboe, clarinet and horn once each. Among vocal soloists sopranos are far in the lead, having been heard at 79 concerts. The times that other vocalists appeared were: Altos 37, tenors 25 and basses 35. On five occasions readers have appeared instead of singers.

From the record of last year it is learned that 116 compositions were played, representing 46 composers. There were 23 symphonies, six serenades and suites, 37 preludes, overtures and symphonic poems, 10 concertos and instrumental solos, 16 vocal compositions, scenas, arias, etc, and 15 miscellaneous compositions. As in previous years Wagner was heard most frequently, 12 of his works having ben played. Beethoven comes next with 10 selections, then Brahms with seven and Mozart and Tschaikowsky with five each. There were 19 soloists.

---

[123]

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, MAY 3.

The Symphony Concert.

The twenty-fourth and final concert of the Symphony Orchestra was given in Music Hall last evening. The following is the programme, all the works being by Wagner:

Overture—"Rienzi."
Idyll—"Siegfried."
A "Faust" overture.
"Lohengrin"—Prelude to Act 3.
Waldweben—"Siegfried."
Prelude and Love Potion—"Tristan and Isolde."
Prelude—"Diemeistersinger."

Mr. Paur shows rare skill as an interpreter of Wagner's music, and it is doubtful if equally satisfactory readings by other conductors have been heard here. In the first place, there is an absence of affectation and a suggestion of ownership that mark the conducting of leaders like Mr. Seidl, and the works are approached from the viewpoint of music, and not from that of hero worship. The results are broadness, vigor, brilliancy, spirit, and a feeling that is without a trace of morbid sentimentalism. Wagner is no longer an experiment; the statue is securely niched in the temple of fame, and there is no longer need of making a laborious attempt to hold up the pedestal. It is undeniable that the music loses when separated from its eye-delighting accessories, and that a specimen instrumental brick is unsatisfactory as an illustration of Wagner's wonderful and complex tone palaces; but the specimens were of value and their high meaning was unmistakable. The selection from "Siegfried," the Waldweben, was delightfully interpreted. In variety of tone colors, in fine contrasts, in finish of details it was faultless, and the dervading pastoral sentiment was admirably preserved. Throughout the programme the characteristic spirit of each selection was in full evidence, and the playing of the orchestra was as finished and as artistically satisfying as was the conducting.

The season ended brilliantly, and, casting a brief backward glance at the ground gone over, it is only common justice to congraatulate Mr. Paur and his orchestra on the fine art work they have done. One must always remember, in criticising the programmes, the restraints forced on the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra. It is a fashionable tradition here that the limits of a classic concert must not exceed one hour and a half, and even this length of time is irksome to many lovers of instrumental music. Under the circumstances a greatly varied programme is not possible, especially when one of the items on the programme must be a symphony lasting three-quarters of an hour to an hour. Symphonies of value are not written every day, Tschaikowski's swan song being a rarity; and, despite the progress in musical taste, it is still profitable to hear ard rehear what Mozart and Beethoven have bequeathed us in this line. Novelties, however, have not been wanting; with his liberal policy and sympathy with native talent. Mr. Paur produced the Symphony in C-minor, by Mr. Gustav Strube, and among the works marked "first time" there were Humperdinck's Dream Pantomime from "Hänsel and Gretel;" Tschaikowsky's "Francesca di Rimini;" Richard Strauss's preludes to acts I. and II. of "Guntran;" Eugen d'Albert's prelude to "The Ruby;" Dvorak's overture, "Nature;" Bizet's overture, "Patric;" Rubinstein's overture to "Demetrius of the Don;" Mr. MacDowell's Suite, No. 2, in E minor; Benjamin Godard's Orchestral Suite from "Jocelyn"; Zollners orchestral fantasia "Midnight at Sedan"; Richard Strauss's "Till Eulensprigels Merry Pranks"; Mr. Arthur Foote's suite in D minor; Dr. Parry's scene and aria "King Saul's Dream"; and Smetana's Symphonic Poem "Vysehrad." The soloists were Miss Caroline Clark, Mr. Franz Ondricek, Mr. Rafael Joseffy, Mr. Marrick, Miss Antoinette Szumowska, Mr. Ben Davies, Mrs. Georg Henchel, Mr. Leo Schulz, Mr. Emil Sauret, Mme. Kate Rolla, Mme. Melba, Miss Rose Olitzka, Mr. M. Sieveking, Mr. Franz Kneisel, Mr. Carl Faelten and Mr. Georg Henschel.

There is variety enough here, and it is difficult to see how the selections could have been bettered. At least it may be safely asserted that during the present season, the Symphony orchestra reached the highest level of artistic excellence it has yet attained, and this is due not only to the skill of the musicians, but to the talents, taste, musicianly knowledge and wide experience of their conductor, Mr. Emil Paur; a conductor whose equal has yet to be seen in our good city of Boston.

The closing concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, last evening, suggests the opening night of the Music Hall Promenade concerts, which is fixed for Monday evening, May 11th. It will be the 11th season of these very popular entertainments and the opening concert will be the 568th performance. A brief résume of these concerts, showing their duration and the conductors by seasons may be of interest: 1885, July 11 to Oct. 3, Mr. Ad. Neuendorff, 73 performances; 1886, June 5 to Sep. 25, Mr. John C. Mullaly, 97 performances; 1887, June 11 to Sept. 3, Mr. Wilhelm Reitzel and Mr. Ad. Neuendorff, 73 performances; 1888, May 23 to Sept. 22, Mr. Franz Kneisel and Mr. Ad. Neuendorff, 102 performances; 1889, June 1 to July 6, Mr. Ad. Neuendorff, 31 performances; 1890, No concerts; 1891, June 1 to July 11, Mr. T. Adamowski and Mr. E. Gruenberg 36 performances; 1892, May 31 to July 9, Mr. T. Adamowski, 35 performances; 1893, June 3 to July 15, Mr. T. Admowski, 31 performances; 1894, May 12 to July 7, Mr. T. Adamowski, 45 performances; 1895, May 11 to July 6, Mr. A. De Novellis, 44 performances: If one should ask for an explanation of the continued and unquestioned popularity of these summer concerts, the answer would naturally be governed by the individual taste of the person to whom the query was addressed. The safe general assertion is that the admirable orchestra of 50 members selected from the ranks of the Symphony, the attractiveness of the programmes, which are within the reach of all, even those having a moderate knowledge of music and the general air of genteel Bohemia which pervades the whole entertainment, would be the most comprehensive explanation of the success that has attended these concerts ever since their beginning in 1885. The concerts will be conducted upon the same general plan as last season, and evenings will be devoted to special composers, request programmes and other equally attractive features. The conductor will be Mr. Max Zach, who has been for ten years a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and who will be pleasantly remembered by patrons as the composer of several very popular waltzes and marches which have been played in the past season under his direction. Mr. Zach was born in 1864, at Lemberg, in Austria. His early musical education was received at home, under the direction of Prof. Czerwinski for the piano, and Prof. [illegible]ckman for the violin. Even while Mr. Zach was [illegible]school he was a member of the local Conservator[illegible]estra, which gave several Symphony concerts.

In 1880, upon determining to become a professional musician, Mr. Zach went to the Vienna Conservatory, where he studied the violin, first under Bachrich and later under Prof. Grun. While studying harmony with Prof. Robert Fuchs and counterpoint with Prof. Krenn, Mr. Zach also did military duty, serving in the band of the regiment, under A. Czibulka, up to the time of his joining the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1886. It is worthy of note that Mr. Zach will be the sixth conductor of the Promenade concerts to be taken from the ranks of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and there is every reason to believe that the popular approval bestowed upon his predecessors will be extended to him.

In the absence of Manager C. A. Ellis in Europe, the concerts will be under the direction of Assistant Manager F. R. Comee.

— An interesting and instructive list of the soloists of the Symphony Concerts since their organization in 1881 was published last week. It was compiled by Mr. F. R. Comee (assistant manager of the orchestra), and some idea of its extent may be gained from the fact that it includes 387 names, divided as follows: Sopranos, 79; altos, 37; tenors, 25; bassos, [illegible] anists, 103; violinists, 71; cellists, 22; flutists, 4, [illegible]ist 1; clarinetist, 1; horn solist, 1; harpists, 3 and [illegible]ers, 5.

— Mr. and Mrs. E. B. Mears and their family, of Philadelphia, were guests at The Thorndike part of last week, en route to their summer home at Bar Harbor.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCIX., NO. 124.

SUNDAY, MAY 3, 1896.

CLOSING SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Fifteenth Season Ended in a Storm of Applause.

A Wagner Night — Brilliant Programme Brilliantly Interpreted — Conductor Paur and His Orchestra at Their Best — Large Audience Very Enthusiastic in Its Approval.

Last evening the Boston Symphony orchestra gave its closing concert of its 15th season, with the following Wagner programme:

Overture to "Rienzi."
A "Siegfried" Idyl.
A "Faust" overture.
Prelude to act 3 of "Lohengrin."
"Forest Sounds," from "Siegfried," act 2.
Prelude and "Isolde's Love-Death," from "Tristan and Isolde."
Prelude to "The Master Singers of Nuremberg."

There was an immense audience, and the enthusiasm over the performances was very great. The selections had all been heard here many times, but never when they were more splendidly interpreted from beginning to end. Mr. Paur had arranged his programme with exceeding felicity, and in an order that gave every contrast that was possible. In addition, the works given were of a nature that permitted them to be separated from their original surroundings without doing violence to them; in other words, they were purely orchestral.

Listening to Wagner in so large an instalment, however, emphasizes very impressively his limitations, especially in his more sentimental vein. The "Siegfried" Idyl, the "Waldweben" and the "Liebestod" are very much alike in effect, color and treatment. There is a short and sensuous theme which modulates ceaselessly through a wide variety of keys; there is a long crescendo that works up to a powerful climax and stops suddenly when it gets there, and then it begins pianissimo again, and starts afresh in another crescendo with the same aim and result; there is an unexpected fortissimo, followed immediately by an equally unexpected pianissimo; and there comes, invariably, a moment when the horn plays the calm and sugary theme against an agitated accompaniment by the strings. There is also a crescendo whenever the music ceases its chromatic harmonies to modulate into a major triad, and other devices that impart a mannerism to the score that is almost perfunctory in effect, owing to the certainty with which they may be anticipated. Taken by itself, each of these compositions is abundant in beauty, but when heard one after the other, they sound singularly alike, particularly in their instrumentation and its dynamic coloring.

Then, too, it appeared as if Wagner were losing his freshness in his purely orchestral music, and that something resembling a worn out fashion was creeping slowly over him. Familiarity with his style which, not so very long ago was so striking in its originality, in its overturning of old methods and in its then unparalleled richness, has made it possible to listen to him with less of wonder at his daring and impressive innovations; the novelty has worn off, and the effects, so persistently repeated, are beginning to grow stale.

However, these considerations in no wise derogate from the magnificently brilliant performances of last night. Mr. Paur's readings were surprisingly flexible and sympathetic, and never has the masterly quality of his skill and intellectuality of his conducting been made more satisfyingly clear than by his efforts at this concert. The "Rienzi" overture, with its noise and the circus-recalling themes of its allegro, was given with exciting dramatic fire and gorgeousness of tone-color, and the crabbed "Faust" overture was interpreted with an intelligence and a force that for once made it not only clear, but interesting. Very beautiful was the reading of the "Waldweben," especially in its discreetly and effectively marked changes of temps, and the "Lohengrin" prelude was given with a dash and a vigor that aroused the audience to a prolonged demand for an encore, which, of course, was not accorded. In fact, the entire programme was nobly given, and it may be confidently said that Wagner was shown at his very best by the thoughtful and masterly treatment he received at the hands of Mr. Paur, who, more than ever, proved himself to be the right man in the right place.

Of the glorious playing of the orchestra too much cannot be written in the way of admiring tribute. Nothing finer or more perfect has been heard from it. A more brilliant evidence of its capacity and its discipline could not possibly be imagined.

The plaudits were frequent and stormy through the whole evening. Mr. Paur was greeted with prolong applause on his first appearance at the conductor's stand, and at the end of the concert was recalled again and again by way of a hearty and warmly appreciative leave-taking.

SYMPHONY SEASON IN BOSTON

Review of the Work of the Famous Orchestra.

The Music, the Composers and the Soloists — "Robin Hood," "The Huguenots" and Sousa's Band This Week's Musical Attractions — The "Pops" Soon to Begin Again.

With last night's concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, a notice of which will be found in another column, the 15th season of that organization ended. In point of interest it has been fully as strong as any of its predecessors, and the efficiency of the splendid orchestra has never reached a higher point. Mr. Paur has convincingly established himself as a conductor of the first rank, and has increased in favor with his public as a sympathetic interpreter of the great musical masterpieces. His programmes have not been invariably well selected, but the same may be said of all the conductors who came before him except Mr. Henschel, who seems to have had a special gift in this regard. The trouble seems to lie with the brief space of time within which it has become the rule to limit these concerts. It is not always easy to give the necessary variety in a performance that it has become an unwritten law to confine within an hour and a half. The modern symphony fills out the better part of an hour, and an instrumental solo absorbs the greater portion of the time remaining, and what is left for other music? Very little. Still, now and then the programmes have been unnecessarily monotonous, not to say dull, though this season has been an improvement on the last in this respect. Of the performances, however, it may be justly said that they have been, on the whole, of greater freedom, brilliancy and general perfection than ever before.

A new and strong interest would be imparted to the coming season, of which the opening concert is to take place Saturday evening, Oct. 7, if the programmes included a large choral work now and then. There is no reason why they should not include some of the great oratorios. Four such entertainments might be given, with the assistance of a picked chorus, numbering not more than 150, or at the most 200, singers. The works selected should be those which have not become hackneyed through too frequent performances here. It is scarcely open to doubt that such an innovation would be warmly welcomed by the patrons of these concerts, in the opportunities it would afford them to hear choral masterpieces properly presented, after such careful and thorough rehearsing as that which is the rule for the performances of the Boston Symphony orchestra. It is to be hoped that Mr. Higginson and Mr. Paur may take this suggestion into consideration in their plans for next season.

A list of the works performed this season is here given in the alphabetical order of their composers:

SYMPHONIES.

Beethoven. Symphony No. 5, in C minor, opus 67. Symphony No. 1, in C major, opus 21. Symphony No. 6, in F major, "Pastorale," opus 68. Symphony No. 7, in A major, opus 92.
Berlioz. Symphony No. 3, "Harold en Italie," opus 16. Three movemnts from the "Romeo et Juliette" symphony, opus 17.
Brahms. Symphony No. 1, in C minor, opus 68. Symphony No. 4, in E minor, opus 98. Symphony No. 2, in D major, opus 73.
Dvorak. Symphony No. 2, in D minor, opus 70.
Goetz. Symphony in F major, opus 9.
Goldmark. Symphony No. 1, in E-flat major, "Landliche Hochzeit," opus 26.
Haydn. Symphony in G major, "Surprise."
Mendelsohn. Symphony No. 3, in A minor, "Scotch," opus 53.
Mozart. Symphony in D major, "Parisian." Symphony in G minor (Kochel, No. 550).
Raff. Symphony No. 5, in E major, "Lenore," opus 117.
Rubinstein. Symphony No. 4, in D minor, "Dramatic," opus 95.
Schubert. Unfinished symphony in B minor.
Schumann. Symphony No. 1, in B-flat major, opus 38.
Strube, G. Symphony in C minor, MS., opus 11.
Tschaikowsky. Symphony No. 6, in B minor, "Pathetique," opus 74 (twice).

SUITES.

Bach. Suite in D major.
Foote. Suite in D minor, opus 36.
Godard. Suite No. 1, from "Jocelyn."
Lalo. Suite, "Namouna."
MacDowell. Suite in A minor, opus 42. Suite No. 2, in E minor, "Indian," opus 48.

OVERTURES AND SYMPHONIC POEMS.

D'Albert. Prelude to "Der Rubin."
Beethoven. Overture to "Leonore," No. 3, opus 72. Overture, "Die Weihe des Hauses," opus 124. Overture to "Egmont," opus 84. Overture to "Konig Stephan," opus 117.
Berlioz. Overture to "Le Corsaire," opus 21.
Bizet. Overture, "Patrie."
Borodin. "Eine Steppen-Skizze aus Mittel-Asien."
Brahms. Tragische Ouverture, opus 81. Akademische Fest-Ouverture, opus 80.
Chadwick. Dramatic overture, "Melpomene."
Dvorak. Overture, "In der Natur," opus 91.
Goldmark. Overture to "Sakuntala," opus 13.
Liszt. Symphonic Poem No. 2, "Tasso."
Mendelssohn. Overture to "Fingal's Cave," opus 26.
Reznicek. Overture to "Donna Diana."
Rubinstein. Overture to "Dimitri Donskoi."
Saint-Saens. Symphonic Poem, "Le Rouet d'Omphale," opus 31.
Schumann. Overture to "Genoveva," opus 81.
Smetana. Symphonic Poem, "Vysehrad."
Spohr. Overture to "Jessonda," opus 63.
Strauss, R. Preludes to Acts I. and II. of "Guntram."
Tschaikowsky. Fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini," opus 32. Overture-Fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet." Overture, "1812," opus 49.
Volkmann. Festival Overture in F major, opus 50.
Wagner. Overture to "Der fliegende Hollander." Prelude to "Lohengrin." Overture to "Rienzi." Eine Faust-Overture. Prelude to Act III. of "Lohengrin." Prelude to "Tristan und Isolde." Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg."
Weber. Overture to "Oberon." Overture to "Abu Hassan."
Zollner, H. "Mitternacht bei Sedan."

CONCERTOS AND INSTRUMENTAL SOLOS.

Beethoven. Concerto for violin, in D major, opus 61 (Franz Ondricek).
Brahms. Concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, in B-flat major, opus 83 (Rafael Joseffy).
Bruch. Fantasia for violin on Scotch Folk-melodies, opus 46 (Timothee Adamowski).
Moszkowski. Concerto for violin, in C major, opus 30 (Emile Sauret).
Raff. Concerto for pianoforte, in C minor, opus 185 (Carl Faelten).
Saint-Saens. Concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, in G minor, opus 22 (given twice: Martinus Sieveking and Antoinette Szumowska).
Schumann. Concerto for violoncello, in A minor, opus 129 (Leo Schulz).
Vieuxtemps. Concerto for violin, No. 4, in D minor, opus 31 (Marsick).
Viotti. Concerto for violin, No. 22, in A minor (Franz Kneisel).

SCENAS, ARIAS, SONGS.

Bach. Aria. "Mein Glaubiges Herze (Caroline Gardner Clark).
Beethoven. Scena and Aria, "Ah! Perfido," opus 65 (Mme. De Vere-Sapio).
Delibes. "La Legende de la Fille du Paria," from "Lakme" (Mme. Melba).
Gounod. Aria from "La Reine de Saba" (Caroline Gardiner Clarke).
Handel. Recitative, "Deep and Deeper Still," and aria, "Waft Her, Angels," from "Jeptha" (Ben Davies).
Henschel. Song, with orchestra, "Spring" (Mrs. Henschel). Ballad, with pianoforte, "Jung Dietrich," opus 45 (Georg Henschel).
Lang, M. R. Concert aria, "Armida," MS., opus 24 (Gertrude Franklin).
Liszt. Song, with orchestra, "Kennst du das Land?" (Mrs. Henschel).
Meyerbeer. Arioso, "Ah! mon fils," from "Le Prophete" (Rosa Olitzka).
Mozart. Aria, "Parto, Parto," from "La Clemenza di Tito" (Rosa Olitzka).
Parry, Dr. C. H. "King Saul's Dream" (Georg Henschel).
Saint-Saens. Air, "Mon coeur s'ouvre a ta voix," from "Samson et Dalila" (Kate Rolla).
Thomas, A. Ophelie's mad-scene from "Hamlet" (Mme. De Vere-Sapio).
Wagner. Elizabeth's Greeting, from "Tannhauser" (Mme. Melba); Walther's preislied, from "Die Meistersinger" (Ben Davies).

MISCELLANEOUS.

Brahms. Three Hungarian dances, Nos. 15, 17, 21 (scored by Dvorak).
Dvorak. Scherzo Capriccioso in D flat major, opus 66.
Handel. Largo from "Serse" (arranged by Hellmesberber).
Humperdinck. Dream-Pantomime from "Hansel und Gretel."
Liszt. Hungarian Rhapsody No. 2 (scored by Muller-Berghaus).
Mozart. Andante and variations in D minor, from Divertimento No. 3. Turkish march from Sonata in A major (scored by Herbeck).
Schubert. Fantasia in F minor (scored by Mottl). Trauer-Marschin E flat minor (scored by Liszt).
Strauss, R. "Till Eulenspiegels lustige Streiche."
Wagner. Huldigungs-Marsch. Siegfried-Idyll. "Waldweben," from "Siegfried." Isoldens Liebestod, from "Tristan und Isolde."
Weber. Invitation a la Valse (scored by Berlioz).

Of resident composers, Mr. G. W. Chadwick, Mr. A. Foote, Mr. E. A. MacDowell, Miss M. R. Lang, and Mr. G. Strube were represented. The soloists were, in alphabetical order: Mr. Timothee Adamowski, Miss Caroline Gardner Clarke, Mr. Ben Davies, Mr Carl Faelten, Miss Gertrude Franklin, Mr. Georg Henschel. Mrs. Georg Henschel, Mr. Rafael Joseffy, Mr. Franz Kneisel, Mr. M. Marsick. Mme. Melba, Miss Rosa Olitzka, Mr. Franz Ondricek, Mme. Kate Rolla, Mr. Emile Sauret, Mr. Leo Schulz, Mr. Martinus Sieveking, Miss Antoinette Szumowska, Mme. De Vere-Sapio.

Beethoven was represented by 10 compositions, and Wagner by 12. Brahms comes next with seven works, and Mozart and Tschaikowsky follow with five works each. Schubert and Schumann and Berlioz were each heard in three works. Hayden was heard in one! The total number of compositions given during the season was 105. Of these, omitting vocal solos, 17 were given for the first time, the most important being Tschaikowsky's "Francesca da Rimini," Mr. Strube's symphony, Mr. MacDowell's "Indian" suite, Mr. Foote's suite and Mozart's andante and variations.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, MAY 3, 1896.

Last Symphony Concert.

The last of this season's Symphony concerts in Music hall was given yesterday evening. The size of the audience was limited only by the capacity of the hall, and the heartiness of the applause bestowed upon Conductor Paur was pleasing evidence of the high regard which Bostonians have for this admirably equipped leader.

The program last evening was composed exclusively of works by Richard Wagner. The selections were:

Overture to "Rienzi"; A "Siegfried" Idyl; a "Faust" overture; prelude to act III of "Lohengrin"; "Forest Sounds," from "Siegfried," act II; prelude and "Isolde's Love-Death," from "Tristan and Isolde"; prelude to "The Master Singers of Nuremberg."

Extended comment upon the performance of these works is quite unnecessary. Most of them have been played before by the Symphony orchestra, and the interpretations have been of unvarying excellence. The love music of "Tristan and Isolde" had not before been heard at these concerts, and the performance yesterday revealed more beauties in the score than was made evident by the orchestras of the several opera companies which have given the work here.

Mr Paur deserves to be warmly complimented for the able maner in which he has directed the Boston Symphony orchestra during the three years it has been in his charge. Under his intelligent direction the orchestra has attained a degree of excellence unapproached heretofore. The discipline of the organization has been perfect, and the results attained most gratifying.

During Mr Paur's first season in charge of the orchestra he had to overcome many obstacles, not the least discouraging of which was the non-support, even hindrance of certain influential people, whose devotion to a former conductor was so great that they refused to recognize any merit in his successor.

The real worth of the man as a musician, his conscientious performance of the duties assigned him, and his courteous and unassuming manners have gradually overcome the unreasonable prejudice against him, and he can now count among his most cordial supporters many of those who two years ago looked upon him with slight favor.

That Mr Paur shall continue in charge of the Symphony orchestra is the very evident desire of the majority of its patrons.

In the matter of program arrangement and selections Mr Paur has given general satisfaction, although there has naturally been a difference of opinion on this subject. It is impossible to satisfy the tastes of all.

His selections have been made from works of standard classic character, as a rule, but he has not denied recognition to new composers, neither has he refused to occasionally give his audience the pleasure of hearing a light and tuneful composition. His readings have been faithful to the composers, for Mr Paur is not one of those conceited conductors who endeavor to improve upon the original.

In yesterday's program were printed several interesting tabulations, compiled by Mr F. R. Comee, assistant manager of the Symphony.

In addition to the usual summary of works played during the year, Mr Comee publishes a list of all the soloists who have appeared in these concerts since the founding of the orchestra in 1881.

Piano soloists have been given chief recognition, for they have appeared at 103 of the concerts. Next among the instrumentalists come the violinists, with a record of 71 appearances. Soloists on the cello have been heard 22 times, the flute four times, the harp three times and the oboe, clarinet and horn once each. Among vocal soloists sopranos are far in the lead, having been heard at 79 concerts. The times that other vocalists appeared were: Altos 37, tenors 25 and basses 35. On five occasions readers have appeared instead of singers.

From the record of last year it is learned that 116 compositions were played, representing 46 composers. There were 23 symphonies, six serenades and suites, 37 preludes, overtures and symphonic poems, 10 concertos and instrumental solos, 16 vocal compositions, scenas, arias, etc, and 15 miscellaneous compositions. As in previous years Wagner was heard most frequently, 12 of his works having ben played. Beethoven comes next with 10 selections, then Brahms with seven and Mozart and Tschaikowsky with five each. There were 19 soloists.

[123]

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, MAY 3.

The Symphony Concert.

The twenty-fourth and final concert of the Symphony Orchestra was given in Music Hall last evening. The following is the programme, all the works being by Wagner:

Overture—"Rienzi."
Idyll—"Siegfried."
A "Faust" overture.
"Lohengrin"—Prelude to Act 3.
Waldweben—"Siegfried."
Prelude and Love Potion—"Tristan and Isolde."
Prelude—"Diemeistersinger."

Mr. Paur shows rare skill as an interpreter of Wagner's music, and it is doubtful if equally satisfactory readings by other conductors have been heard here. In the first place, there is an absence of affectation and a suggestion of ownership that mark the conducting of leaders like Mr. Seidl, and the works are approached from the viewpoint of music, and not from that of hero worship. The results are broadness, vigor, brilliancy, spirit, and a feeling that is without a trace of morbid sentimentalism. Wagner is no longer an experiment; the statue is securely niched in the temple of fame, and there is no longer need of making a laborious attempt to hold up the pedestal. It is undeniable that the music loses when separated from its eye-delighting accessories, and that a specimen instrumental brick is unsatisfactory as an illustration of Wagner's wonderful and complex tone palaces; but the specimens were of value and their high meaning was unmistakable. The selection from "Siegfried," the Waldweben, was delightfuly interpreted. In variety of tone colors, in fine contrasts, in finish of details it was faultless, and the dervading pastoral sentiment was admirably preserved. Throughout the programme the characteristic spirit of each selection was in full evidence, and the playing of the orchestva was as finished and as artistically satisfying as was the conducting.

The season ended brilliantly, and, casting a brief backward glance at the ground gone over, it is only common justice to congraatulate Mr. Paur and his orchestra on the fine art work they have done. One must always remember, in criticising the programmes, the restraints forced on the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra. It is a fashionable tradition here that the limits of a classic concert must not exceed one hour and a half, and even this length of time is irksome to many lovers of instrumental music. Under the circumstances a greatly varied programme is not possible, especially when one of the items on the programme must be a symphony lasting three-quarters of an hour to an hour. Symphonies of value are not written every day, Tschaikowski's swan song being a rarity; and, despite the progress in musical taste, it is still profitable to hear and rehear what Mozart and Beethoven have bequeathed us in this line. Novelties, however, have not been wanting; with his liberal policy and sympathy with native talent. Mr. Paur produced the Symphony in C-minor, by Mr. Gustav Strube, and among the works marked "first time" there were Humperdinck's Dream Pantomime from "Hänsel and Gretel;" Tschaikowsky's "Francesca di Rimini;" Richard Strauss's preludes to acts I. and II. of "Guntran;" Eugen d'Albert's prelude to "The Ruby;" Dvorak's overture, "Nature;" Bizet's overture, "Patrie;" Rubinstein's overture to "Demetrius of the Don;" Mr. MacDowell's Suite, No. 2, in E minor; Benjamin Godard's Orchestral Suite from "Jocelyn"; Zollners orchestral fantasia "Midnight at Sedan"; Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspriegels Merry Pranks"; Mr. Arthur Foote's suite in D minor; Dr. Parry's scene and aria "King Saul's Dream"; and Smetana's Symphonic Poem "Vysehrad." The soloists were Miss Caroline Clark, Mr. Franz Ondricek, Mr. Rafael Joseffy, Mr. Marrick, Miss Antoinette Szumowska, Mr. Ben Davies, Mrs. Georg Henchel, Mr. Leo Schulz, Mr. Emil Sauret, Mme. Kate Rolla, Mme. Melba, Miss Rose Olitzka, Mr. M. Sieveking, Mr. Franz Kneisel, Mr. Carl Faelten and Mr. Georg Henschel.

There is variety enough here, and it is difficult to see how the selections could have been bettered. At least it may be safely asserted that during the present season, the Symphony orchestra reached the highest level of artistic excellence it has yet attained, and this is due not only to the skill of the musicians, but to the talents, taste, musicianly knowledge and wide experience of their conductor, Mr. Emil Paur; a conductor whose equal has yet to be seen in our good city of Boston.

The closing concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, last evening, suggests the opening night of the Music Hall Promenade concerts, which is fixed for Monday evening, May 11th. It will be the 11th season of these very popular entertainments and the opening concert will be the 568th performance. A brief résumé of these concerts, showing their duration and the conductors by seasons may be of interest: 1885, July 11 to Oct. 3, Mr. Ad. Neuendorff, 73 performances; 1886, June 5 to Sep. 25, Mr. John C. Mullaly, 97 performances; 1887, June 11 to Sept. 3, Mr. Wilhelm Reitzel and Mr. Ad. Neuendorff, 73 performances; 1888, May 23 to Sept. 22, Mr. Franz Kneisel and Mr. Ad. Neuendorff, 102 performances; 1889, June 1 to July 6, Mr. Ad. Neuendorff, 31 performances; 1890, No concerts; 1891, June 1 to July 11, Mr. T. Adamowski and Mr. E. Gruenberg 36 performances; 1892, May 31 to July 9, Mr. T. Adamowski, 35 performances; 1893, June 3 to July 15, Mr. T. Admowski, 31 performances; 1894, May 12 to July 7, Mr. T. Adamowski, 45 performances; 1895, May 11 to July 6, Mr. A. De Novellis, 44 performances: If one should ask for an explanation of the continued and unquestioned popularity of these summer concerts, the answer would naturally be governed by the individual taste of the person to whom the query was addressed. The safe general assertion is that the admirable orchestra of 50 members selected from the ranks of the Symphony, the attractiveness of the programmes, which are within the reach of all, even those having a moderate knowledge of music and the general air of genteel Bohemia which pervades the whole entertainment, would be the most comprehensive explanation of the success that has attended these concerts ever since their beginning in 1885. The concerts will be conducted upon the same general plan as last season, and evenings will be devoted to special composers, request programmes and other equally attractive features. The conductor will be Mr. Max Zach, who has been for ten years a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and who will be pleasantly remembered by patrons as the composer of several very popular waltzes and marches which have been played in the past season under his direction. Mr. Zach was born in 1864, at Lemberg, in Austria. His early musical education was received at home, under the direction of Prof. Czerwinski for the piano, and Prof. [illegible]ckman for the violin. Even while Mr. Zach was at school he was a member of the local Conservatory orchestra, which gave several Symphony concerts.

In 1880, upon determining to become a professional musician, Mr. Zach went to the Vienna Conservatory, where he studied the violin, first under Bachrich and later under Prof. Grun. While studying harmony with Prof. Robert Fuchs and counterpoint with Prof. Krenn, Mr. Zach also did military duty, serving in the band of the regiment, under A. Czibulka, up to the time of his joining the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1886. It is worthy of note that Mr. Zach will be the sixth conductor of the Promenade concerts to be taken from the ranks of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and there is every reason to believe that the popular approval bestowed upon his predecessors will be extended to him.

In the absence of Manager C. A. Ellis in Europe, the concerts will be under the direction of Assistant Manager F. R. Comee.

— An interesting and instructive list of the soloists of the Symphony Concerts since their organization in 1881 was published last week. It was compiled by Mr. F. R. Comee (assistant manager of the orchestra), and some idea of its extent may be gained from the fact that it includes 387 names, divided as follows: Sopranos, 79; altos, 37; tenors, 25; bassos, 35; pianists, 103; violinists, 71; cellists, 22; flutists, 4; [illegible]ist 1; clarinetist, 1; horn solist, 1; harpists, 3 and [illegible]rs, 5.

— Mr. and Mrs. E. B. Meare and their family, of Philadelphia, were guests at The Thorndike part of last week, en route to their summer home at Bar Harbor.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, MAY 3, 1896.

Twenty-fourth and Last Concert of the Fifteenth Season of the Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall—A Wagner Program.

The program of the concert last evening was made up of these selections from the works of Wagner:

Overture to "Rienzi."
"Siegfried." Idyll.
Eine Faust Ouverture.
Prelude to act III. of "Lohengrin."
Waldweben, from "Siegfried," act II.
Prelude and "Isoldens Liebestod," from "Tristan und Isolde."
Prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

The seacon closed in a blaze of glory. A very large audience was applausive throughout the evening. Mr. Paur was welcomed heartily, and after the noble performance of the Meistersinger overture, he was recalled again and again.

It is not worth while to discuss now the artistic reasonableness or unreasonableness of a program devoted to the works of any man, whether the name be Wagner, or Beethoven, or Johann Strauss. It is the fashion to delight in "Wagner concerts," and as the fashion is of mighty power in concert as well as opera, no wonder that conductors yield to the demand. At the same time it is true that such programs are as a rule detrimental to the composer, and tiresome to the musician who knows the great value of contrasts. The arrangement of the program of last night calls for no special comment. The only cause of regret—after the reasonableness of a "Wagner concert" is granted—was that Mr. Paur should have included the bombastic and amazingly vulgar Rienzi overture. The true, sane admirer of Wagner regrets that he wrote it, as did Wagner himself.

The performance was one of exceeding beauty, brilliancy, and strength. Criticism is here synonymous with eulogy. Mr. Paur was happy in his readings, and his choice of tempi was admirable. Seldom, if ever, have I heard in German opera houses, where Wagnerian traditions are kept in cold storage, such a superb performance of the familiar prelude to the third act of Lohengrin, the Tristan prelude, or the Meistersinger overture. The solo passages, as well as the ensemble, throughout the concert were worthy of the great and deserved reputation of the orchestra.

* * *

The pressure upon the columns of the Journal forbids a review of the season, nor is there space to consider carefully the list of soloists compiled by Mr. Comee. This review must be deferred until next Sunday.

The list of works performed last season is a matter of history. This list should be accurate. The program states that only one symphony of Haydn was given. The fact is that two symphonies were given: one in G, Dec 28; one in G, Feb. 8. These symphonies were not one and the same.

PHILIP HALE.

Summary of the Fifteenth Symphony Season.

StatisticsConcerningPrograms, Novelties and Soloists.

Notes and Comments on Players, Singers and Pieces.

The Symphony concert last evening was the final one of the 15th season. It was the 752d performance in Boston and the 1404th since the founding of the orchestra.

* * *

The pieces performed during the season of '95-'96 were as follows, arranged in the alphabetical order of the composers' names:

D'Albert, Eugen—Prelude to "The Ruby."
Bach, J. S.—Suite in D-major, "My heart ever faithful" (Miss Clarke).
Beethoven—Symphonies 1, 5, 6, 7. Overtures, "Lenore" No. 3, "Consecration of the House," "Egmont," "King Stephen;" violin concerto (Mr. Ondricek); "Ah perfido!" (Mrs. de Vere-Sapio).
Berlioz—"Harold in Italy;" three movements from "Romeo and Juliet;" overture, "Corsair."
Bizet—Overture, "Patrie."
Borodin—A steppe sketch from Central Asia.
Brahms—Symphonies 1, 2, 4; Tragic overture; Academic overture; Hungarian dances 15, 17, 21; piano concerto No 2 (Mr. Joseffy).
Bruch—Scotch fantasia (Mr. T. Adamowski); concerto for violin No. 3, D-minor (Mr. Marsick, at public rehearsal).
Chadwick—Overture, "Melpomene."
Delibes—Legend from "Lakmé" (Mrs. Melba).
Dvorak—Symphony No. 2; overture, "Nature;" Scherzo capriccioso.
Foote—Suite, D-minor.
Godard—Suite No. 1 from "Jocelyn."
Götz—Symphony, F-major.
Goldmark—Symphony, "Rustic Wedding;" overture, "Sakuntala."
Gounod—Air from "Queen of Sheba" (Miss Clarke).
Handel—Largo from "Serse;" "Deeper and Deeper" and "Waft Her, Angels," from "Jephthah" (Mr. Davies).
Haydn—Symphonies, G major ("Surprise"); G major.
Henschel—Song, "Spring," with orchestra (Mrs. Henschel); ballad, with piano, "Jung Dietrich" (Mr. Henschel).
Humperdinck—Dream Pantomime Music from "Hänsel und Gretel."
Lalo—Suite, "Namouna."
Lang, M. R.—Air, "Armida" (Miss Franklin.)
Liszt—Tasso; second Hungarian Rhapsody (Müller-Berghaus); "Kennst du das Land" (Mrs. Henschel).
MacDowell—Suite A minor, No. 1; suite E minor No. 2.
Mendelssohn—Symphony No. 3 ("Scotch"); overture, "Fingal's Cave."
Meyerbeer—"Ah! mon fils" (Miss Olitzka).
Moszkowski—Concerto for violin (Mr. Sauret).
Mozart—Symphonies, G minor, D major ("Parisian"); andante and variations from Divertimento 17; Turkish march (Herbeck); "Parto, parto," from "La Clemenza di Tito" (Miss Olitzka).
Parry, C. H. H.—"King Saul's Dream" (Mr. Henschel).
Raff—Symphony, "Lenore;" piano concerto (Mr. Faelten).
Reznicek—Overture, "Donna Diana."
Rubinstein—Symphony No. 4, "Dramatic;" overture, "Dimitri Donskoi."
Saint-Saëns—[illegible] d'Omphale;" piano concerto, [illegible] (Mr. Sieveking, Miss Szumowska); [illegible] Ouverture" (Miss [illegible]).
Schubert—Symphony, "Unfinished;" fantasia, [illegible]; Funeral March, E-flat [illegible].
Schumann—[illegible] No. 1, B-flat major; [illegible] concerto [illegible].
Strube, Gustave—Symphony, C-minor.
Thomas, Ambroise—Ophelia's mad song (Mrs. de Vere-Sapio).
Tschaikowsky—Symphony No. 6, "Pathétique" (2); "Francesca da Rimini;" "Romeo and Juliet;" overture, "1812."
Vieuxtemps—Concerto No. 4, D-minor (Mr. Marsick).
Viotti—Concerto No. 23, A-minor (Mr. Kneisel).
Volkmann—Festival overture, op. 50.
Wagner—Overtures, "Rienzi," "Faust," "Meistersinger," "Tristan" (and love death), "Lohengrin," "Flying Dutchman;" prelude to act III., "Lohengrin;" "March of Homage," "Siegfried Idyll," "Waldweben," from "Siegfried;" "Elizabeth's Greeting" (Mrs. Melba), "Walter's Prize Song" (Mr. Davies).
Weber—Overtures, "Oberon," "Abu Hassan;" "Invitation to the Dance" (Berlioz).
Zöllner—"Midnight at Sedan."

* * *

There were 12 performances of pieces by Wagner, 10 of Beethoven, 7 of Brahms, 5 of Mozart and Tschaikowsky, 4 of Saint Saëns, 3 of Berlioz, Liszt, Dvorak, Schubert, Schumann and Weber.

* * *

One hundred and five pieces were performed; 27 German composers were represented, 8 French, 4 American, 3 Russian, 2 Bohemian, 1 Italian and 1 English.

Seventy-two of the pieces performed are by Germans, if you reckon d'Albert, Handel, Liszt, Meyerbeer, Moszkowski, and Reznicek as Germans. Thirteen are by Frenchmen, 8 by Russians, 5 by Americans, 4 by Bohemians, 1 by an Italian, 1 by an Englisman, 1 by a Belgian. Seventy-two German compositions against 33 pieces written by composers of other nationalities.

* * *

Novelties.

The works produced for the first time at these concerts were:

D'Albert—Prelude to "The Ruby," Nov. 30.
Berlioz—Overture to "The Corsair," Jan. 11.
Bizet—Overture, "Patrie," Jan. 4.
Dvorak—Overture, "Nature," Dec. 7.
Foote—Suite, D minor (first performance), March 7.
Godard—Suite No. 1, "Jocelyn," Feb. 15.
Humperdinck—Dream Pantomime from "Hänsel und Gretel," Nov. 2.
Lalo—Suite, "Namouna," Jan. 4.
Lang, M. R.—Concert aria, "Armida" (first time), Jan. 11.
MacDowell—Suite No. 2, E minor, "Indian," Feb. 1.
Mozart—Andante with variations, D minor, from divertimento No. 17, Oct. 19.
Parry—Scene and Aria, "King Saul's Dream," April 18.
Reznicek—Overture to "Donna Anna," Dec. 7.
Rubinstein—Overture to "Dimitri Donskoi," Feb. 1.
Smetana—Symphonic poem, "Wyschehrad," April 25.
Strauss, Richard—Preludes to Acts I and II of "Guntram," Nov. 9; "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," Feb. 22.
Strube—Symphony, C minor (MS.) op. 11, (first performance), April 4.
Tschaikowsky—Fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini," Nov. 2.
Zöllner—Orchestral Fantasia, "Midnight at Sedan," Feb. 22.

Twenty novelties. Of these only one is a symphony. Seven of the pieces are by Germans, if d'Albert is a German; four are by Frenchmen, three by Americans, three by Russians, two by Bohemians and one by an Englishman.

* * *

Soloists.

There were 19 soloists last season. Of these nine were singers, seven male and two female; five were violinists, four were pianists and there was one 'cellist.

The singers were as follows:

Clarke, Caroline—Nov. 23, air from "Queen of Sheba," Gounod; "My Heart Ever Faithful," Bach.
Franklin, Gertrude—Jan. 11, concert aria, "Armida" (MS), M. R. Lang.
Henschel, Lillian—April 4, "Kennst du das Land," Liszt; "Spring," with orchestra, Henschel.
Melba, Nelly—Feb. 1, Elisabeth's Greeting from "Tannhäuser;" Legend from Delibe's "Lakmé."
Olitzka, Rosa (her first appearance at these concerts)—Jan. 4, "Parto, Parto," from "La Clemenza di Tito;" "Ah mon fils," from "The Prophet."
Rolla, Kate (her first appearance at these concerts)—Feb. 15, "Mon coeur s'ouvre à ta voix," from "Samson et Dalila."
De Vere-Sapio, Clementine (her first appearance at these concerts)—Oct. 26, Ophelia's mad scene, "Hamlet;" "Ah! Perfido!" Beethoven
Davies, Ben. (his first appearance at these concerts)—April 11, "Deeper and Deeper Still," and "Waft Her, Angels," from "Jephthah;" Walter's Prize Song, from "Die Meistersinger."
Herschel, Georg—April 18, "King Saul's Dream," Parry; "Jung Dietrich," with piano accompaniment, Henschel.

* * *

The pianists were:

Faelten, Carl—Nov. 9, Raff's concerto.
Joseffy, Rafael—Jan. 18, Brahms's concerto No. 2.
Sieveking, Martinus (his first appearance at these concerts)—Dec. 7, Saint-Saëns second concerto.
Szumowska, Antoinette—March 14, Saint-Saëns second concerto.

* * *

The violinists were:

Adamowski, Timothee—Jan. 11, Bruch's Scotch Fantasia.
Kneisel, Franz—Nov. 30, concerto No. 22, A minor, Viotti.
Marsick, Martin (his first appearance at these concerts)—Feb. 14, Bruch's third concerto; Feb. 15, Vieuxtemps' fourth concerto. He was announced for the week before, but did not appear on account of an accident to his hand.
Ondricek, Franz (his first appearance at these concerts)—Dec. 14, Beethoven's concerto.
Sauret, Emile (his first appearance at these concerts)—Feb. 22, Moszkowski's concerto.

* * *

There was one 'cellist:

Schulz, Leo, March 7, Schumann's concerto.

* * *

Mr. Kneisel played the viola solos in the Childe Harold Symphony and the arrangement of the air from "Serse."

Mr. Léon Pourtau played the clarinet obbligato to the air of Mozart, sung by Miss Olitzka.

* * *

Miss Marie Brema, contralto, announced for Nov. 23, did not appear.

Mr. Carl Baermann, pianist, announced for April 25, did not appear.

* * *

Of these 19 soloists four are of American birth. Three are members of the orchestra.

* * *

Comments on the past season will be found in the review of the concert of last night.

Philip Hale

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.

MONDAY MORNING, MAY 4, 1896.

Symphony Concert—Close of the Orchestral Season of 1895-6.

The orchestral season of 1895-6 expired Saturday evening with a long drawn Wagnerian sigh. The programme, however, consisted of many kinds of Wagner; there was the melodic Wagner of the "Rienzi" epoch, there was the domestic Wagner with the "Siegfried Idyll" written for his wife's birthday, there was the abstrusely philosophic Wagner with the "Faust Overture" written in the dark Parisian days and presenting a Faust unaccompanied by any Marguerite, and there was, besides, the many-sided modern Wagner who was equally great in the myriad-voiced picture of forest life in "Waldesweben," the majesty and pomp of the Mastersingers, or the intense passion of Tristan and Isolde.

And all these diverse musical pictures were delineated by Mr. Paur with a sure hand and by the orchestra with a technique which they have never surpassed. It is fitting that, at the end of the season, we should sum up matters by again stating that our orchestra is at a point of technical perfection beyond which it has never gone, and of course, the thanks for this are to be given chiefly to the director. One may occasionally cavil at the makeup of this or that programme, one may disagree with the extreme force which is sometimes displayed, but one must, under all circumstances, heartily acknowledge the marked advance that has been made in the routine work, and the careful drill-mastership which has brought our orchestra to an equality to the greatest orchestras of the world. Nor has Mr. Paur's work been that of drill-master only; he has exhibited intelligence of the highest order in his readings, and we have had some interpretations of Brahms' and Wagner's works which have been the finest readings that have been yet vouchsafed to Boston. For all of which we say grace after the banquet.

That the public thought so too, was evidenced by an overwhelming attendance at this purely orchestral concert, and by the fact that when Mr. Paur came to the conductor's stand (which was decorated with flowers) he was received with a great outburst of applause, compelling him to bow again and again. After which the concert began.

The "Rienzi" overture is a sin of Wagner's youth; it is very noisy and the brasses are all the time blowing a hurricane; but it has some beautiful melodies nevertheless and a certain grandiose manner which belonged to Wagner even from his first productions. It was not unnatural therefore, to find the audience growing very enthusiastic over the work and applauding it to the echo.

Mrs. Wagner's birthday present, the "Siegfried Idyll," is not so popular a selection, but was splendidly played. Its themes are naturally of the most peaceful and happy character, since Wagner intended the work as a private picture of his domestic felicity in Switzerland and never thought of the composition reaching the public eye or ear. It is because of this that the work is very lightly scored. The two chief themes are the Melody of Peace and "Siegfried, the World's refuge," both from "Siegfried," and both united at the close of the work in a most beautiful augmentation, in accordance with the poem which Wagner gave to his wife (meaning always wife No. 2, poor Minna Planer never tasted any such triumphs, although she sacrificed much for Wagner) on the birthday occasion, ending

For him and thee in tones I now am praising,
What thanks for deeds of love could better be?
Within our souls the grateful song upraising
Which in this music I have now set free,
And in the cadence I have held united
Siegfried, our dearly cherished son and thee.

One cannot help feeling, however, that the work must have been infinitely better as a birthday surprise, with the orchestra standing on the staircase of the Villa Triebschen, than it can ever hope to be as a concert selection.

Faust, as represented in the overture which followed, was a horse of a different color. Wagner went hungry in Paris and therefore this Faust is a decidedly pessimistic party. It is an abstruse work even in the motto which Wagner put upon the score; here is the poetical index:—

Der Gott der mir im Busen wohnt
Kann tief mein Innerstes erregen;
Der ueber allen meinen Kraeften thront,
Er kann nach aussen nichts bewegen;
Und so ist mir das Dasein eine Last,
Der Tod erwuenscht, das Leben mir verhasst.

A very Schopenhauery, sour and gloomy text, and leading into some very growling music, basstuba and contrabasses forming the portico to the dark edifice. No greater contrast to the preceding picture of felicity could well be imagined, and it was excellent taste in Mr. Paur to make these two compositions foils to each other. The work had one of the finest of readings, but of course could make no very great impression upon an audience not thoroughly steeped in philosophy and its Wagnerian elucidations.

Then came something more tangible in the shape of the prelude to the third act of "Lohengrin," (the first number of this opera which became popular, even in the early fifties) superbly played, with an abandon and fire wholly indescribable, and the audience went wild over it. At one time it seemed as if an encore would be forced, but Mr. Paur remained loyal to the rule of these concerts, more loyal than some of his soloists have been, and contented himself with half-a-dozen bows.

Once more the intricate Wagner was heard, this time in "Waldesweben" with its manifold divisions of the string forces, perfectly presenting the myriad-voiced life of the forest. The clearness with which this most difficult number was presented was sufficient to prove Mr. Paur an eminent Wagnerian conductor. Every subtheme, every little motive, was clearly delivered, instead of being submerged and drowned in the sea of tone as is too often the case.

The [illegible] was also a perfect performance, the climaxes were worked up to a white heat and the interpretation was probably the most passionate piece of work that the conductor and orchestra have yet given us. The woodwind, which has so much and such important work to do, deserves an especial word of commendation for its wonderful performance in this number.

The concert ended with the great prelude to the "Mastersingers of Nuremburg." Its very first notes were an augury of an especial performance, for the pompous Mastersinger figure rang out with splendid effect, duly followed by the lofty theme of the march; there was plenty of caprice, too, and all the hurly-burly of a festival was portrayed with a freedom that was charming,—a noble ending to a season that has been eminently satisfactory to critics and public alike; and the latter then proceeded to show this by lingering in the hall and recalling Mr. Paur three times in the heartiest manner, spite of the fact that several of the musicians had rushed from the platform at the conclusion of the final cadence; some of these even, had the courtesy to return and join in the popular tribute to the man who has led them to victory.

Louis C. Elson.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, MAY 3, 1896.

Mr. Paur's final Symphony programme stood as we printed it last week—a skilful sequence of almost all the available orchestral deductions which can be made from Wagner's later operas, beginning with the early period "Rienzi" overture, and including that isolated work, the "Faust" overture, which, so far as the character and development of its motives are concerned, might do just about as well for Siegfried's woodland experiences with the trees, the bird and the dragon. The "Siegfried Idyl," the "Waldweben," the preludes to the third act of "Lohengrin," to the "Mastersingers" and to "Tristan and Isolde" (the latter coupled as usual to the "Isolde's Love Death" and sounding infinitely better without any struggling, screaming human voices), completed the assortment, which was as well contrasted and balanced as any half-dozen selections from Wagner could be expected to be.

Unquestionably Wagner understood the ranges, capacities, possibilities and combinations of orchestral instruments as well as any man except Berlioz, who possessed in a higher degree the art of being bizarre without eccentricity, grandiose without turgidity, emotional without excess, picturesque without extravagance and novel without being far-fetched. To play a full Wagner score so as to bring out all there is in it, is an almost crucial test of a leader and his orchestra. For the men must understand and command purity and perfection of tone, feel the proportions and degrees of dynamics, and make their groups as compact as a unit or else emerge singly in their obbligato sallies with just volume and individuality enough for distinction without personal display, must have the fine execution of virtuosi along with the fulness of common bandsmen and must be able to heat and grow as the swelling periods advance.

Such performance these Boston men now give—not in Wagner alone, although in some of his pages they have a chance to give exceptionally strong and vivid illustrations of their finesse and their prowess. There is neither scratch of string, blare of brass nor shrillness or hoarseness of wooden wind to mar the just equality of the several choirs, and no diversity of notion or of spirit militates against that entire symmetry and harmony which the composer and the conductor alike idealize and prescribe as the end to be attained. If there be better or greater playing in the world, we should like to hear it, and then confidently bid this home band to equal and excel it.

Yet, with even such superb playing, an hour and a half of Wagner becomes tiresome to us, who flatter ourselves that we admire and honor him rationally. His methods of building up his effects by adding element to element until the full brass and percussion bands are brought on to cap the climax, grow monotonous and tedious, and the perpetual return of the same figures, as in the almost interminable "Tristan" prelude, appear conventional, mannered and wearisome. If Wagner is to live and be loved in the concert-room, conductors must be chary of filling whole programmes with his writing. For even the Boston Symphony audience, devoted as it is supposed to be to him, had not more than moderate applause for any number, although it recalled Mr. Paur with enthusiasm for his good-byes and au revoirs.

Assistant Manager Comee has done a good thing for the Symphony patrons—and a nice bit of work it must have cost him!—by analyzing all the programmes from the first and inserting in this last house pamphlet of the season a complete list of all the soloists who have assisted the orchestra, which will be of value and interest for reference and comparison. Had we time we should like to make some extracts from it; but the reader must digest his copy for himself.

The announcement of the sixteenth season appoints the first concert for the seventeenth of next October, while the beginning of the "Pops" is set for Monday evening, May 11, under the leadership of Mr. Max Zach.

[124]

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, MAY 3, 1896.

Twenty-fourth and Last Concert of the Fifteenth Season of the Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall—A Wagner Program.

The program of the concert last evening was made up of these selections from the works of Wagner:

Overture to "Rienzi."
"Siegfried." Idyll.
Eine Faust Ouverture.
Prelude to act III. of "Lohengrin."
Waldweben, from "Siegfried," act II.
Prelude and "Isoldens Liebestod," from "Tristan und Isolde."
Prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

The seacon closed in a blaze of glory. A very large audience was applausive throughout the evening. Mr. Paur was welcomed heartily, and after the noble performance of the Meistersinger overture, he was recalled again and again.

It is not worth while to discuss now the artistic reasonableness or unreasonableness of a program devoted to the works of any man, whether the name be Wagner, or Beethoven, or Johann Strauss. It is the fashion to delight in "Wagner concerts," and as the fashion is of mighty power in concert as well as opera, no wonder that conductors yield to the demand. At the same time it is true that such programs are as a rule detrimental to the composer, and tiresome to the musician who knows the great value of contrasts. The arrangement of the program of last night calls for no special comment. The only cause of regret—after the reasonableness of a "Wagner concert" is granted—was that Mr. Paur should have included the bombastic and amazingly vulgar Rienzi overture. The true, sane admirer of Wagner regrets that he wrote it, as did Wagner himself.

The performance was one of exceeding beauty, brilliancy, and strength. Criticism is here synonymous with eulogy. Mr. Paur was happy in his readings, and his choice of tempi was admirable. Seldom, if ever, have I heard in German opera houses, where Wagnerian traditions are kept in cold storage, such a superb performance of the familiar prelude to the third act of Lohengrin, the Tristan prelude, or the Meistersinger overture. The solo passages, as well as the ensemble, throughout the concert were worthy of the great and deserved reputation of the orchestra.

* * *

The pressure upon the columns of the Journal forbids a review of the season, nor is there space to consider carefully the list of soloists compiled by Mr. Comee. This review must be deferred until next Sunday.

The list of works performed last season is a matter of history. This list should be accurate. The program states that only one symphony of Haydn was given. The fact is that two symphonies were given: one in G, Dec 28; one in G, Feb. 8. These symphonies were not one and the same.

PHILIP HALE.

Summary of the Fifteenth Symphony Season.

StatisticsConcerningPrograms, Novelties and Soloists.

Notes and Comments on Players, Singers and Pieces.

The Symphony concert last evening was the final one of the 15th season. It was the 752d performance in Boston and the 1404th since the founding of the orchestra.

* * *

The pieces performed during the season of '95-'96 were as follows, arranged in the alphabetical order of the composers' names:

D'Albert, Eugen—Prelude to "The Ruby."
Bach, J. S.—Suite in D-major, "My heart ever faithful" (Miss Clarke).
Beethoven—Symphonies 1, 5, 6, 7. Overtures, "Lenore" No. 3, "Consecration of the House," "Egmont," "King Stephen;" violin concerto (Mr. Ondricek); "Ah perfido!" (Mrs. de Vere-Sapio).
Berlioz—"Harold in Italy;" three movements from "Romeo and Juliet;" overture, "Corsair."
Bizet—Overture, "Patrie."
Borodin—A steppe sketch from Central Asia.
Brahms—Symphonies 1, 2, 4; Tragic overture; Academic overture; Hungarian dances 15, 17, 21; piano concerto No 2 (Mr. Joseffy).
Bruch—Scotch fantasia (Mr. T. Adamowski); concerto for violin No. 3, D-minor (Mr. Marsick, at public rehearsal).
Chadwick—Overture, "Melpomene."
Delibes—Legend from "Lakmé" (Mrs. Melba).
Dvorak—Symphony No. 2; overture, "Nature;" Scherzo capriccioso.
Foote—Suite, D-minor.
Godard—Suite No. 1 from "Jocelyn."
Götz—Symphony, F-major.
Goldmark—Symphony, "Rustic Wedding;" overture, "Sakuntala."
Gounod—Air from "Queen of Sheba" (Miss Clarke).
Handel—Largo from "Serse;" "Deeper and Deeper" and "Waft Her, Angels," from "Jephthah" (Mr. Davies).
Haydn—Symphonies, G major ("Surprise"); G major.
Henschel—Song, "Spring," with orchestra (Mrs. Henschel); ballad, with piano, "Jung Dietrich" (Mr. Henschel).
Humperdinck—Dream Pantomime Music from "Hänsel und Gretel."
Lalo—Suite, "Namouna."
Lang, M. R.—Air, "Armida" (Miss Franklin.)
Liszt—Tasso; second Hungarian Rhapsody (Müller-Berghaus); "Kennst du das Land" (Mrs. Henschel).
MacDowell—Suite A minor, No. 1; suite E minor No. 2.
Mendelssohn—Symphony No. 3, ("Scotch"); overture, "Fingal's Cave."
Meyerbeer—"Ah! mon fils" (Miss Olitzka).
Moszkowski—Concerto for violin (Mr. Sauret).
Mozart—Symphonies, G minor, D major ("Parisian"); andante and variations from Divertimento 17; Turkish march (Herbeck); "Parto, parto," from "La Clemenza di Tito" (Miss Olitzka).
Parry, C. H. H.—"King Saul's Dream" (Mr. Henschel).
Raff—Symphony, "Lenore;" piano concerto (Mr. Faelten).
Reznicek—Overture, "Donna Diana."
Rubinstein—Symphony No. 4, "Dramatic;" overture, "Dimitri Donskoi."
Saint-Saëns—"Le rouet d'Omphale;" piano concerto, C minor (Mr. Sieveking, Miss Szumowski); "Mon coeur s'ouvre" (Miss Rolla).
Schubert—Symphony, "Unfinished;" fantasia, F-minor (Mottl); Funeral March, E-flat minor (Liszt).
Schumann—Symphony No. 1, B-flat major; concerto, [illegible] 'cello concerto.
Smetana—Symphonic poem, "Wyschehrad."
Spohr—Overture, "Jessonda."
Strauss, Richard—Preludes to Acts I., II. of "Guntram;" "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."
Strube, Gustav—Symphony, C-minor.
Thomas, Ambroise—Ophelia's mad song (Mrs. de Vere-Sapio).
Tschaikowsky—Symphony No. 6, "Pathétique" (2); "Francesca da Rimini;" "Romeo and Juliet;" overture, "1812."
Vieuxtemps—Concerto No. 4, D-minor (Mr. Marsick).
Viotti—Concerto No. 23, A-minor (Mr. Kneisel).
Volkmann—Festival overture, op. 50.
Wagner—Overtures, "Rienzi," "Faust," "Meistersinger," "Tristan" (and love death), "Lohengrin," "Flying Dutchman;" prelude to act III., "Lohengrin;" "March of Homage," "Siegfried Idyll," "Waldweben," from "Siegfried;" "Elizabeth's Greeting" (Mrs. Melba), "Walter's Prize Song" (Mr. Davies).
Weber—Overtures, "Oberon," "Abu Hassan;" "Invitation to the Dance" (Berlioz).
Zöllner—"Midnight at Sedan."

* * *

There were 12 performances of pieces by Wagner, 10 of Beethoven, 7 of Brahms, 5 of Mozart and Tschaikowsky, 4 of Saint Saëns, 3 of Berlioz, Liszt, Dvorak, Schubert, Schumann and Weber.

* * *

One hundred and five pieces were performed; 27 German composers were represented, 8 French, 4 American, 3 Russian, 2 Bohemian, 1 Italian and 1 English.

Seventy-two of the pieces performed are by Germans, if you reckon d'Albert, Handel, Liszt, Meyerbeer, Moszkowski, and Reznicek as Germans. Thirteen are by Frenchmen, 8 by Russians, 5 by Americans, 4 by Bohemians, 1 by an Italian, 1 by an Englisman, 1 by a Belgian. Seventy-two German compositions against 33 pieces written by composers of other nationalities.

* * *

Novelties.

The works produced for the first time at these concerts were:

D'Albert—Prelude to "The Ruby," Nov. 30.
Berlioz—Overture to "The Corsair," Jan. 11.
Bizet—Overture, "Patrie," Jan. 4.
Dvorak—Overture, "Nature," Dec. 7.
Foote—Suite, D minor (first performance), March 7.
Godard—Suite No. 1, "Jocelyn," Feb. 15.
Humperdinck—Dream Pantomime from "Hänsel und Gretel," Nov. 2.
Lalo—Suite, "Namouna," Jan. 4.
Lang, M. R.—Concert aria, "Armida" (first time), Jan. 11.
MacDowell—Suite No. 2, Eminor, 'Indian," Feb. 1.
Mozart—Andante with variations, D minor, from divertimento No. 17, Oct. 19.
Parry—Scene and Aria, "King Saul's Dream," April 18.
Reznicek—Overture to "Donna Anna," Dec. 7.
Rubinstein—Overture to "Dimitri Donskoi," Feb. 1.
Smetana—Symphonic poem, "Wyschehrad," April 25.
Strauss, Richard—Preludes to Acts I and II of "Guntram," Nov. 9; "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," Feb. 22.
Strube—Symphony, C minor (MS.) op. 11, (first performance), April 4
Tschaikowsky—Fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini," Nov. 2.
Zöllner—Orchestral Fantasia, "'night at Sedan," Feb. 22.

Twenty novelties. Of these only one is a symphony. Seven of the pieces are by Germans, if d'Albert is a German; four are by Frenchmen, three by Americans, three by Russians, two by Bohemians and one by an Englishman.

* * *

Soloists.

There were 19 soloists last season. Of these nine were singers, seven male and two female; five were violinists, four were pianists and there was one 'cellist.

The singers were as follows:

Clarke, Caroline—Nov. 23, air from "Queen of Sheba," Gounod; "My Heart Ever Faithful," Bach.
Franklin, Gertrude—Jan. 11, concert aria, "Armida" (MS), M. R. Lang.
Henschel, Lillian—April 4, "Kennst du das Land," Liszt; "Spring," with orchestra, Henschel.
Melba, Nelly—Feb. 1, Elisabeth's Greeting from "Tannhäuser;" Legend from Delibe's "Lakmé."
Olitzka, Rosa (her first appearance at these concerts)—Jan. 4, "Parto, Parto," from "La Clemenza di Tito;" "Ah mon fils," from "The Prophet."
Rolla, Kate (her first appearance at these concerts)—Feb. 15, "Mon coeur s'ouvre à ta voix," from "Samson et Dalila."
De Vere-Sapio, Clementine (her first appearance at these concerts)—Oct. 26, Ophelia's mad scene, "Hamlet;" "Ah! Perfido!" Beethoven
Davies, Ben. (his first appearance at these concerts)—April 11, "Deeper and Deeper Still," and "Waft Her, Angels," from "Jephthah;" Walter's Prize Song, from "Die Meistersinger."
Herschel, Georg—April 18, "King Saul's Dream," Parry; "Jung Dietrich," with piano accompaniment, Henschel.

* * *

The pianists were:

Faelten, Carl—Nov. 9, Raff's concerto.
Joseffy, Rafael—Jan. 18, Brahms's concerto No. 2.
Sieveking, Martinus (his first appearance at these concerts)—Dec. 7, Saint-Saëns second concerto.
Szumowska, Antoinette—March 14, Saint-Saëns second concerto.

* * *

The violinists were:

Adamowski, Timothee—Jan. 11, Bruch's Scotch Fantasia.
Kneisel, Franz—Nov. 30, concerto No. 22, A minor, Viotti.
Marsick, Martin (his first appearance at these concerts)—Feb. 14, Bruch's third concerto; Feb. 15, Vieuxtemps' fourth concerto. He was announced for the week before, but did not appear on account of an accident to his hand.
Ondricek, Franz (his first appearance at these concerts)—Dec. 14, Beethoven's concerto.
Sauret, Emile (his first appearance at these concerts)—Feb. 22, Moszkowski's concerto.

* * *

There was one 'cellist:

Schulz, Leo, March 7, Schumann's concerto.

* * *

Mr. Kneisel played the viola solos in the Childe Harold Symphony and the arrangement of the air from "Serse."

Mr. Léon Pourtau played the clarinet obbligato to the air of Mozart, sung by Miss Olitzka.

* * *

Miss Marie Brema, contralto, announced for Nov. 23, did not appear.

Mr. Carl Baermann, pianist, announced for April 25, did not appear.

* * *

Of these 19 soloists four are of American birth. Three are members of the orchestra.

* * *

Comments on the past season will be found in the review of the concert of last night.

Philip Hale

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.

MONDAY MORNING, MAY 4, 1896.

Symphony Concert—Close of the Orchestral Season of 1895-6.

The orchestral season of 1895-6 expired Saturday evening with a long drawn Wagnerian sigh. The programme, however, consisted of many kinds of Wagner; there was the melodic Wagner of the "Rienzi" epoch, there was the domestic Wagner with the "Siegfried Idyll" written for his wife's birthday, there was the abstrusely philosophic Wagner with the "Faust Overture" written in the dark Parisian days and presenting a Faust unaccompanied by any Marguerite, and there was, besides, the many-sided modern Wagner who was equally great in the myriad-voiced picture of forest life in "Waldesweben," the majesty and pomp of the Mastersingers, or the intense passion of Tristan and Isolde.

And all these diverse musical pictures were delineated by Mr. Paur with a sure hand and by the orchestra with a technique which they have never surpassed. It is fitting that, at the end of the season, we should sum up matters by again stating that our orchestra is at a point of technical perfection beyond which it has never gone, and of course, the thanks for this are to be given chiefly to the director. One may ocasionally cavil at the makeup of this or that programme, one may disagree with the extreme force which is sometimes displayed, but one must, under all circumstances, heartily acknowledge the marked advance that has been made in the routine work, and the careful drill-mastership which has brought our orchestra to an equality to the greatest orchestras of the world. Nor has Mr. Paur's work been that of drill-master only; he has exhibited intelligence of the highest order in his readings, and we have had some interpretations of Brahms' and Wagner's works which have been the finest readings that have been yet vouchsafed to Boston. For all of which we say grace after the banquet.

That the public thought so too, was evidenced by an overwhelming attendance at this purely orchestral concert, and by the fact that when Mr. Paur came to the conductor's stand (which was decorated with flowers) he was received with a great outburst of applause, compelling him to bow again and again. After which the concert began.

The "Rienzi" overture is a sin of Wagner's youth; it is very noisy and the brasses are all the time blowing a hurricane; but it has some beautiful melodies nevertheless and a certain grandiose manner which belonged to Wagner even from his first productions. It was not unnatural therefore, to find the audience growing very enthusiastic over the work and applauding it to the echo.

Mrs. Wagner's birthday present, the "Siegfried Idyll," is not so popular a selection, but was splendidly played. Its themes are naturally of the most peaceful and happy character, since Wagner intended the work as a private picture of his domestic felicity in Switzerland and never thought of the composition reaching the public eye or ear. It is because of this that the work is very lightly scored. The two chief themes are the Melody of Peace and "Siegfried, the World's refuge," both from "Siegfried," and both united at the close of the work in a most beautiful augmentation, in accordance with the poem which Wagner gave to his wife (meaning always wife No. 2, poor Minna Planer never tasted any such triumphs, although she sacrificed much for Wagner) on the birthday occasion, ending

For him and thee in tones I now am praising,
What thanks for deeds of love could better be?
Within our souls the grateful song upraising
Which in this music I have now set free,
And in the cadence I have held united
Siegfried, our dearly cherished son and thee.

One cannot help feeling, however, that the work must have been infinitely better as a birthday surprise, with the orchestra standing on the staircase of the Villa Triebschen, than it can ever hope to be as a concert selection.

Faust, as represented in the overture which followed, was a horse of a different color. Wagner went hungry in Paris and therefore this Faust is a decidedly pessimistic party. It is an abstruse work even in the motto which Wagner put upon the score; here is the poetical index:—

Der Gott der mir im Busen wohnt
Kann tief mein Innerstes erregen;
Der ueber allen meinen Kraeften thront,
Er kann nach aussen nichts bewegen;
Und so ist mir das Dasein eine Last,
Der Tod erwuenscht, das Leben mir verhasst.

A very Schopenhauery, sour and gloomy text, and leading into some very growling music, basstuba and contrabasses forming the portico to the dark edifice. No greater contrast to the preceding picture of felicity could well be imagined, and it was excellent taste in Mr. Paur to make these two compositions foils to each other. The work had one of the finest of readings, but of course could make no very great impression upon an audience not thoroughly steeped in philosophy and its Wagnerian elucidations.

Then came something more tangible in the shape of the prelude to the third act of "Lohengrin," (the first number of this opera which became popular, even in the early fifties) superbly played, with an abandon and fire wholly indescribable, and the audience went wild over it. At one time it seemed as if an encore would be forced, but Mr. Paur remained loyal to the rule of these concerts, more loyal than some of his soloists have been, and contented himself with half-a-dozen bows.

Once more the intricate Wagner was heard, this time in "Waldesweben" with its manifold divisions of the string forces, perfectly presenting the myriad-voiced life of the forest. The clearness with which this most difficult number was presented was sufficient to prove Mr. Paur an eminent Wagnerian conductor. Every subtheme, every little motive, was clearly delivered, instead of being submerged and drowned in the sea of tone as is too often the case.

Then followed "Isolde's Love-Death," also in a perfect performance. The climaxes were worked up to a white heat and the interpretation was probably the most passionate piece of work that the conductor and orchestra have yet given us. The woodwind, which has so much and such important work to do, deserves an especial word of commendation for its wonderful performance in this number.

The concert ended with the great prelude to the "Mastersingers of Nuremburg." Its very first notes were an augury of an especial performance, for the pompous Mastersinger figure rang out with splendid effect, duly followed by the lofty theme of the march; there was plenty of caprice, too, and all the hurly-burly of a festival was portrayed with a freedom that was charming,—a noble ending to a season that has been eminently satisfactory to critics and public alike; and the latter then proceeded to show this by lingering in the hall and recalling Mr. Paur three times in the heartiest manner, spite of the fact that several of the musicians had rushed from the platform at the conclusion of the final cadence; some of these even, had the courtesy to return and join in the popular tribute to the man who has led them to victory.

Louis C. Elson.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, MAY 3, 1896.

Mr. Paur's final Symphony programme stood as we printed it last week—a skilful sequence of almost all the available orchestral deductions which can be made from Wagner's later operas, beginning with the early period "Rienzi" overture, and including that isolated work, the "Faust" overture, which, so far as the character and development of its motives are concerned, might do just about as well for Siegfried's woodland experiences with the trees, the bird and the dragon. The "Siegfried Idyl," the "Waldweben," the preludes to the third act of "Lohengrin," to the "Mastersingers" and to "Tristan and Isolde" (the latter coupled as usual to the "Isolde's Love Death" and sounding infinitely better without any struggling, screaming human voices), completed the assortment, which was as well contrasted and balanced as any half-dozen selections from Wagner could be expected to be.

Unquestionably Wagner understood the ranges, capacities, possibilities and combinations of orchestral instruments as well as any man except Berlioz, who possessed in a higher degree the art of being bizarre without eccentricity, grandiose without turgidity, emotional without excess, picturesque without extravagance and novel without being far-fetched. To play a full Wagner score so as to bring out all there is in it, is an almost crucial test of a leader and his orchestra. For the men must understand and command purity and perfection of tone, feel the proportions and degrees of dynamics, and make their groups as compact as a unit or else emerge singly in their obbligato sallies with just volume and individuality enough for distinction without personal display, must have the fine execution of virtuosi along with the fulness of common bandsmen and must be able to heat and grow as the swelling periods advance.

Such performance these Boston men now give—not in Wagner alone, although in some of his pages they have a chance to give exceptionally strong and vivid illustrations of their finesse and their prowess. There is neither scratch of string, blare of brass nor shrillness or hoarseness of wooden wind to mar the just equality of the several choirs, and no diversity of notion or of spirit militates against that entire symmetry and harmony which the composer and the conductor alike idealize and prescribe as the end to be attained. If there be better or greater playing in the world, we should like to hear it, and then confidently bid this home band to equal and excel it.

Yet, with even such superb playing, an hour and a half of Wagner becomes tiresome to us, who flatter ourselves that we admire and honor him rationally. His methods of building up his effects by adding element to element until the full brass and percussion bands are brought on to cap the climax, grow monotonous and tedious, and the perpetual return of the same figures, as in the almost interminable "Tristan" prelude, appear conventional, mannered and wearisome. If Wagner is to live and be loved in the concert-room, conductors must be chary of filling whole programmes with his writing. For even the Boston Symphony audience, devoted as it is supposed to be to him, had not more than moderate applause for any number, although it recalled Mr. Paur with enthusiasm for his good-byes and au revoirs.

Assistant Manager Comee has done a good thing for the Symphony patrons—and a nice bit of work it must have cost him!—by analyzing all the programmes from the first and inserting in this last house pamphlet of the season a complete list of all the soloists who have assisted the orchestra, which will be of value and interest for reference and comparison. Had we time we should like to make some extracts from it; but the reader must digest his copy for himself.

The announcement of the sixteenth season appoints the first concert for the seventeenth of next October, while the beginning of the "Pops" is set for Monday evening, May 11, under the leadership of Mr. Max Zach.

---

[124]

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MAY 6, 1896.

The program of the twenty-fourth and last concert of Symphony Orchestra, Emil Paur conductor, was as follows:

Overture to Rienzi ..... }
A Siegfried Idyl..... }
A Faust overture..... }
Prelude to Act III. of Lohengrin..... } .....Wagner
Forest Sounds, from Siegfried, Act II..... }
Prelude and Isolde's Love Death, from Tristan and Isolde..... }
Prelude to The Master Singers of Nuremberg.... }

To me a program devoted exclusively to the works of any one composer is a detriment to the one supposedly honored. The greatest have their mannerisms, and mannerisms without the contrast of other mannerisms quickly fatigue. But it is the fashion to enjoy "grand Wagner concerts," and as conductors are children of this world, why should they pose as children of light?

The performance was one that provoked enthusiastic scenes, and not without good cause. Mr. Paur was most happy in his readings, and the orchestra gave an exhibition of finesse, thoughtfulness, dash, brilliancy and power that was often marvelous. The season closed in a blaze of glory.

* * *

Here is a summing up of the fifteenth Symphony season: The pieces performed were as follows, arranged in the alphabetical order of the composers' names:

D'Albert, Eugene—Prelude to The Ruby.
Bach, J. S.—Suite in D major, My Heart Ever Faithful (Miss Clarke).
Beethoven—Symphonies 1, 5, 6, 7. Overtures, Lenore, No. 3. Consecration of the House, Egmont, King Stephen; violin concerto (Mr. Ondricek), Ah Perfido! (Mrs. de Vere-Sapio).
Berlioz—Harold in Italy, three movements from Romeo and Juliet; overture, Corsair.
Bizet—Overture, Patrie.
Borodin—A steppe sketch from Central Asia.
Brahms—Symphonies 1, 2, 4; Tragic overture; Academic overture; Hungarian dances, 15, 17, 21; piano concerto, No. 2 (Mr. Joseffy).
Bruch—Scotch fantasia (Mr. Adamowski); concerto for violin, No. 3, D minor (Mr. Marsick, at public rehearsal).
Chadwick—Overture, Melpomene.
Delibes—Legend from Lakmé (Mme. Melba).
Dvorák—Symphony No. 2; overture, Nature; scherzo capriccioso.
Foote—Suite, D minor.
Godard—Suite No. 1 from Jocelyn.
Göts—Symphony, F major.
Goldmark—Symphony, Rustic Wedding; overture, Sakuntala.
Gounod—Air from Queen of Sheba (Miss Clarke).
Händel—Largo from Serse, Deeper and Deeper, and Waft Her. Angels, from Jephthah (Mr. Davies).
Haydn—Symphonies, G major (Surprise), G major.
Henschel—Song, Spring, with orchestra (Mrs. Henschel); ballad, with piano, Jung Dietrich (Mr. Henschel).
Humperdinck—Dream pantomime music from Hänsel und Gretel.
Lalo—Suite, Namouna.
Lang, M. R.—Air, Armida (Miss Franklin).
Liszt—Tasso, second Hungarian rhapsody (Müller-Berghaus); Kennst du das Land (Mrs. Henschel).
MacDowell—Suite A minor, No. 1; suite E minor, No. 2.
Mendelssohn—Symphony No. 3 (Scotch); overture, Fingal's Cave.
Meyerbeer—Ah mon fils (Miss Olitzka).
Moszkowski—Concerto for violin (Mr. Sauret).
Mozart—Symphonies, G minor, D major (Parisian); andante and variations from Divertimento 17, Turkish march (Herbeck), Parto, Parto, from La Clemenza di Tito (Miss Olitzka).
Parry, C. H. H.—King Saul's Dream (Mr. Henschel).
Raff—Symphony, Lenore; piano concerto (Mr. Faelten).
Reznicek—Overture, Donna Diana.
Rubinstein—Symphony No. 4, Dramatic; overture, Dimitri Donskoi.
Saint-Saëns—Le rouet d'Omphale; piano concerto, G minor (Mr. Sieveking, Miss Szumowska); Mon cœur s'ouvre (Miss Rolla).
Schubert—Symphony, Unfinished; fantasia, F minor (Mottl); Funeral March, E flat minor (Liszt).
Schumann—Symphony No. 1, B flat major; overture, Genoveva; 'cello concerto (Mr. Schulz).
Smetana—Symphonic poem, Wyschehrad.
Spohr—Overture, Jessonda.
Strauss, Richard—Preludes to Acts I., II. of Guntram; Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks.
Strube, Gustave—Sympnony, C minor.
Thomas, Ambroise—Ophelia's mad song (Mrs. de Vere-Sapio).
Tschaikowsky—Symphony, No. 6, Pathétique (?); Francesca da Rimini; Romeo and Juliet; overture, 1812.
Vieuxtemps—Concerto, No. 4, D minor (Mr. Marsick).
Viotti—Concerto, No. 23, A minor (Mr. Kneisel).
Volkman—Festival overture, op. 50.
Wagner—Overtures, Rienzi, Faust, Meistersinger, Tristan (and love death), Lohengrin, Flying Dutchman; prelude to act III., Lohengrin; March of Homage, Siegfried Idyll, Waldweben, from Siegfried; Elizabeth's Greeting (Mme. Melba), Walter's Prize Song (Mr. Davies).
Weber—Overtures, Oberon, Abu Hassan; Invitation to the Dance (Berlioz).
Zöllner—Midnight at Sedan.

* * *

There were 12 performances of pieces by Wagner, 10 of Beethoven, 7 of Brahms, 5 of Mozart and Tschaikowsky, 4 of Saint-Saëns, 3 of Berlioz, Liszt, Dvorák, Schubert, Schumann and Weber.

* * *

One hundred and five pieces were performed; 27 German composers were represented, 8 French, 4 American, 3 Russian, 2 Bohemian, 1 Italian and 1 English.

Seventy-two of the pieces performed are by Germans, if you reckon d'Albert, Händel, Liszt, Meyerbeer, Moszkowski and Reznicek as Germans. If Moszkowski is of Polish origin, he was born at Breslau, and Reznicek is Viennese by birth. Thirteen of the pieces are by Frenchmen, eight by Russians, five by Americans, four by Bohemians, one by an Italian, one by an Englishman, one by a Belgian. Seventy two German compositions against thirty-three pieces written by composers of other nationalities.

The works produced for the first time at these concerts were:

D'Albert—Prelude to The Ruby, November 30.
Berlioz—Overture to The Corsair, January 11.
Bizet—Overture, Patrie, January 4.
Dvorák—Overture, Nature, December 7.
Foote—Suite, D minor (first performance), March 7.
Godard—Suite No. 1, Jocelyn, February 15.
Humperdinck—Dream Pantomime from Hänsel and Gretel, November 2.
Lalo—Suite, Namouna, January 4.
Lang, M. R.—Concert aria, Armida (first time), January 11.
MacDowell—Suite No. 2, E minor, Indian, February 1.
Mozart—Andante with variations, D minor, from divertimento No. 17, October 19.
Parry—Scene and aria, King Saul's Dream, April 18.
Reznicek—Overture to Donna Anna, December 7.
Rubinstein—Overture to Dimitri Donskoi, February 1.
Smetana—Symphonic poem, Wyschehrad, April 25.
Strauss, Richard—Preludes to Acts I. and II. of Guntram, November 9; Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks, February 22.
Strube—Symphony, C minor (MS.), op. 11 (first performance), April 4.
Tschaikowsky—Fantasia, Francesca da Rimini, November 2.
Zöllner—Orchestral Fantasia, Midnight at Sedan, February 22.

Twenty novelties. Of these only one is a symphony. Seven of the pieces are by Germans, if d'Albert is a German; 4 are by Frenchmen, 3 by Americans, 3 by Russians, 2 by Bohemians and 1 by an Englishman.

* * *

There were 19 soloists last season. Of these 9 were singers, 7 male and 2 female; 5 were violinists, 4 were pianists and there was 1 'cellist.

The singers were as follows:

Clarke, Caroline—November 23, air from Queen of Sheba, Gounod; My Heart Ever Faithful, Bach.
Franklin, Gertrude—January 11, concert aria, Armida (MS.), M. R. Lang.
Henschel, Lillian—April 4, Kennst du das Land, Liszt; Spring, with orchestra, Henschel.
Melba, Nelly—February 1, Elizabeth's Greeting from Tannhäuser; Legend from Delibes' Lakmé.
Olitzka, Rosa (her first appearance at these concerts)—January 4, Parto, Parto, from La Clemenza di Tito; Ah mon fils, from The Prophet.
Rolla, Kate (her first appearance at these concerts)—February 15, Mon cœur s'ouvre à ta voix, from Samson et Dalila.
De Vere-Sapio, Clementine—October 26, Ophelia's mad scene, Hamlet; Ah! Perfido! Beethoven.
Davies, Ben. (his first appearance at these concerts)—April 11, Deeper and Deeper Still and Waft Her Angels, from Jephthah; Walter's Prize Song, from Die Meistersinger.
Henschel, Georg—April 18, King Saul's Dream, Parry; Jung Dietrich, with piano accompaniment, Henschel.

* * *

The pianists were:

Faelten, Carl—November 9, Raff's concerto.
Josefty, Rafael—January 18, Brahms' Concerto No. 2.
Sieveking, Martinus (his first appearance at these concerts)—December 7, Saint-Saëns' second concerto.
Szumowska, Antoinette—March 14, Saint-Saëns' second concerto.

* * *

The violinists were:

Adamowski, Timothée—January 11, Bruch's Scotch Fantasia.
Kneisel, Franz—November 30, Concerto No. 22, A minor, Viotti.
Marsick, Martin (his first appearance at these concerts)—February 14, Bruch's third concerto; February 15, Vieuxtemps' fourth concerto. He was announced for the week before, but did not appear on account of an accident to his hand.
Ondricek, Franz (his first appearance at these concerts)—December 14, Beethoven's concerto.
Sauret, Emile (his first appearance at these concerts)—February 22, Moszkowski's concerto.

There was one 'cellist: Leo, Schulz, March 7, Schumann's concerto.

* * *

Mr. Kneisel played the viola solos in the Childe Harold symphony and the arrangement of the air from "Serse."

Mr. Léon Pourtau played the clarinet obligato to the air of Mozart, sung by Miss Olitzka.

* * *

Miss Marie Brema, contralto, announced for November 23, did not appear.

Mr. Carl Baermann, pianist, announced for April 25, did not appear.

* * *

Of these nineteen soloists four are of American birth. Three are members of the orchestra.

* * *

May 1896

THE SONG JOURNAL.

Last Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

It is a disgrace to New York and a bitter commentary on its boasted musical culture that the Boston Symphony Orchestra, an organization the greatest of its kind in America if not in the whole world, plays here season after season to unprofitable business. On the evening of March 27 the orchestra gave its last concert of this season in the presence of a larger audience than usual, the largest indeed since that of the first concert last fall at which Melba was the soloist. The program was made up entirely from the works of Wagner commencing with the Rienzi overture and continuing with excerpts from "Lohengrin," "Siegfried," "Meistersinger" and "Die Walkure," with the "Eine Faust" overture sandwiched in between.

If any additional proof were needed of the pre-eminence of the Boston Orchestra it was surely furnished on this occasion for more glorious playing was surely never listened to. The orchestra is like a great composite voice almost sympathetic enough to be human. The technic, too, is that of a great vocalist with every run, scale and trill given with clean-cut precision and crystalline purity. All the different parts stand out in beautiful relief and yet blended with the others into one magnificent homogeneous whole while so far are the strings from the faintest suspicion of scrapiness that the music they make seems as though floating in air. This orchestra is a living manifold lesson in concerted playing, and not only Boston but the entire country has every reason to feel proud of it.

The soloist of this last concert was Mr. Ben Davies, who sang the prize song from "Die Meistersinger" and the spring song from "Die Walkure," disclosing a voice of beautiful sympathetic quality and a free, wholesome method. It was a delight to listen to him and his success was unqualified.

[125]

Boston Symphony Concert

MONDAY, MAY 4, 1896.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The twenty-fourth and last symphony concert of the season was given in Music Hall, last Saturday evening, the programme being as follows:

WAGNER PROGRAMME.

Overture to "Rienzi."
Siegfried-Idyll.
Eine Faust-Ouverture.
Introduction to Act III. of "Lohengrin."
Waldweben, from "Siegfried," Act II.
Prelude and "Isoldens Liebestod," from "Tristan und Isolde."
Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg."

A most excellent programme, as Wagner programmes go! The only serious drawback—to our thinking—was the absence of a symphony. To be sure, it would not have been a Wagner programme, if there had been a symphony, unless Wagner's symphony had been given, which, thank heaven, it was not. But we cannot help finding a long succession of comparatively short pieces fatiguing; and, after two or three of them, we crave the mental repose of something in four movements.

Mr. Paur and the orchestra covered themselves with glory; the playing was of the very best—save that we found the brass somewhat too prominent in fortissimo passages throughout. Mr. Paur conducted with his usual painstaking, and even more than his usual vigor and vivacity.

The audience was enthusiastic in its reception of and farewell-au-revoir to the conductor, whose desk was tastefully ornamented with flowers and smilax.

Upon the whole, it was one of the most enjoyable concerts of the season. In summing up, we find that the following novelties have been given for the first time in Boston this season:

Berlioz: Overture to "Le Corsaire," opus 21.
Bizet: Overture, "Patrie."
Dvorak: Overture, "In der Natur," opus 91.
Foote: Suite in D minor, opus 36.
Humperdinck: Dream Pantomime from "Hänsel und Gretel."
Lalo: Suite, "Namouna."
Lang, Margaret R.: Concert Aria, "Armida" (MS.), opus 24.
MacDowell: Suite No. 2, in E minor, "Indian" (MS.) opus 48.
Parry, Dr. C. H.: "King Saul's Dream."
Reznicek: Overture to "Donna Diana."
Rubinstein: Overture to "Dimitri Donskoi."
Smetana: Symphonic Poem, "Vysehrad."
Strauss, R.: Preludes to Acts I. and II. of "Guntram," "Till Eulenspiegels lustige Streiche."
Strube, G.: Symphony in C minor (MS.), opus 11.
Tschaikowsky: Fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini," opus 32.
Zöllner, H.: "Mitternacht bei Sedan."

Seventeen in all; a goodly number for twenty-four concerts. Yet we think the public could have stood more. In this connection is to be noted that three more novelties were promised, from time to time, but not given. These were:

Beethoven, Quartet in C-sharp minor, opus 131 (scored for orchestra by Müller-Berghaus).
Rimsky-Korsakoff: Symphony, "Antar."
Weber: Andante from Symphony No. 2.

We are heartily glad that two of these promised dainties were not given. The Müller-Berghaus score of Beethoven's great C-sharp minor quartet was buried some fifteen or twenty years ago beneath the contempt of two continents, and it was foolish even to think of hawking it up for revival in this year of grace. The Weber Andante—and many other things of its kind—died of euthanasia a good while ago. We repeat that we are glad these two things were not given; only they never ought to have been announced. Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Antar," on the other hand, we should have been glad to hear, if only for once; to have it announced, and then withdrawn, was a disappointment. And this brings us to a point which, it seems to us, calls for some fault-finding. There have been eight changes of programme this season—irrespective of changes necessitated by the indisposition of solo performers; that is, on eight occasions has the programme been different from the one announced the week before—at just one-third of the concerts. This seems to us nothing but bad management. It is, moreover, exceedingly annoying to a goodly part of the audience; for not a few of the regular attendants at the symphony concerts habitually take the trouble to look up and study the compositions announced to be given, and take the scores with them to concerts and rehearsals. And it is not fair that this—artistically the best—part of the audience should be forced to take such trouble for nothing. We sincerely hope that this will be remedied next season.

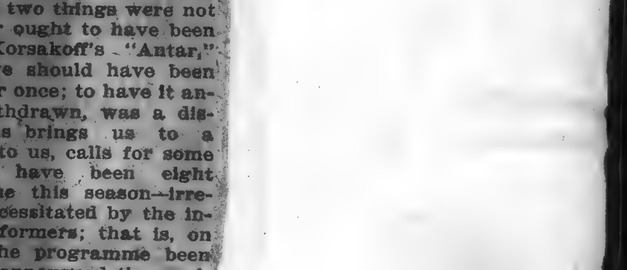
——An interesting, as well as instructive lists of the soloists who have appeared in the concerts by the Symphony orchestra in Boston since its founding in 1881 was published in the program of the closing concert last week. This list was compiled by Mr F. R. Comee, the assistant manager of the orchestra, and some idea of its extent may be gained from the fact that it contained a total of 386 names, divided as follows: Soprano 79, alto 37, tenor 25, bass 35, pianoforte 103, violin 71, violoncello 22, flute 4, clarinet 1, oboe 1, horn 1, harp 3, and reader 4.

Milwaukee Sentinel
May 17.

W. F. Apthorp, who writes the interesting analytical programmes for the Boston Symphony orchestra, gives a complete account of what has been done at the twenty-four concerts of the Boston season which closed on May 2, from which the following is summarized: In the number of compositions played Wagner leads (as always) with 12, Beethoven coming next with 10. Brahms had 7, Tchaikovsky and Mozart 5, Saint Saëns 4, Dvorák, Berlioz, Liszt, Schumann, Smetana, R. Strauss, 3, and so on, the number of composers represented being 46, of whom 21 were Germans, 8 French, 3 Russian, 3 Bohemian, 2 Hungarian, 4 American, 2 English, 1 Polish, 1 Belgian, 1 Italian. The whole number of compositions played was 99. The list of soloists at these concerts included Mmes. Clarke, Franklin, Henschel, Melba, Olitzka, Rolla, Szumowska, De Vere-Sapio, MM. Adamowski, Ben Davies, Faelten, G. Henschel, Joseffy, Kneisel, Marsick, Ondricek, Sauret, Schulz, Sieveking. Mr. Apthorp appends complete lists of all the soloists heard at these concerts since 1881. There are 387 in all, including 103 pianists (some names, of course, are repeated), 71 violinists, 22 'cellists, 4 flutists, 79 sopranos, 37 altos, 25 tenors, 35 basses, etc.

The Musical Courier

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MAY 20, 1896.



PROVIDENCE.

PROVIDENCE, R. I., May 9, 1896.

EUROPE may have some features in music not yet our own, but we surely have one thing that they have not—namely, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, an organization of artists that may well be called perfect in every way. It is hardly possible to think of anything more beautiful in tone, more brilliant in execution, than the rendering of the program of the last Symphony concert. It consisted, aside from Tschaikowsky's Pathetic Symphony (repeated by request), of selections from Wagner's works, most of them played at the New York concert which brought forth such unanimous praise and enthusiastic reports from the whole metropolitan press. The success of the last season must have been very gratifying to the management, as the attendance showed a marked increase over the previous year.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MAY 6, 1896.

The program of the twenty-fourth and last concert of Symphony Orchestra, Emil Paur conductor, was as follows:

Overture to Rienzi ..... }
A Siegfried Idyl ..... }
A Faust overture ..... }
Prelude to Act III. of Lohengrin ..... } .....Wagner
Forest Sounds, from Siegfried, Act II ..... }
Prelude and Isolde's Love Death, from Tristan and Isolde ..... }
Prelude to The Master Singers of Nuremberg .... }

To me a program devoted exclusively to the works of any one composer is a detriment to the one supposedly honored. The greatest have their mannerisms, and mannerisms without the contrast of other mannerisms quickly fatigue. But it is the fashion to enjoy "grand Wagner concerts," and as conductors are children of this world, why should they pose as children of light?

The performance was one that provoked enthusiastic scenes, and not without good cause. Mr. Paur was most happy in his readings, and the orchestra gave an exhibition of finesse, thoughtfulness, dash, brilliancy and power that was often marvelous. The season closed in a blaze of glory.

* * *

Here is a summing up of the fifteenth Symphony season: The pieces performed were as follows, arranged in the alphabetical order of the composers' names:

D'Albert, Eugene—Prelude to The Ruby.
Bach, J. S.—Suite in D major, My Heart Ever Faithful (Miss Clarke).
Beethoven—Symphonies 1, 5, 6, 7. Overtures, Lenore, No. 3. Consecration of the House, Egmont, King Stephen; violin concerto (Mr. Ondricek), Ah Perfido! (Mrs. de Vere-Sapio).
Berlioz—Harold in Italy, three movements from Romeo and Juliet; overture, Corsair.
Bizet—Overture, Patrie.
Borodin—A steppe sketch from Central Asia.
Brahms—Symphonies 1, 2, 4; Tragic overture; Academic overture; Hungarian dances, 15, 17, 21; piano concerto, No. 2 (Mr. Joseffy).
Bruch—Scotch fantasia (Mr. Adamowski); concerto for violin, No. 3, D minor (Mr. Marsick, at public rehearsal).
Chadwick—Overture, Melpomene.
Delibes—Legend from Lakmé (Mme. Melba).
Dvorák—Symphony No. 2; overture, Nature; scherzo capriccioso.
Foote—Suite, D minor.
Godard—Suite No. 1 from Jocelyn.
Götz—Symphony, F major.
Goldmark—Symphony, Rustic Wedding; overture, Sakuntala.
Gounod—Air from Queen of Sheba (Miss Clarke).
Händel—Largo from Serse, Deeper and Deeper, and Waft Her Angels, from Jephthah (Mr. Davies).
Haydn—Symphonies, G major (Surprise), G major.
Henschel—Song, Spring, with orchestra (Mrs. Henschel); ballad, with piano, Jung Dietrich (Mr. Henschel).
Humperdinck—Dream pantomime music from Hänsel und Gretel.
Lalo—Suite, Namouna.
Lang, M. R.—Air, Armida (Miss Franklin).
Liszt—Tasso, second Hungarian rhapsody (Müller-Berghaus); Kennst du das Land (Mrs. Henschel).
MacDowell—Suite A minor, No. 1; suite E minor, No. 2.
Mendelssohn—Symphony No. 3 (Scotch); overture, Fingal's Cave.
Meyerbeer—Ah mon fils (Miss Olitzka).
Moszkowski—Concerto for violin (Mr. Sauret).
Mozart—Symphonies, G minor, D major (Parisian); andante and variations from Divertimento 17, Turkish march (Herbeck), Parto, Parto, from La Clemenza di Tito (Miss Olitzka).
Parry, C. H. H.—King Saul's Dream (Mr. Henschel).
Raff—Symphony, Lenore; piano concerto (Mr. Faelten).
Reznicek—Overture, Donna Diana.
Rubinstein—Symphony No. 4, Dramatic; overture, Dimitri Donskoi.
Saint-Saëns—Le rouet d'Omphale; piano concerto, G minor (Mr. Sieveking, Miss Szumowska); Mon cœur s'ouvre (Miss Rolla).
Schubert—Symphony, Unfinished; fantasia, F minor (Mottl); Funeral March, E flat minor (Liszt).
Schumann—Symphony No. 1, B flat major; overture, Genoveva; 'cello concerto (Mr. Schulz).
Smetana—Symphonic poem, Wyschehrad.
Spohr—Overture, Jessonda.
Strauss, Richard—Preludes to Acts I., II. of Guntram; Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks.
Strube, Gustave—Sympnony, C minor.
Thomas, Ambroise—Ophelia's mad song (Mrs. de Vere-Sapio).
Tschaikowsky—Symphony, No. 6, Pathétique (2); Francesca da Rimini; Romeo and Juliet; overture, 1812.
Vieuxtemps—Concerto, No. 4, D minor (Mr. Marsick).
Viotti—Concerto, No. 23, A minor (Mr. Kneisel).
Volkman—Festival overture, op. 50.
Wagner—Overtures, Rienzi, Faust, Meistersinger, Tristan (and love death), Lohengrin, Flying Dutchman; prelude to act III., Lohengrin; March of Homage, Siegfried Idyll, Waldweben, from Siegfried; Elizabeth's Greeting (Mme. Melba), Walter's Prize Song (Mr. Davies).
Weber—Overtures, Oberon, Abu Hassan; Invitation to the Dance (Berlioz).
Zöllner—Midnight at Sedan.

* * *

There were 12 performances of pieces by Wagner, 10 of Beethoven, 7 of Brahms, 5 of Mozart and Tschaikowsky, 4 of Saint-Saëns, 3 of Berlioz, Liszt, Dvorák, Schubert, Schumann and Weber.

* * *

One hundred and five pieces were performed; 27 German composers were represented, 8 French, 4 American, 3 Russian, 2 Bohemian, 1 Italian and 1 English.

Seventy-two of the pieces performed are by Germans, if you reckon d'Albert, Händel, Liszt, Meyerbeer, Moszkowski and Reznicek as Germans. If Moszkowski is of Polish origin, he was born at Breslau, and Reznicek is Viennese by birth. Thirteen of the pieces are by Frenchmen, eight by Russians, five by Americans, four by Bohemians, one by an Italian, one by an Englishman, one by a Belgian. Seventy-two German compositions against thirty-three pieces written by composers of other nationalities.

The works produced for the first time at these concerts were:

D'Albert—Prelude to The Ruby, November 30.
Berlioz—Overture to The Corsair, January 11.
Bizet—Overture, Patrie, January 4.
Dvorák—Overture, Nature, December 7.
Foote—Suite, D minor (first performance), March 7.
Godard—Suite No. 1, Jocelyn, February 15.
Humperdinck—Dream Pantomime from Hänsel and Gretel, November 2.
Lalo—Suite, Namouna, January 4.
Lang, M. R.—Concert aria, Armida (first time), January 11.
MacDowell—Suite No. 2, E minor, Indian, February 1.
Mozart—Andante with variations, D minor, from divertimento No. 17, October 19.
Parry—Scene and aria, King Saul's Dream, April 18.
Reznicek—Overture to Donna Anna, December 7.
Rubinstein—Overture to Dimitri Donskoi, February 1.
Smetana—Symphonic poem, Wyschehrad, April 25.
Strauss, Richard—Preludes to Acts I. and II. of Guntram, November 9; Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks, February 22.
Strube—Symphony, C minor (MS.), op. 11 (first performance), April 4.
Tschaikowsky—Fantasia, Francesca da Rimini, November 2.
Zöllner—Orchestral Fantasia, Midnight at Sedan, February 22.

Twenty novelties. Of these only one is a symphony. Seven of the pieces are by Germans, if d'Albert is a German; 4 are by Frenchmen, 3 by Americans, 3 by Russians, 2 by Bohemians and 1 by an Englishman.

* * *

There were 19 soloists last season. Of these 9 were singers, 7 male and 2 female; 5 were violinists, 4 were pianists and there was 1 'cellist.

The singers were as follows:

Clarke, Caroline—November 23, air from Queen of Sheba, Gounod; My Heart Ever Faithful, Bach.
Franklin, Gertrude—January 11, concert aria, Armida (MS.), M. R. Lang.
Henschel, Lillian—April 4, Kennst du das Land, Liszt; Spring, with orchestra, Henschel.
Melba, Nelly—February 1, Elizabeth's Greeting from Tannhäuser; Legend from Delibes' Lakmé.
Olitzka, Rosa (her first appearance at these concerts)—January 4, Parto, Parto, from La Clemenza di Tito; Ah mon fils, from The Prophet.
Rolla, Kate (her first appearance at these concerts)—February 15, Mon cœur s'ouvre à ta voix, from Samson et Dalila.
De Vere-Sapio, Clementine—October 26, Ophelia's mad scene, Hamlet; Ah! Perfido! Beethoven.
Davies, Ben. (his first appearance at these concerts)—April 11, Deeper and Deeper Still and Waft Her Angels, from Jephthah; Walter's Prize Song, from Die Meistersinger.
Henschel, Georg—April 18, King Saul's Dream, Parry; Jung Dietrich, with piano accompaniment, Henschel.

* * *

The pianists were:

Faelten, Carl—November 9, Raff's concerto.
Joseffy, Rafael—January 18, Brahms' Concerto No. 2.
Sieveking, Martinus (his first appearance at these concerts)—December 7, Saint-Saëns' second concerto.
Szumowska, Antoinette—March 14, Saint-Saëns' second concerto.

* * *

The violinists were:

Adamowski, Timothée—January 11, Bruch's Scotch Fantasia.
Kneisel, Franz—November 30, Concerto No. 22, A minor, Viotti.
Marsick, Martin (his first appearance at these concerts)—February 14, Bruch's third concerto; February 15, Vieuxtemps' fourth concerto. He was announced for the week before, but did not appear on account of an accident to his hand.
Ondricek, Franz (his first appearance at these concerts)—December 14, Beethoven's concerto.
Sauret, Emile (his first appearance at these concerts)—February 22, Moszkowski's concerto.

There was one 'cellist: Leo, Schulz, March 7, Schumann's concerto.

* * *

Mr. Kneisel played the viola solos in the Childe Harold symphony and the arrangement of the air from "Serse."

Mr. Léon Pourtau played the clarinet obligato to the air of Mozart, sung by Miss Olitzka.

* * *

Miss Marie Brema, contralto, announced for November 23, did not appear.

Mr. Carl Baermann, pianist, announced for April 25, did not appear.

* * *

Of these nineteen soloists four are of American birth. Three are members of the orchestra.

* * *

May 1896

THE SONG JOURNAL.

Last Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

It is a disgrace to New York and a bitter commentary on its boasted musical culture that the Boston Symphony Orchestra an organization the greatest of its kind in America if not in the whole world, plays here season after season to unprofitable business. On the evening of March 27 the orchestra gave its last concert of this season in the presence of a larger audience than usual, the largest indeed since that of the first concert last fall at which Melba was the soloist. The program was made up entirely from the works of Wagner commencing with the Rienzi overture and continuing with excerpts from "Lohengrin," "Siegfried," "Meistersinger" and "Die Walkure," with the "Eine Faust" overture sandwiched in between.

If any additional proof were needed of the pre-eminence of the Boston Orchestra it was surely furnished on this occasion for more glorious playing was surely never listened to. The orchestra is like a great composite voice almost sympathetic enough to be human. The technic, too, is that of a great vocalist with every run, scale and trill given with clean-cut precision and crystalline purity. All the different parts stand out in beautiful relief and yet blended with the others into one magnificent homogeneous whole while so far are the strings from the faintest suspicion of scrapiness that the music they make seems as though floating in air. This orchestra is a living manifold lesson in concerted playing, and not only Boston but the entire country has every reason to feel proud of it.

The soloist of this last concert was Mr. Ben Davies, who sang the prize song from "Die Meistersinger" and the spring song from "Die Walkure," disclosing a voice of beautiful sympathetic quality and a free, wholesome method. It was a delight to listen to him and his success was unqualified.

[125]

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, MAY 4, 1896.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The twenty-fourth and last symphony concert of the season was given in Music Hall, last Saturday evening, the programme being as follows:

WAGNER PROGRAMME.

Overture to "Rienzi."
Siegfried-Idyll.
Eine Faust-Ouverture.
Introduction to Act III. of "Lohengrin."
Waldweben, from "Siegfried," Act II.
Prelude and "Isoldens Liebestod," from "Tristan und Isolde."
Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg."

A most excellent programme, as Wagner programmes go! The only serious drawback—to our thinking—was the absence of a symphony. To be sure, it would not have been a Wagner programme, if there had been a symphony, unless Wagner's symphony had been given, which, thank heaven, it was not. But we cannot help finding a long succession of comparatively short pieces fatiguing; and, after two or three of them, we crave the mental repose of something in four movements.

Mr. Paur and the orchestra covered themselves with glory; the playing was of the very best—save that we found the brass somewhat too prominent in fortissimo passages throughout. Mr. Paur conducted with his usual painstaking, and even more than his usual vigor and vivacity.

The audience was enthusiastic in its reception of and farewell-au-revoir to the conductor, whose desk was tastefully ornamented with flowers and smilax.

Upon the whole, it was one of the most enjoyable concerts of the season. In summing up, we find that the following novelties have been given for the first time in Boston this season:

Berlioz: Overture to "Le Corsaire," opus 21.
Bizet: Overture, "Patrie."
Dvorak: Overture, "In der Natur," opus 91.
Foote: Suite in D minor, opus 36.
Humperdinck: Dream Pantomime from "Hänsel und Gretel."
Lalo: Suite, "Namouna."
Lang, Margaret R.: Concert Aria, "Armida" (MS.), opus 24.
MacDowell: Suite No. 2, in E minor, "Indian" (MS.) opus 48.
Parry, Dr. C. H.: "King Saul's Dream."
Reznicek: Overture to "Donna Diana."
Rubinstein: Overture to "Dimitri Donskoi."
Smetana: Symphonic Poem, "Vyschrad."
Strauss, R.: Preludes to Acts I. and II. of "Guntram," "Till Eulenspiegels lustige Streiche."
Strube, G.: Symphony in C minor (MS.), opus 11.
Tschaikowsky: Fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini," opus 32.
Zöllner, H.: "Mitternacht bei Sedan."

Seventeen in all; a goodly number for twenty-four concerts. Yet we think the public could have stood more. In this connection is to be noted that three more novelties were promised, from time to time, but not given. These were:

Beethoven, Quartet in C-sharp minor, opus 131 (scored for orchestra by Müller-Berghaus).
Rimsky-Korsakoff: Symphony, "Antar."
Weber: Andante from Symphony No. 2.

We are heartily glad that two of these promised dainties were not given. The Müller-Berghaus score of Beethoven's great C-sharp minor quartet was buried some fifteen or twenty years ago beneath the contempt of two continents, and it was foolish even to think of hawking it up for revival in this year of grace. The Weber Andante—and many other things of its kind—died of euthanasia a good while ago. We repeat that we are glad these two things were not given; only they never ought to have been announced. Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Antar," on the other hand, we should have been glad to hear, if only for once; to have it announced, and then withdrawn, was a disappointment. And this brings us to a point which, it seems to us, calls for some fault-finding. There have been eight changes of programme this season—irrespective of changes necessitated by the indisposition of solo performers; that is, on eight occasions has the programme been different from the one announced the week before—at just one-third of the concerts. This seems to us nothing but bad management. It is, moreover, exceedingly annoying to a goodly part of the audience; for not a few of the regular attendants at the symphony concerts habitually take the trouble to look up and study the compositions announced to be given, and take the scores with them to concerts and rehearsals. And it is not fair that this—artistically the best—part of the audience should be forced to take such trouble for nothing. We sincerely hope that this will be remedied next season.

——An interesting, as well as instructive lists of the soloists who have appeared in the concerts by the Symphony orchestra in Boston since its founding in 1881 was published in the program of the closing concert last week. This list was compiled by Mr F. R. Comee, the assistant manager of the orchestra, and some idea of its extent may be gained from the fact that it contained a total of 386 names, divided as follows: Soprano 79, alto 37, tenor 25, bass 35, pianoforte 103, violin 71, violoncello 22, flute 4, clarinet 1, oboe 1, horn 1, harp 3, and reader 4.

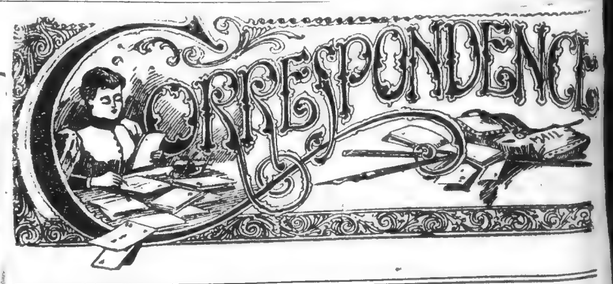
Milwaukee Sentinel May 17.

a book by Joseph Bennett.

W. F. Apthorp, who writes the interesting analytical programmes for the Boston Symphony orchestra, gives a complete account of what has been done at the twenty-four concerts of the Boston season which closed on May 2, from which the following is summarized: In the number of compositions played Wagner leads (as always) with 12, Beethoven coming next with 10. Brahms had 7, Tchaikovsky and Mozart 5, Saint Saëns 4, Dvorák, Berlioz, Liszt, Schumann, Smetana, R. Strauss, 3, and so on, the number of composers represented being 46, of whom 21 were Germans, 8 French, 3 Russian, 3 Bohemian, 2 Hungarian, 4 American, 2 English, 1 Polish, 1 Belgian, 1 Italian. The whole number of compositions played was 99. The list of soloists at these concerts included Mmes. Clarke, Franklin, Henschel, Melba, Olitzka, Rolla, Szumowska, De Vere-Sapio, MM. Adamowski, Ben Davies, Faelten, G. Henschel, Joseffy, Kneisel, Marsick, Ondricek, Sauret, Schulz, Sieveking. Mr. Apthorp appends complete lists of all the soloists heard at these concerts since 1881. There are 387 in all, including 103 pianists (some names, of course, are repeated), 71 violinists, 22 'cellists, 4 flutists, 79 sopranos, 37 altos, 25 tenors, 35 basses, etc.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MAY 20, 1896.



PROVIDENCE.

PROVIDENCE, R. I., May 9, 1896.

EUROPE may have some features in music not yet our own, but we surely have one thing that they have not—namely, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, an organization of artists that may well be called perfect in every way. It is hardly possible to think of anything more beautiful in tone, more brilliant in execution, than the rendering of the program of the last Symphony concert. It consisted, aside from Tschaikowsky's Pathetic Symphony (repeated by request), of selections from Wagner's works, most of them played at the New York concert which brought forth such unanimous praise and enthusiastic reports from the whole metropolitan press. The success of the last season must have been very gratifying to the management, as the attendance showed a marked increase over the previous year.

Published by the Press Publishing Company, 53 to 63 PARK ROW, New York

SUNDAY, JULY 26, 1896.

LIGHTENS TRAVEL'S BURDENS.

J. W. Stockton Is a Railroad Man Whom New England Men Have Cause to Know and Admire.

One of the men who has done much for the comfort of the vast army of summer travellers in and through New England this year is J. W. Stockton, the District Superintendent of the Pullman Palace Car Company. He is pleasant and genial, but his faith in system and order has done more to make his reputation as a successful railroad man than even his personal qualities. By his energy and good judgment he has greatly advanced the interests of the company he represents during the ten years he has been in Boston in his present position.

He began his career as a transportation officer with the Baltimore and Ohio in Pittsburg, and then went to Philadelphia, where he entered the service of the Pullman Company. They sent him to Boston ten years ago, and now all New Englanders who travel and thousands more who go the New England resorts in the summer know and like him.

Mr. Stockton is a native of New Jersey,

J. W. STOCKTON.
District Superintendent of the Pullman Palace Car Company for New England.

and he was educated in Lindsley Institute, Wheeling, W. Va. He is a descendant of Richard Stockton, one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence, and many of his ancestors were prominent officers in the Revolutionary War.

Work of the Symphony Orchestra.

All musical people who care for statistics will be interested in the figures recently compiled by F. R. Comee, assistant manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In the 752 concerts given in Boston by this now famous organization since its founding fifteen years ago, there have appeared a total of 387 soloists, divided as follows:

Soprano	79
Alto	37
Tenor	25
Bass	35
Pianoforte	103
Violin	71
Violoncello	22
Flute	4
Oboe	1
Clarinet	1
Horn	1
Harp	3
Reader	5
	387

All of the above solists made two appearances at each engagement, as two separate series are given each season—one on Friday afternoons, called public rehearsals; the other on the following Saturday evenings, the programme for both being identical ill within a week, he was unable to do any systematic work in his office. Whatever work he did was spasmodic, and his hours were subject to fa[illegible]

A REMARKABLE RECORD.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Has Given 1,339 Concerts Since Its Organization.

Since its inception, fourteen years ago, the Boston Symphony orchestra, in addition to its annual series of forty-eight concerts in Boston, has made seven Western trips, and in the past eleven years monthly trips of one week's duration to New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, and has also visited all the principal New England cities. Including the second monthly trip of this season, which ends December 21, this now famous organization has given the remarkable total of 1,339 performances, thus establishing a record that probably cannot be duplicated in the world. Some of the older European orchestras have been in existence many more years and the New York Philharmonic society, the parent orchestral organization of this country, can show more than fifty years to its credit; but the lesser number of concerts given annually so reduces the total number that the Boston Symphony orchestra undoubtedly heads the list. Seven hundred and nineteen performances have been given in Boston, and 620 in thirty-seven cities throughout the United States, from Maine to Minnesota. Cambridge, Mass., with a series of ninety-seven concerts, which began the first year of the orchestra's existence, and which are held under the auspices of Harvard college in their Memorial hall, heads the list of cities visited.

Assuming an average of five numbers to each concert, between 6,000 and 7,000 have been performed. Over 1,000 soloists have appeared. More than half of them have been singers and the remainder pianists, violinists and 'cellists. Ten members of the orchestra have been with it since its organization and more than one-half of the orchestra have been members for ten years. The Boston symphony was founded and is maintained by Mr. Higginson, one of the Hub's wealthy citizens.

There is one disappointing feature about the list of cities visited—the West is not sufficiently well represented. Kansas City has several times made liberal bids for a concert and each time has been denied.

[126]

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JUNE 10, 1896.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

THE MUSICAL COURIER acknowledges with appreciation the receipt of a neatly bound volume which is a compilation of the programs played in Music Hall, Boston, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the past season, 1895–6. This series of twenty-four programs, accompanied by exhaustive explanatory notes by Mr. W. F. Apthorp, forms unusually interesting material for reference and reading. The programs bear no reference to the performances given in New York and the provinces, in which, however, the orchestral portions have been in some instances repeated in part, if not entire.

A backward survey discloses a superb amount of work in one season. The orchestra and Mr. Emil Paur have not saved themselves in difficulty or interesting variety of scope. The field has been comprehensively covered from Bach to Brahms, with excellent judgment on the part of Mr. Paur in the matter of due contrast. The best lights of the various schools have been included, nor has the orchestra failed in bringing forward for the first time works of recent composers, American and foreign, which have usually established their claim to critical selection.

The statistics in detail of the work done make an admirable showing. Forty-six composers have been represented in these twenty-four concerts, some of them, according to their popularity, being repeated numerous times. Wagner, for instance, has had twelve performances (the highest number), Beethoven ten, Brahms seven, Mozart and Tschaikowsky each five, Schubert and Schumann each three, and so on down to the single performances of many. One hundred and five compositions have been played in all. Of these twenty-three were the performances of symphonies, thirty-seven were given to overtures, preludes and symphonic poems, six were suites and serenades, ten were concertos and instrumental solos, sixteen were scenas, arias and songs and fifteen miscellaneous works. The orchestra was assisted separately at the different concerts by nineteen eminent soloists, including operatic and lyric singers, violinists, 'cellists and pianists.

The range embraced is of the profoundest musical interest, and those good people of Boston who had the fine fortune to follow the twenty-four concerts of this incomparable band will have laid by a volume of education and delight with cherishing. The Boston Symphony Orchestra has not its peer on this side the Atlantic, nor can it have its superior the world over. Further, at no period of its career has it been known to reach a finer, higher strung standard of interpretation and supreme finish than at its closing performances of this past season in New York, as also presumably in Boston.

The hard shell of academic inflexibility incrusting Mr. Paur, which characterized his early readings in this country, has gradually been dropping away. By such rapid degrees has it been disappearing this past season that Mr. Paur's original opponents have had to pause, take breath and carefully consider how they might most gracefully and consistently arrange to overcome their first views. The established spirit of the orchestra, when it came to his hands, the temperamental demands of the American people, the general atmosphere of romance and mobility in which he lived, rehearsed and conducted here, in opposition to the rigid angular Kapellmeister boundaries of his German musical life, have wakened up the hidden feeling in Mr. Paur. He began slowly to observe and adapt himself; he has ended rapidly and in such manner as would lead the American public to suppose that the original spirit of the musician was for a long time repressed, and has finally found its true abiding place.

We note that one of the most representative programs to be adduced in this connection was performed in Boston on May 1 and 2 and was subsequently given almost identically in the Metropolitan Opera House, New York.

It was a Wagner program, including the Rienzi and Eine Faust Overture, the Ride of the Valkyries, the Siegfried Idyl and Sounds from the Forest and the Prelude to the Meistersinger and to Act III. of Lohengrin. The performance of this program was a revelation to former faultfinders with Mr. Paur. His reading of the Faust overture was absolutely unsurpassable in sombre, virile passion and tragic force. Mr. Paur led his band through an interpretation which for intelligent mastery, sweep and glow will always remain memorable. The entire program caught a fire and abandon, a poetry and superb color from the director's inspiration which silenced emphatically all old resentment on the score of lack of temperament with Mr. Paur.

This concert, with its leading landmark of the Faust Overture, stands in New York as the apogee of Mr. Paur's American evolution. It would be impossible to deny that the present leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has compassed an amount of warmth, passion and abandon which would have seemed hopeless to his best American friends on his début with the Boston band three seasons ago.

This superlative band is now in enjoyment of all its old prestige and stands on a footing as supremely artistic and authoritative as its most enthusiastic friends can desire. With the closing results of this past season in view, the outlook for the season 1896–7 under Mr. Paur is as brilliantly successful as any in the annals of its heyday past.

The World

Published by the Press Publishing Company, 53 to 63 PARK ROW, New York

SUNDAY, JULY 26, 1896.

LIGHTENS TRAVEL'S BURDENS.

J. W. Stockton Is a Railroad Man Whom New England Men Have Cause to Know and Admire.

One of the men who has done much for the comfort of the vast army of summer travellers in and through New England this year is J. W. Stockton, the District Superintendent of the Pullman Palace Car Company. He is pleasant and genial, but his faith in system and order has done more to make his reputation as a successful railroad man than even his personal qualities. By his energy and good judgment he has greatly advanced the interests of the company he represents during the ten years he has been in Boston in his present position.

He began his career as a transportation officer with the Baltimore and Ohio in Pittsburg, and then went to Philadelphia, where he entered the service of the Pullman Company. They sent him to Boston ten years ago, and now all New Englanders who travel and thousands more who go the New England resorts in the summer know and like him.

Mr. Stockton is a native of New Jersey,

J. W. STOCKTON.
District Superintendent of the Pullman Palace Car Company for New England.

and he was educated in Lindsley Institute, Wheeling, W. Va. He is a descendant of Richard Stockton, one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence, and many of his ancestors were prominent officers in the Revolutionary War.

THE RICHMOND DISPATCH.

WEDNESDAY.....JUNE 17, 1896.

Work of the Symphony Orchestra.

All musical people who care for statistics will be interested in the figures recently compiled by F. R. Comee, assistant manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In the 752 concerts given in Boston by this now famous organization since its founding fifteen years ago, there have appeared a total of 387 soloists, divided as follows:

Soprano	79
Alto	37
Tenor	25
Bass	35
Pianoforte	103
Violin	71
Violoncello	22
Flute	4
Oboe	1
Clarinet	1
Horn	1
Harp	3
Reader	5
	387

All of the above solists made two appearances at each engagement, as two separate series are given each season—one on Friday afternoons, called public rehearsals; the other on the following Saturday evenings, the programme for both being identical ill within a week, he was unable to do any systematic work in his office. Whatever work he did was spasmodic, and his hours were subject to his variable health.

A REMARKABLE RECORD.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Has Given 1,339 Concerts Since Its Organization.

Since its inception, fourteen years ago, the Boston Symphony orchestra, in addition to its annual series of forty-eight concerts in Boston, has made seven Western trips, and in the past eleven years monthly trips of one week's duration to New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, and has also visited all the principal New England cities. Including the second monthly trip of this season, which ends December 21, this now famous organization has given the remarkable total of 1,339 performances, thus establishing a record that probably cannot be duplicated in the world. Some of the older European orchestras have been in existence many more years and the New York Philharmonic society, the parent orchestral organization of this country, can show more than fifty years to its credit; but the lesser number of concerts given annually so reduces the total number that the Boston Symphony orchestra undoubtedly heads the list. Seven hundred and nineteen performances have been given in Boston, and 620 in thirty-seven cities throughout the United States, from Maine to Minnesota. Cambridge, Mass., with a series of ninety-seven concerts, which began the first year of the orchestra's existence, and which are held under the auspices of Harvard college in their Memorial hall, heads the list of cities visited.

Assuming an average of five numbers to each concert, between 6,000 and 7,000 have been performed. Over 1,000 soloists have appeared. More than half of them have been singers and the remainder pianists, violinists and 'cellists. Ten members of the orchestra have been with it since its organization and more than one-half of the orchestra have been members for ten years. The Boston symphony was founded and is maintained by Mr. Higginson, one of the Hub's wealthy citizens.

There is one disappointing feature about the list of cities visited—the West is not sufficiently well represented. Kansas City has several times made liberal bids for a concert and each time has been denied.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JUNE 10, 1896.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

THE MUSICAL COURIER acknowledges with appreciation the receipt of a neatly bound volume which is a compilation of the programs played in Music Hall, Boston, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the past season, 1895–6. This series of twenty-four programs, accompanied by exhaustive explanatory notes by Mr. W. F. Apthorp, forms unusually interesting material for reference and reading. The programs bear no reference to the performances given in New York and the provinces, in which, however, the orchestral portions have been in some instances repeated in part, if not entire.

A backward survey discloses a superb amount of work in one season. The orchestra and Mr. Emil Paur have not saved themselves in difficulty or interesting variety of scope. The field has been comprehensively covered from Bach to Brahms, with excellent judgment on the part of Mr. Paur in the matter of due contrast. The best lights of the various schools have been included, nor has the orchestra failed in bringing forward for the first time works of recent composers, American and foreign, which have usually established their claim to critical selection.

The statistics in detail of the work done make an admirable showing. Forty-six composers have been represented in these twenty-four concerts, some of them, according to their popularity, being repeated numerous times. Wagner, for instance, has had twelve performances (the highest number), Beethoven ten, Brahms seven, Mozart and Tschaikowsky each five, Schubert and Schumann each three, and so on down to the single performances of many. One hundred and five compositions have been played in all. Of these twenty-three were the performances of symphonies, thirty-seven were given to overtures, preludes and symphonic poems, six were suites and serenades, ten were concertos and instrumental solos, sixteen were scenas, arias and songs and fifteen miscellaneous works. The orchestra was assisted separately at the different concerts by nineteen eminent soloists, including operatic and lyric singers, violinists, 'cellists and pianists.

The range embraced is of the profoundest musical interest, and those good people of Boston who had the fine fortune to follow the twenty-four concerts of this incomparable band will have laid by a volume of education and delight with cherishing. The Boston Symphony Orchestra has not its peer on this side the Atlantic, nor can it have its superior the world over. Further, at no period of its career has it been known to reach a finer, higher strung standard of interpretation and supreme finish than at its closing performances of this past season in New York, as also presumably in Boston.

The hard shell of academic inflexibility incrusting Mr. Paur, which characterized his early readings in this country, has gradually been dropping away. By such rapid degrees has it been disappearing this past season that Mr. Paur's original opponents have had to pause, take breath and carefully consider how they might most gracefully and consistently arrange to overcome their first views. The established spirit of the orchestra, when it came to his hands, the temperamental demands of the American people, the general atmosphere of romance and mobility in which he lived, rehearsed and conducted here, in opposition to the rigid angular Kapellmeister boundaries of his German musical life, have wakened up the hidden feeling in Mr. Paur. He began slowly to observe and adapt himself; he has ended rapidly and in such manner as would lead the American public to suppose that the original spirit of the musician was for a long time repressed, and has finally found its true abiding place.

We note that one of the most representative programs to be adduced in this connection was performed in Boston on May 1 and 2 and was subsequently given almost identically in the Metropolitan Opera House, New York.

It was a Wagner program, including the Rienzi and Eine Faust Overture, the Ride of the Valkyries, the Siegfried Idyl and Sounds from the Forest and the Prelude to the Meistersinger and to Act III. of Lohengrin. The performance of this program was a revelation to former faultfinders with Mr. Paur. His reading of the Faust overture was absolutely unsurpassable in sombre, virile passion and tragic force. Mr. Paur led his band through an interpretation which for intelligent mastery, sweep and glow will always remain memorable. The entire program caught a fire and abandon, a poetry and superb color from the director's inspiration which silenced emphatically all old resentment on the score of lack of temperament with Mr. Paur.

This concert, with its leading landmark of the Faust Overture, stands in New York as the apogee of Mr. Paur's American evolution. It would be impossible to deny that the present leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has compassed an amount of warmth, passion and abandon which would have seemed hopeless to his best American friends on his début with the Boston band three seasons ago.

This superlative band is now in enjoyment of all its old prestige and stands on a footing as supremely artistic and authoritative as its most enthusiastic friends can desire. With the closing results of this past season in view, the outlook for the season 1896–7 under Mr. Paur is as brilliantly successful as any in the annals of its heyday past.

[126]

BLANK PAGE

Symphony Concert

The last of the Season—A Wagner Evening—An Enthusiatic Audience—Mr. Paur Receives an Ovation.

The tenth and last concert of the season was given in Sanders theatre on Thursday evening of last week with a strictly Wagnerian programme. The selections were as follows:

"Die Meistersinger" Prelude.
"Siegfried." Idyll.
"Lohengrin." Preludes to Acts I. and II.
"The Flying Dutchman." Overture.
"Siegfried." Waldweben
"Tristan and Isolde" Prelude and Love-Death
"Die Walkure." Ride of the Valkyries.

Mr. Paur has the distinction of being the only conductor who has given us an entire programme of Wagner, and the cordiality of his reception showed that the audience fully appreciated his efforts to give Cambridge a few of the advantages that Boston has so long enjoyed.

For once we have got the better of our Boston neighbors in the way of a programme, for the "Overture to The Flying Dutchman" and the thrilling "Ride of the wild Valkyries," weigh far more heavily in the balance than the somewhat hackneyed and decidedly non-Wagnerian Rienzi Overture which will be played on Saturday evening. In the prelude to the Meistersinger Wagner has followed out to the letter Gluck's precept that "the overture ought to prepare the audience for the action of the piece, and serve as a kind of argument to it." The melodies, as in all Wagner's overtures, are all drawn from the play, and one has only to turn to the score to find out what each phrase symbolizes, without the help of handbooks, which a witty German critic once called "musical Baedekers." The prelude was splendidly played, the mastersinger's march melody and Walther's "Prize Song" being given with a vigor in fine contrast to the more delicate treatment of the three melodies depicting the opposition to the notions of the old mastersingers. The beautiful and poetic Siegfried-Idyll was also played to perfection, the themes taken from the third act of the opera of Siegfried, representing Brunnhilde's great love scene, and also the fine motive from the Walkure, being worked up with splendid skill. The romantic prelude to Lohengrin, and the grand march which is the orchestral introduction to the third act of the opera supposed to be the festal music at Lohengrin and Elsa's wedding, were both superbly played. "The Flying Dutchman" Overture has been given here frequently before, and each time that we hear it, we are more convinced that it is too much of an orchestral tempest for Sanders theatre. Mr. Paur rode his forces furiously, in keeping with a great storm at sea, and showed his power of self control, by his fine descrescendo to the Andante of Senta's ballad. The Waldweben from Siegfried arranged by Wagner for concert performances is always heard with delight, for it requires no explanation to imagine the sights and sonnets of a whole forest, so graphic is the instrumentation descriptive of the bird's song, the rustling of leaves, together with Siegfried's horn-motive. The prelude and closing scene (Liebes-Tod) from Tristan and Isolde made a great impression, the wind instruments singing the beautiful melody with great expressiveness. The concert ended with a tremendous performance of the Ride of the Valkyries from the opening of the third act of "Die Walkure," the trombones playing for all that they were worth with the horns and trumpet against the agitating, whirling accompaniment of the orchestra. The audience was loud in its expression of delight and Mr. Paur must have felt well pleased with the success which crowned his efforts.

C. R.

Instruments.	Baireuth.	Philharmonic.
First violins	16	18
Second violins	16	18
Violas	12	14
Violoncellos	12	14
Double-basses	8	14
Flutes	3	3
Oboes	3	3
English horn	1	1
Clarinets	3	3
Basset-horn	1	0
Bassoons	3	3
Trumpets	3	3
Horns	8	4
Trombones	3	3
Tympani (pairs)	2	2
Bass trumpet	1	0
Tenor tubas	2	0
Bass tubas	2	1
Contra-bass tuba	1	0
Contra-bass trombone	1	0
Base drum	1	1
Cymbals	1	1
Harps	6	1

Tamb. Castanets - 1
Triangle - 1

[128]

BOSTON EVE...
TUESDAY, AUGUST 11, 1896.

The Musical Courier.
NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 26, 1896.

Here are the soloists who have appeared in the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since its founding in 1881, compiled by Mr. F. R. Comee. The figures indicate the number of appearances of each artist, Mr. Franz Kneisel heading the list with a total of fifteen, closely followed by Mr. Loeffler and Mr. Baermann with thirteen each. Mr. T. Adamowski appeared ten times, and Miss Gertrude Franklin nine times. Eight concerts each are credited to Miss Emma Juch, Mrs. Georg Henschel and Miss Mary How. Mr. William J. Winch and Mr. Fritz Giese each had seven appearances, and Mme. Fursch-Madi, Miss Emily Winant, Mr. Theodore Toedt, Mr. Georg Henschel, Mr. Max Heinrich, Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, Mr. B. J. Lang, Mr. Otto Roth and Mr. Alwin Schroeder each appeared five times. Annie Louise Cary was the soloist at the first concert.

SOPRANO.

Allen, Mrs. E. Humphrey, 3.
Baldwin, Miss Louise.
Beebe, Miss Henrietta.
Blauvelt, Miss Lillian.
Boema, Mme. Gabriella.
Clarke, Miss Caroline Gardner, 2.
Eames, Mme. Emma, 2.
Eaton, Mrs. Elene B.
Franklin, Miss Gertrude, 9.
Fursch-Madi, Mme., 5.
Hall, Miss Marguerite, 2.
Henschel, Mrs. Georg, 8.
Henson, Miss Medora.
Hunt, Miss Clara.
Jahn, Miss Marie.
Jahns, Mme. Steinbach.
Juch, Miss Emma, 8.
Kaschoska, Miss Felicia.
Kellogg, Miss Fanny.
Knowles, Mrs. H. F.
Lehmann, Mme. Lilli, 3.
Materna, Mme. Amalie.
Melba, Mme., 2.
Mielke, Mme. Antonia.
Nikisch, Mrs. Arthur, 3.
Nordica, Mme. Lillian, 4.
Olitzka, Miss Rosa.
Rolla, Miss Kate.
Sapio, Mme. De Vere.
Simms, Miss Hattie Louise.
Smith, Mrs. Marie Barnard, 2.
Stewart, Miss Rose.
Tavary, Mme. Basta.
Thursby, Miss Emma.
Trebelli, Miss Antoinette.
Van Arnheim, Miss Katharine, 2.
White, Miss Priscilla.
Whittier, Miss Harriet S.

ALTO.

Cary, Miss Annie Louise.
Drasdil, Miss Anna.
Edmands, Miss Gertrude, 3.
Glenn, Miss Hope.
How, Miss Mary H., 8.
Huntington, Miss Agnes.
Joachim, Mme. Amalie.
Leimer, Miss Louise, 2.
Little, Miss Lena.
Mitchell, Miss Annie.
Peakes, Miss Sara.
Phillips, Miss Mathilde.
Rollwagen, Miss Louise, 3.
Smith, Miss Lillian Carl.
Welsh, Miss Ita.
Whinnery, Miss Abbie.
Winant, Miss Emily, 5.
Wyman, Mrs. Julie M., 4.

TENOR.

Adams, Mr. Charles R., 4.
Davies, Mr. Ben.
Dippel, Mr. Andreas.
Heinrich, Mr. Wilhelm.
Jordan, Mr. Jules.
Kalisch, Mr. Paul, 2.
Parker, Mr. George J., 2.
Schott, Mr. Anton.
Toedt, Mr. Theodore, 5.
Webber, Mr. Charles F.
Winch, Mr. William J., 7.

BASS.

Babcock, Mr. D. M., 2.
Benzing, Mr. Jacob.
Cirillo, Mr. V., 2.
Fischer, Mr. Emil, 4.
Harlow, Mr. A. F.
Hay, Mr. C. E., 3.
Heinrich, Mr. Max, 5.
Henschel, Mr. Georg, 5.
Hubbard, Mr. Eliot, 2.
Lamson, Mr. Gardner S.
Libby, Mr. J. A.
Martin, Mr. Carl E.
Meyn, Mr. Heinrich, 4.
Reichmann, Mr. Theodor.
Remmertz, Mr. Franz.
Sargent, Mr. Sullivan A.

PIANO.

d'Albert, Mr. Eugen.
Aus der Ohe, Miss Adele, 4.
Baermann, Mr. Carl, 13.
Beach, Mrs. H. H. A., 5.
Bendix, Mr. Otto.
Burmeister, Mr. Richard.
Busoni, Mr. Ferruccio B., 3.
Clark, Mrs. Anna Steiniger, 2.
Carreño, Teresa.
Castellano, Miss Eugenia.
Faelten, Mr. Carl, 4.
Foote, Mr. Arthur.
Friedheim, Mr. Arthur.
Garlichs, Miss Mary E.
Grünfeld, Mr. Alfred.
Heimlicher, Miss Marie.
Henschel, Mr. Georg.
Hollins, Mr. Alfred.
Hopekirk, Mme. Helen, 2.
Huss, Mr. Henry Holden, 2.
Joseffy, Mr. Rafael, 4.
King, Mme. Julia Rivé, 2.
Lang, Mr. B. J., 5.
Lent, Mrs. Ernest.
Maas, Mr. Louis, 2.
MacDowell, Mr. E. A., 3.
Magrath, Mr. George.
Margulies, Miss Adele, 3.
Nowell, Mr. George, 2.
Obrion, Miss Mary E., 3.
De Pachmann, Mr. Vladimir.
Paderewski, Mr. Ignace J., 2.
Paur, Mrs. Emil.
Perabo, Mr. Ernst.
Preston, Mr. John A.
Radecki, Miss Olga von, 3.
Scharwenka, Mr. Xaver.
Schiller, Mme. Madeline, 3.
Sherwood, Mr. William H., 3.
Sieveking, Mr. Martinus.
Stasny, Mr. Carl.
Sumner, Mr. George W.
Szumowska, Miss Antoinette, 2.
Tucker, Mr. H. G., 3.
Utassi, Miss Etelka.
Whiting, Mr. Arthur.
Zeisler, Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield, 4.

VIOLIN.

Adamowski, Mr. T., 10.
Brodsky, Mr. Adolph.
Campanari, Mr. Leandro, 3.
De Seve, Mr. Alfred, 2.
Kneisel, Mr. Franz, 15.
Lichtenberg, Mr. Leopold.
Liebe, Mme. Therese.
Listemann, Mr. Bernhard, 4.
Loeffler, Mr. C. M., 13.
Mahr, Mr. Emil.
Marteau, Mr. Henri.
Marsick, Mr. M., 2.
Nowell, Mr. Willis.
Ondricek, Mr. Franz.
Powell, Miss Maud.
Roth, Mr. Otto, 5.
Sauret, Mr. Emil.
Schmidt, Mr. Louis, 2.
Schnitzler, Mr. Isidor, 2.
Thomson, Mr. César.
Urso, Mme. Camilla, 2.
Ysaye, Mr. Eugene.

VIOLONCELLO.

Bayrhoffer, Mr. Carl,
Giese, Mr. Fritz, 7.
Hekking, Mr. Anton, 2.
Liebe, Mr. Theodore.
Müller, Mr. Wilhelm, 2.
Schroeder, Mr. Alwin, 5.
Schultz, Mr. Leo, 4.

FLUTE.

Heindl, Mr. E. M., 2.
Molé, Mr. Chas., 2.

OBOE.

Sautet, Mr. A.

CLARINET.

Strasser, Mr. E.

HORN.

Reiter, Mr. Xaver.

HARP.

Freygang, Mr. [illegible]
Schuecker, Mr. Heinrich.

READERS.

Riddle, Mr. George, 3.
Ticknor, Mr. Howard Malcolm, 2.

List of Soloists Who Have Appeared in the Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston Since Its Founding in 1881

[Compiled by F. R. Comee.]

The figures indicate the number of appearances of each artist, Mr. Franz Kneisel heading the list with a total of fifteen, closely followed by Mr. Loeffler and Mr. Baermann with thirteen each. Mr. T. Adamowski appeared ten times, and Miss Gertrude Franklin nine times. Eight concerts each are credited to Miss Emma Juch, Mrs. Georg Henschel and Miss Mary How. Mr. William J. Winch and Mr. Fritz Giese each had seven appearances, and Mme. Fursch-Madi, Miss Emily Winant, Mr. Theodore Toedt, Mr. Georg Henschel, Mr. Max Heinrich, Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, Mr. B. J. Lang, Mr. Otto Roth and Mr. Alwin Schroeder each appeared five times. The first soloist to appear at any of the concerts was Annie Louise Cary.

Soprano—
Allen, Mrs. E. Humphrey, 3.
Baldwin, Miss Louise.
Beebe, Miss Henrietta.
Blauvelt, Miss Lillian.
Boema, Mme. Gabriella.
Clarke, Miss Caroline Gardner, 2.
Eames, Mme. Emma, 2.
Eaton, Mrs. Elene B.
Franklin, Miss Gertrude, 9.
Fursch-Madi, Mme., 5.
Hall, Miss Marguerite, 2.
Henschel, Mrs. Georg, 8.
Henson, Miss Medora.
Hunt, Miss Clara.
Jahn, Miss Marie.
Jahns, Mme. Steinbach.
Juch, Miss Emma, 8.
Kaschoska, Miss Felicia.
Kellogg, Miss Fanny.
Knowles, Mrs. H. F.
Lehmann, Mme. Lilli, 3.
Materna, Mme. Amalie.
Melba, Mme., 2.
Mielke, Mme. Antonia.
Nikisch, Mrs. Arthur, 3.
Nordica, Mme. Lillian, 4.
Olitzka Rosa, Miss.
Rolla, Miss Kate.
Sapio, Mme. De-Vere.
Simms, Miss Hattie Louise.
Smith, Mrs. Marie Barnard, 2.
Stewart, Miss Rose.
Tavary, Mme. Basta.
Thursby, Miss Emma.
Trebelli, Miss Antoinette.
Van Arnheim, Miss Katharine, 2.
White, Miss Priscilla.
Whittier, Miss Harriet S.

Alto—
Cary, Miss Annie Louise.
Drasdil, Miss Anna.
Edmands, Miss Gertrude, 3.
Glenn, Miss Hope.
How, Miss Mary H., 3.
Huntington, Miss Agnes.
Joachim, Mme. Amalie.
Leimer, Miss Louise, 2.
Little, Miss Lena.
Mitchell, Miss Annie.
Peakes, Miss Sara.
Phillips, Miss Mathilde.
Rollwagen, Miss Louise, 3.
Smith, Miss Lillian Carl.
Welsh, Miss Ita.
Whinnery, Miss Abbie.
Winant, Miss Emily, 5.
Wyman, Mrs. Julie M., 4.

Tenor—
Adams, Mr. Charles R., 4.
Davies, Mr. Ben.
Dippel, Mr. Andreas.
Heinrich, Mr. Wilhelm.
Jordan, Mr. Jules.
Kalisch, Mr. Paul, 2.
Parker, Mr. George J., 2.
Schott, Mr. Anton.
Toedt, Mr. Theodore, 5.
Webber, Mr. Charles F.
Winch, Mr. William J., 7.

Bass—
Babcock, Mr. D. M., 2.
Benzing, Mr. Jacob.
Cirillo, Mr. V., 2.
Fischer, Mr. Emil, 4.
Harlow, Mr. A. F.
Hay, Mr. C. E., 3.
Heinrich, Mr. Max, 5.
Henschel, Mr. Georg, 5.
Hubbard, Mr. Eliot, 2.
Lamson, Mr. Gardner S.
Libby, Mr. J. A.
Martin, Mr. Carl E.
Meyn, Mr. Heinrich, 4.
Reichmann, Mr. Theodor.
Remmertz, Mr. Franz.
Sargent, Mr. Sullivan A.

Pianoforte—
D'Albert, Mr. Eugen.
Aus der Ohe, Miss Adele, 4.
Baermann, Mr. Carl, 13.
Beach, Mrs. H. H. A., 5.
Bendix, Mr. Otto.
Burmeister, Mr. Richard.
Busoni, Mr. Ferruccio B., 3.
Clark, Mrs. Anna Steiniger, 2.
Carreno, Miss Teresa.
Castellano, Miss Eugenia.
Faelten, Mr. Carl, 4.
Foote, Mr. Arthur.
Friedheim, Mr. Arthur.
Garlichs, Miss Mary E.
Grünfeldt, Mr. Alfred.
Heimlicher, Miss Marie.
Henschel, Mr. Georg.
Hollins, Mr. Alfred.
Hopekirk, Mme. Helen, 2.
Huss, Mr. Henry Holden, 2.
Joseffy, Mr. Rafael, 4.
King, Mme. Julia Rivé, 2.
Lang, Mr. B. J., 5.
Lent, Mrs. Ernest.
Maas, Mr. Louis, 2.
MacDowell, Mr. E. A., 3.
Magrath, Mr. George.
Margulies, Miss Adele, 3.
Nowell, Mr. George, 2.
Obrion, Miss Mary E., 3.
De Pachmann, Mr. Vladimir.
Paderewski, Mr. Ignace J., 2.
Paur, Mrs. Emil.
Perabo, Mr. Ernst.
Preston, Mr. John A.
Radecki, Miss Olga von, 3.
Scharwenka, Mr. Xaver.
Schiller, Mme. Madeline, 3.
Sherwood, Mr. William H., 3.
Sieveking, Mr. Martinus.
Stasny, Mr. Carl.
Sumner, Mr. George W.
Szumowska, Miss Antoinette, 2.
Tucker, Mr. H. G., 3.
Utassi, Miss Etelka.
Whiting, Mr. Arthur.
Zeisler, Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield, 4.

Violin—
Adamowski, Mr. T., 10.
Brodsky, Mr. Adolph.
Campanari, Mr. Leandro, 3.
DeSeve, Mr. Alfred, 2.
Kneisel, Mr. Franz, 15.
Lichtenberg, Mr. Leopold.
Liebe, Mme. Therese.
Listemann, Mr. Bernhard, 4.
Loeffler, Mr. C. M., 13.
Mahr, Mr. Emil.
Marteau, Mr. Henri.
Marsick, Mr. M., 2.
Nowell, Mr. Willis.
Ondricek, Mr. Franz.
Powell, Miss Maud.
Roth, Mr. Otto, 5.
Sauret, Mr. Emil.
Schmidt, Mr. Louis, 2.
Schnitzler, Mr. Isidor, 2.
Thomson, Mr. César.
Urso, Mme. Camilla, 2.
Ysaye, Mr. Eugene.

Violoncello—
Bayrhoffer, Mr. Carl.
Giese, Mr. Fritz, 7.
Hekking, Mr. Anton, 2.
Liebe, Mr. Theodore.
Müller, Mr. Wilhelm, 2.
Schroeder, Mr. Alwin, 5.
Schultz, Mr. Leo, 4.

Flute—
Heindl, Mr. E. M., 2.
Molé, Mr. Charles, 2.

Oboe—
Sautet, Mr. A.

Clarinet—
Strasser, Mr. E.

Horn—
Reiter, Mr. Xaver.

Harp—

Symphony Concert

The last of the Season—A Wagner Evening—An Enthusiatic Audience—Mr. Paur Receives an Ovation.

The tenth and last concert of the season was given in Sanders theatre on Thursday evening of last week with a strictly Wagnerian programme. The selections were as follows:

"Die Meistersinger" Prelude.
"Siegfried." Idyll.
"Lohengrin." Preludes to Acts I. and II.
"The Flying Dutchman." Overture.
"Siegfried." Waldweben
"Tristan and Isolde" Prelude and Love-Death
"Die Walkure." Ride of the Valkyries.

Mr. Paur has the distinction of being the only conductor who has given us an entire programme of Wagner, and the cordiality of his reception showed that the audience fully appreciated his efforts to give Cambridge a few of the advantages that Boston has so long enjoyed.

For once we have got the better of our Boston neighbors in the way of a programme, for the "Overture to The Flying Dutchman" and the thrilling "Ride of the wild Valkyries," weigh far more heavily in the balance than the somewhat hackneyed and decidedly non-Wagnerian Rienzi Overture which will be played on Saturday evening. In the prelude to the Meistersinger Wagner has followed out to the letter Gluck's precept that "the overture ought to prepare the audience for the action of the piece, and serve as a kind of argument to it." The melodies, as in all Wagner's overtures, are all drawn from the play, and one has only to turn to the score to find out what each phrase symbolizes, without the help of handbooks, which a witty German critic once called "musical Baedekers." The prelude was splendidly played, the mastersinger's march melody and Walther's "Prize Song" being given with a vigor in fine contrast to the more delicate treatment of the three melodies depicting the opposition to the notions of the old mastersingers. The beautiful and poetic Siegfried-Idyll was also played to perfection, the themes taken from the third act of the opera of Siegfried, representing Brunnhilde's great love scene, and also the fine motive from the Walkure, being worked up with splendid skill. The romantic prelude to Lohengrin, and the grand march which is the orchestral introduction to the third act of the opera supposed to be the festal music at Lohengrin and Elsa's wedding, were both superbly played. "The Flying Dutchman" Overture has been given here frequently before, and each time that we hear it, we are more convinced that it is too much of an orchestral tempest for Sanders theatre. Mr. Paur rode his forces furiously, in keeping with a great storm at sea, and showed his power of self control, by his fine descrescendo to the Andante of Senta's ballad. The Waldweben from Siegfried arranged by Wagner for concert performances is always heard with delight, for it requires no explanation to imagine the sights and sonnets of a whole forest, so graphic is the instrumentation descriptive of the bird's song, the rustling of leaves, together with Siegfried's horn-motive. The prelude and closing scene (Liebes-Tod) from Tristan and Isolde made a great impression, the wind instruments singing the beautiful melody with great expressiveness. The concert ended with a tremendous performance of the Ride of the Valkyries from the opening of the third act of "Die Walkure," the trombones playing for all that they were worth with the horns and trumpet against the agitating, whirling accompaniment of the orchestra. The audience was loud in its expression of delight and Mr. Paur must have felt well pleased with the success which crowned his efforts.

C. R.

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT.
TUESDAY, AUGUST 11, 1896.

Instruments	Bairenth	B. S.	Philharmonic.
First violins	16	16.	18
Second violins	16	14.	18
Violas	12	10.	14
Violoncellos	12	8.	14
Double-basses	8	8.	14
Flutes	3	3.	3
Oboes	3	2.	3
English horn	1	1.	1
Clarinets	3	3.	3
Basset-horn	1	0.	0
Bassoons	3	3.	3
Trumpets	3	3.	3
Horns	8	4.	4
Trombones	3	3.	3
Tympani (pairs)	2	2.	2
Bass trumpet	1	0.	0
Tenor tubas	2	2.	0
Bass tubas	2	2.	1
Contra-bass tuba	1	1.	0
Contra-bass trombone	1	0.	0
Bass drum	1	1.	1
Cymbals	1	1.	1
Harps	6	1.	1

Tamb. Cast. Cymbals - 1.
Saxophone - 1.

[128]

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 26, 1896.

Here are the soloists who have appeared in the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since its founding in 1881, compiled by Mr. F. R. Comee. The figures indicate the number of appearances of each artist, Mr. Franz Kneisel heading the list with a total of fifteen, closely followed by Mr. Loeffler and Mr. Baermann with thirteen each. Mr. T. Adamowski appeared ten times, and Miss Gertrude Franklin nine times. Eight concerts each are credited to Miss Emma Juch, Mrs. Georg Henschel and Miss Mary How. Mr. William J. Winch and Mr. Fritz Giese each had seven appearances, and Mme. Fursch-Madi, Miss Emily Winant, Mr. Theodore Toedt, Mr. Georg Henschel, Mr. Max Heinrich, Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, Mr. B. J. Lang, Mr. Otto Roth and Mr. Alvin Schroeder each appeared five times. Annie Louise Cary was the soloist at the first concert.

SOPRANO.

Allen, Mrs. E. Humphrey, 3.
Baldwin, Miss Louise.
Beebe, Miss Henrietta.
Blauvelt, Miss Lillian.
Boema, Mme. Gabriella.
Clarke, Miss Caroline Gardner, 2.
Eames, Mme. Emma, 2.
Eaton, Mrs. Elene B.
Franklin, Miss Gertrude, 9.
Fursch-Madi, Mme., 5.
Hall, Miss Marguerite, 2.
Henschel, Mrs. Georg, 8.
Henson, Miss Medora.
Hunt, Miss Clara.
Jahn, Miss Marie.
Jahns, Mme. Steinbach.
Juch, Miss Emma, 8.
Kaschoska, Miss Felicia.
Kellogg, Miss Fanny.
Knowles, Mrs. H. F.
Lehmann, Mme. Lilli, 3.
Materna, Mme. Amalie.
Melba, Mme., 2.
Mielke, Mme. Antonia.
Nikisch, Mrs. Arthur, 3.
Nordica, Mme. Lillian, 4.
Olitzka, Miss Rosa.
Rolla, Miss Kate.
Sapio, Mme. De Vere.
Simms, Miss Hattie Louise.
Smith, Mrs. Marie Barnard, 2.
Stewart, Miss Rose.
Tavary, Mme. Basta.
Thursby, Miss Emma.
Trebelli, Miss Antoinette.
Van Arnheim, Miss Katharine, 2.
White, Miss Priscilla.
Whittier, Miss Harriet S.

ALTO.

Cary, Miss Annie Louise.
Drasdil, Miss Anna.
Edmands, Miss Gertrude, 3.
Glenn, Miss Hope.
How, Miss Mary H., 8.
Huntington, Miss Agnes.
Joachim, Mme. Amalie.
Leimer, Miss Louise, 2.
Little, Miss Lena.
Mitchell, Miss Annie.
Peakes, Miss Sara.
Phillips, Miss Mathilde.
Rollwagen, Miss Louise, 3.
Smith, Miss Lillian Carl.
Welsh, Miss Ita.
Whinnery, Miss Abbie.
Winant, Miss Emily, 5.
Wyman, Mrs. Julie M., 4.

TENOR.

Adams, Mr. Charles R., 4.
Davies, Mr. Ben.
Dippel, Mr. Andreas.
Heinrich, Mr. Wilhelm.
Jordan, Mr. Jules.
Kalisch, Mr. Paul, 2.
Parker, Mr. George J., 2.
Schott, Mr. Anton.
Toedt, Mr. Theodore, 5.
Webber, Mr. Charles F.
Winch, Mr. William J., 7.

BASS.

Babcock, Mr. D. M., 2.
Benzing, Mr. Jacob.
Cirillo, Mr. V., 2.
Fischer, Mr. Emil, 4.
Harlow, Mr. A. F.
Hay, Mr. C. E., 3.
Heinrich, Mr. Max, 5.
Henschel, Mr. Georg, 5.
Hubbard, Mr. Eliot, 2.
Lamson, Mr. Gardner S.
Libby, Mr. J. A.
Martin, Mr. Carl E.
Meyn, Mr. Heinrich, 4.
Reichmann, Mr. Theodor.
Remmertz, Mr. Franz.
Sargent, Mr. Sullivan A.

PIANO.

d'Albert, Mr. Eugen.
Aus der Ohe, Miss Adele, 4.
Baermann, Mr. Carl, 13.
Beach, Mrs. H. H. A., 5.
Bendix, Mr. Otto.
Burmeister, Mr. Richard.
Busoni, Mr. Ferruccio B., 3.
Clark, Mrs. Anna Steiniger, 2.
Carreño, Teresa.
Castellano, Miss Eugenia.
Faelten, Mr. Carl, 4.
Foote, Mr. Arthur.
Friedheim, Mr. Arthur.
Garlichs, Miss Mary E.
Grünfeld, Mr. Alfred.
Heimlicher, Miss Marie.
Henschel, Mr. Georg.
Hollins, Mr. Alfred.
Hopekirk, Mme. Helen, 2.
Huss, Mr. Henry Holden, 2.
Joseffy, Mr. Rafael, 4.
King, Mme. Julia Rivé, 2.
Lang, Mr. B. J., 5.
Lent, Mrs. Ernest.
Maas, Mr. Louis, 2.
MacDowell, Mr. E. A., 3.
Magrath, Mr. George.
Margulies, Miss Adele, 3.
Nowell, Mr. George, 2.
Obrion, Miss Mary E., 3.
De Pachmann, Mr. Vladimir.
Paderewski, Mr. Ignace J., 2.
Paur, Mrs. Emil.
Perabo, Mr. Ernst.
Preston, Mr. John A.
Radecki, Miss Olga von, 3.
Scharwenka, Mr. Xaver.
Schiller, Mme. Madeline, 3.
Sherwood, Mr. William H., 3.
Sieveking, Mr. Martinus.
Stasny, Mr. Carl.
Sumner, Mr. George W.
Szumowska, Miss Antoinette, 2.
Tucker, Mr. H. G., 3.
Utassi, Miss Etelka.
Whiting, Mr. Arthur.
Zeisler, Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield, 4.

VIOLIN.

Adamowski, Mr. T., 10.
Brodsky, Mr. Adolph.
Campanari, Mr. Leandro, 3.
De Seve, Mr. Alfred, 2.
Kneisel, Mr. Franz, 15.
Lichtenberg, Mr. Leopold.
Liebe, Mme. Therese.
Listemann, Mr. Bernhard, 4.
Loeffler, Mr. C. M., 13.
Mahr, Mr. Emil.
Marteau, Mr. Henri.
Marsick, Mr. M., 2.
Nowell, Mr. Willis.
Ondricek, Mr. Franz.
Powell, Miss Maud.
Roth, Mr. Otto, 5.
Sauret, Mr. Emil.
Schmidt, Mr. Louis, 2.
Schnitzler, Mr. Isidor, 2.
Thomson, Mr. César.
Urso, Mme. Camilla, 2.
Ysaye, Mr. Eugene.

VIOLONCELLO.

Bayrhoffer, Mr. Carl,
Giese, Mr. Fritz, 7.
Hekking, Mr. Anton, 2.
Liebe, Mr. Theodore.
Müller, Mr. Wilhelm, 2.
Schroeder, Mr. Alwin, 5.
Schultz, Mr. Leo, 4.

FLUTE.

Heindl, Mr. E. M., 2.
Molé, Mr. Chas., 2.

OBOE.

Sautet, Mr. A.

CLARINET.

Strasser, Mr. E.

HORN.

Reiter, Mr. Xaver.

HARP.

Freygang, Mr. A.
Schuecker, Mr. Heinrich.

READERS.

Riddle, Mr. George, 3.
Ticknor, Mr. Howard Malcolm, 2.

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

List of Soloists Who Have Appeared in the Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston Since Its Founding in 1881

[Compiled by F. R. Comee.]

The figures indicate the number of appearances of each artist, Mr. Franz Kneisel heading the list with a total of fifteen, closely followed by Mr. Loeffler and Mr. Baermann with thirteen each. Mr. T. Adamowski appeared ten times, and Miss Gertrude Franklin nine times. Eight concerts each are credited to Miss Emma Juch, Mrs. Georg Henschel and Miss Mary How. Mr. William J. Winch and Mr. Fritz Giese each had seven appearances, and Mme. Fursch-Madi, Miss Emily Winant, Mr. Theodore Toedt, Mr. Georg Henschel, Mr. Max Heinrich, Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, Mr. B. J. Lang, Mr. Otto Roth and Mr. Alwin Schroeder each appeared five times. The first soloist to appear at any of the concerts was Annie Louise Cary.

Soprano—
Allen, Mrs. E. Humphrey, 3.
Baldwin, Miss Louise.
Beebe, Miss Henrietta.
Blauvelt, Miss Lillian.
Boema, Mme. Gabriella.
Clarke, Miss Caroline Gardner, 2.
Eames, Mme. Emma, 2.
Eaton, Mrs. Elene B.
Franklin, Miss Gertrude, 9.
Fursch-Madi, Mme., 5.
Hall, Miss Marguerite, 2.
Henschel, Mrs. Georg, 8.
Henson, Miss Medora.
Hunt, Miss Clara.
Jahn, Miss Marie.
Jahns, Mme. Steinbach.
Juch, Miss Emma, 8.
Kaschoska, Miss Felicia.
Kellogg, Miss Fanny.
Knowles, Mrs. H. F.
Lehmann, Mme. Lilli, 3.
Materna, Mme. Amalie.
Melba, Mme., 2.
Mielke, Mme. Antonia.
Nikisch, Mrs. Arthur, 3.
Nordica, Mme. Lillian, 4.
Olitzka Rosa, Miss.
Rolla, Miss Kate.
Sapio, Mme. De-Vere.
Simms, Miss Hattie Louise.
Smith, Mrs. Marie Barnard, 2.
Stewart, Miss Rose.
Tavary, Mme. Basta.
Thursby, Miss Emma.
Trebelli, Miss Antoinette.
Van Arnheim, Miss Katharine, 2.
White, Miss Priscilla.
Whittier, Miss Harriet S.

Alto—
Cary, Miss Annie Louise.
Drasdil, Miss Anna.
Edmands, Miss Gertrude, 3.
Glenn, Miss Hope.
How, Miss Mary H., 8.
Huntington, Miss Agnes.
Joachim, Mme. Amalie.
Leimer, Miss Louise, 2.
Little, Miss Lena.
Mitchell, Miss Annie.
Peakes, Miss Sara.
Phillips, Miss Mathilde.
Rollwagen, Miss Louise, 3.
Smith, Miss Lillian Carl.
Welsh, Miss Ita.
Whinnery, Miss Abbie.
Winant, Miss Emily, 5.
Wyman, Mrs. Julie M., 4.

Tenor—
Adams, Mr. Charles R., 4.
Davies, Mr. Ben.
Dippel, Mr. Andreas.
Heinrich, Mr. Wilhelm.
Jordan, Mr. Jules.
Kalisch, Mr. Paul, 2.
Parker, Mr. George J., 2.
Schott, Mr. Anton.
Toedt, Mr. Theodore, 5.
Webber, Mr. Charles F.
Winch, Mr. William J., 7.

Bass—
Babcock, Mr. D. M., 2.
Benzing, Mr. Jacob.
Cirillo, Mr. V., 2.
Fischer, Mr. Emil, 4.
Harlow, Mr. A. F.
Hay, Mr. C. E., 3.
Heinrich, Mr. Max, 5.
Henschel, Mr. Georg, 5.
Hubbard, Mr. Eliot, 2.
Lamson, Mr. Gardner S.
Libby, Mr. J. A.
Martin, Mr. Carl E.
Meyn, Mr. Heinrich, 4.
Reichmann, Mr. Theodor.
Remmertz, Mr. Franz.
Sargent, Mr. Sullivan A.

Pianoforte—
D'Albert, Mr. Eugen.
Aus der Ohe, Miss Adele, 4.
Baermann, Mr. Carl, 13.
Beach, Mrs. H. H. A., 5.
Bendix, Mr. Otto.
Burmeister, Mr. Richard.
Busoni, Mr. Ferruccio B., 3.
Clark, Mrs. Anna Steiniger, 2.
Carreno, Miss Teresa.
Castellano, Miss Eugenia.
Faelten, Mr. Carl, 4.
Foote, Mr. Arthur.
Friedheim, Mr. Arthur.
Garlichs, Miss Mary E.
Grünfeldt, Mr. Alfred.
Heimlicher, Miss Marie.
Henschel, Mr. Georg.
Hollins, Mr. Alfred.
Hopekirk, Mme. Helen, 2.
Huss, Mr. Henry Holden, 2.
Joseffy, Mr. Rafael, 4.
King, Mme. Julia Rivé, 2.
Lang, Mr. B. J., 5.
Lent, Mrs. Ernest.
Maas, Mr. Louis, 2.
MacDowell, Mr. E. A., 3.
Magrath, Mr. George.
Margulies, Miss Adele, 3.
Nowell, Mr. George, 2.
Obrion, Miss Mary E., 3.
De Pachmann, Mr. Vladimir.
Paderewski, Mr. Ignace J., 2.
Paur, Mrs. Emil.
Perabo, Mr. Ernst.
Preston, Mr. John A.
Radecki, Miss Olga von, 3.
Scharwenka, Mr. Xaver.
Schiller, Mme. Madeline, 3.
Sherwood, Mr. William H., 3.
Sieveking, Mr. Martinus.
Stasny, Mr. Carl.
Sumner, Mr. George W.
Szumowska, Miss Antoinette, 2.
Tucker, Mr. H. G., 3.
Utassi, Miss Etelka.
Whiting, Mr. Arthur.
Zeisler, Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield, 4.

Violin—
Adamowski, Mr. T., 10.
Brodsky, Mr. Adolph.
Campanari, Mr. Leandro, 3.
DeSeve, Mr. Alfred, 2.
Kneisel, Mr. Franz, 15.
Lichtenberg, Mr. Leopold.
Liebe, Mme. Therese.
Listemann, Mr. Bernhard, 4.
Loeffler, Mr. C. M., 13.
Mahr, Mr. Emil.
Marteau, Mr. Henri.
Marsick, Mr. M., 2.
Nowell, Mr. Willis.
Ondricek, Mr. Franz.
Powell, Miss Maud.
Roth, Mr. Otto, 5.
Sauret, Mr. Emil.
Schmidt, Mr. Louis, 2.
Schnitzler, Mr. Isidor, 2.
Thomson, Mr. César.
Urso, Mme. Camilla, 2.
Ysaye, Mr. Eugene.

Violoncello—
Bayrhoffer, Mr. Carl.
Giese, Mr. Fritz, 7.
Hekking, Mr. Anton, 2.
Liebe, Mr. Theodore.
Müller, Mr. Wilhelm, 2.
Schroeder, Mr. Alwin, 5.
Schultz, Mr. Leo, 4.

Flute—
Heindl, Mr. E. M., 2.
Molé, Mr. Charles, 2.

Oboe—
Sautet, Mr. A.

Clarinet—
Strasser, Mr. E.

Horn—
Reiter, Mr. Xaver.

Harp—
Freygang, Mr. A.
Schuecker, Mr. Heinrich, 2.

Readers—
Riddle, Mr. George, 3.
Ticknor, Mr. Howard Malcolm, 2.

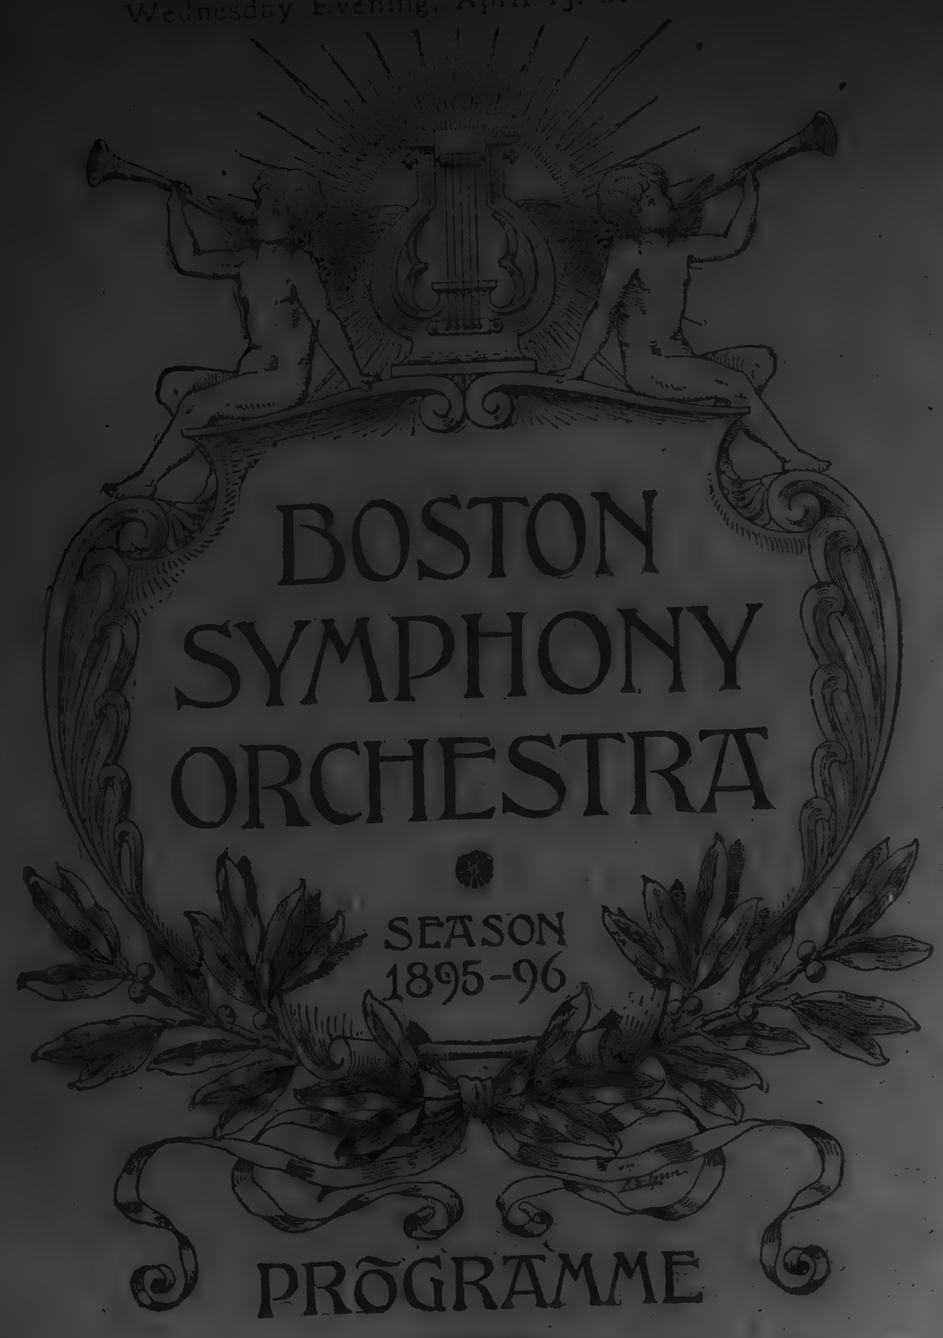
BLANK PAGE

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

PORTLAND

CITY HALL,

Wednesday Evening, April 15, at 8 o'clock.



C. A. ELLIS, Manager. F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

Tickets, including reserved seats, $1.00 and $1.50, according to location, on sale (or mailed), at Stockbridge's Music Store.

Half fare and late trains on M. C. R.R. and G. T. Ry. to all holding "Symphony" Tickets. Analytical Programmes sent to any address.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

FIFTEENTH SEASON, 1895-96.
THIRTEEN HUNDRED AND NINETY-THIRD PERFORMANCE.
ONE HUNDRED AND THIRD PERFORMANCE IN CAMBRIDGE.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

IX. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, APRIL 9, AT 7.45, P. M.

Programme.

TSCHAIKOWSKY.	SYMPHONY No. 6, in B minor, "Pathétique," op. 74 I. Adagio. — Allegro non troppo. II. Allegro con grazia. III. Allegro molto vivace. IV. Finale: Adagio lamentoso.
WAGNER.	"WALTHER'S PREISLIED," from "Die Meistersinger."
SAINT-SAËNS.	SYMPHONIC POEM, "Le Rouet d'Omphale," op. 31
WAGNER.	"SPRING SONG," from "Die Walküre."
WAGNER.	OVERTURE. "Tannhaüser."

Soloist:

Mr. BEN DAVIES.

The Programme of the Tenth and last Concert, on Thursday Evening, April 30, will be composed entirely of Wagner selections.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

FIFTEENTH SEASON, 1895-96.
FOURTEEN HUNDRED AND SECOND PERFORMANCE.
ONE HUNDRED AND FOURTH PERFORMANCE IN CAMBRIDGE.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

X. CONCERT.

[Last of the Season.]

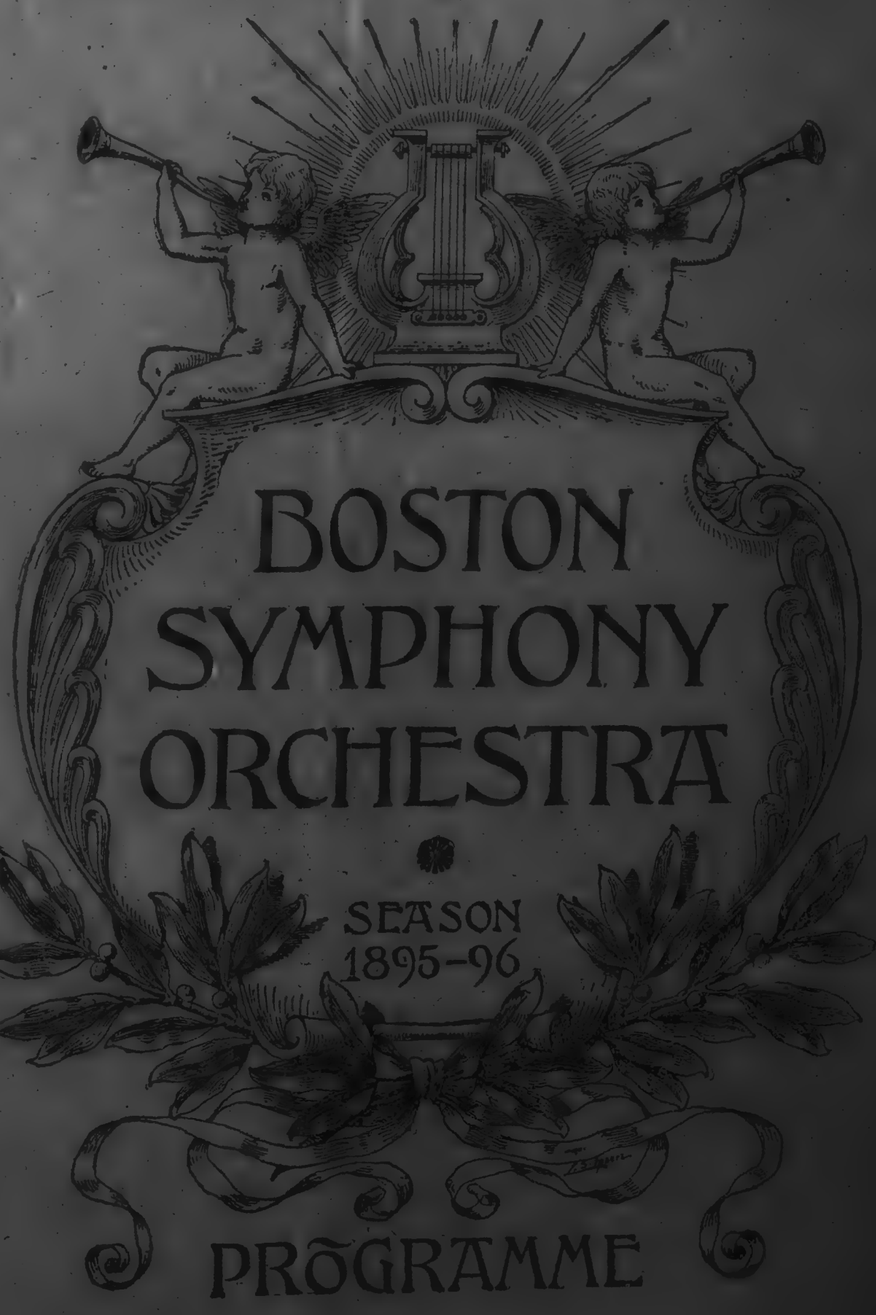
THURSDAY, APRIL 30, AT 7.45, P. M.

Wagner Programme.

"DIE MEISTERSINGER."	PRELUDE.
"SIEGFRIED."	IDYLL.
"LOHENGRIN."	PRELUDES TO ACTS I. AND III.
"THE FLYING DUTCHMAN."	OVERTURE.
"SIEGFRIED."	WALDWEBEN.
"TRISTAN AND ISOLDE."	PRELUDE AND LOVE-DEATH.
"DIE WALKÜRE."	RIDE OF THE VALKYRIES.

INFANTRY HALL, ... PROVIDENCE.

Wednesday Evening, April 22, at 8 o'clock precisely.



C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

Single tickets, at $1.25 each on sale at Infantry Hall.

[130]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

CITY HALL, ... PORTLAND.

Wednesday Evening, April 15, at 8 o'clock.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager. F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

Tickets, including reserved seats, $1.00 and $1.50, according to location, on sale (or mailed), at Stockbridge's Music Store.
Half fare and late trains on M. C. R.R. and G. T. Ry. to all holding "Symphony" Tickets. Analytical Programmes sent to any address.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

FIFTEENTH SEASON, 1895-96.
THIRTEEN HUNDRED AND NINETY-THIRD PERFORMANCE.
ONE HUNDRED AND THIRD PERFORMANCE IN CAMBRIDGE.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

IX. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, APRIL 9, AT 7.45, P. M.

Programme.

TSCHAIKOWSKY.	SYMPHONY No. 6, in B minor, "Pathétique," op. 74 I. Adagio. — Allegro non troppo. II. Allegro con grazia. III. Allegro molto vivace. IV. Finale: Adagio lamentoso.
WAGNER.	"WALTHER'S PREISLIED," from "Die Meistersinger."
SAINT-SAENS.	SYMPHONIC POEM, "Le Rouet d'Omphale," op. 31
WAGNER.	"SPRING SONG," from "Die Walküre."
WAGNER.	OVERTURE. "Tannhaüser."

Soloist:

Mr. BEN DAVIES.

The Programme of the Tenth and last Concert, on Thursday Evening, April 30, will be composed entirely of Wagner selections.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

FIFTEENTH SEASON, 1895-96.
FOURTEEN HUNDRED AND SECOND PERFORMANCE.
ONE HUNDRED AND FOURTH PERFORMANCE IN CAMBRIDGE.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

X. CONCERT.

[Last of the Season.]

THURSDAY, APRIL 30, AT 7.45, P. M.

Wagner Programme.

"DIE MEISTERSINGER."	PRELUDE.
"SIEGFRIED."	IDYLL.
"LOHENGRIN."	PRELUDES TO ACTS I. AND III.
"THE FLYING DUTCHMAN."	OVERTURE.
"SIEGFRIED."	WALDWEBEN.
"TRISTAN AND ISOLDE."	PRELUDE AND LOVE-DEATH.
"DIE WALKÜRE."	RIDE OF THE VALKYRIES.

INFANTRY HALL, ... PROVIDENCE.

Wednesday Evening, April 22, at 8 o'clock precisely.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

6

Single tickets, at $1.25 each on sale at Infantry Hall.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

METROPOLITAN OPERA HOUSE, NEW YORK.

Thursday Evening, March 26, at 8.15 precisely.

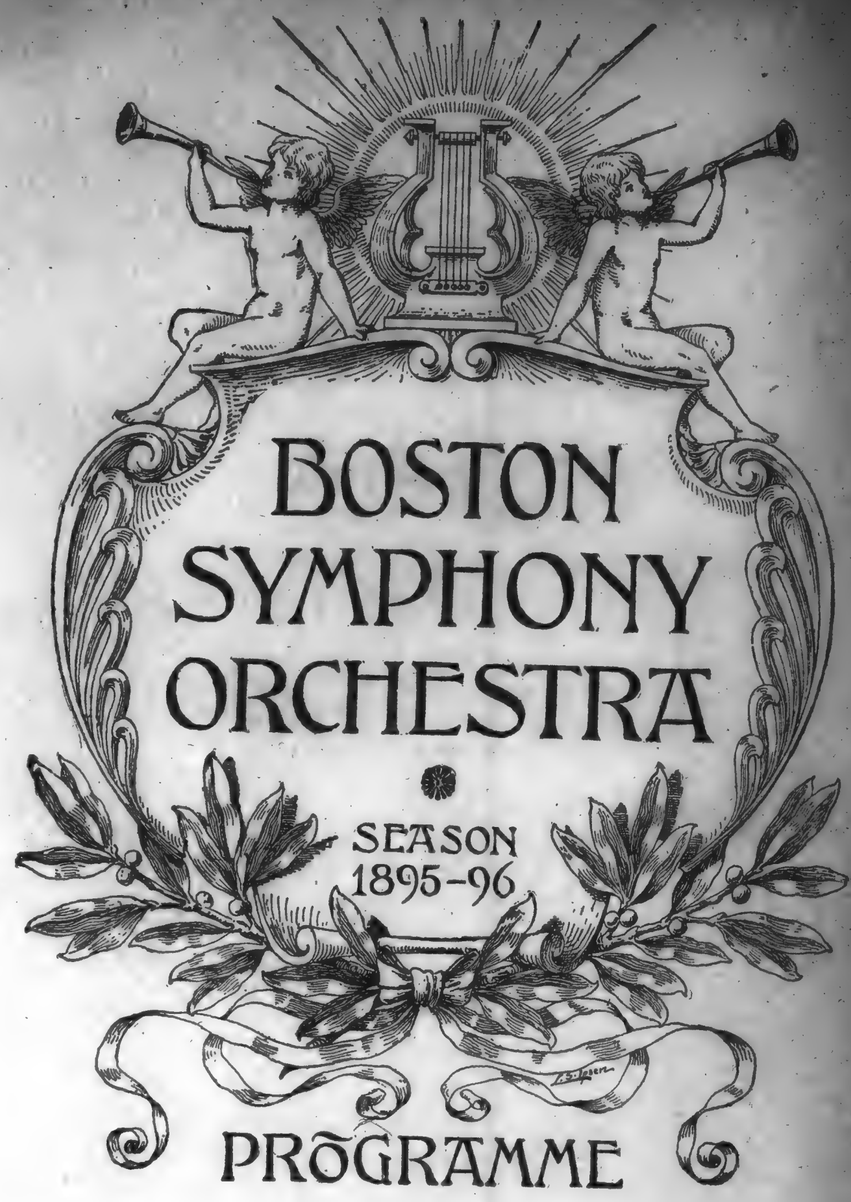
C. A. ELLIS, Manager. 5 F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

Copies of this Programme-book, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, can be obtained, free of charge, at Schuberth's Music Store, 23 Union Square.

Tickets at Schuberth's and at the Metropolitan Opera House.

MUSIC HALL, ... BALTIMORE.

Wednesday Evening, March 25, at 8.15 precisely.



C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager. 5 Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Albert's, 13 No. Charles St.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, . . . PHILADELPHIA.

Saturday Afternoon, March 28, at 2.30.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager. 5 Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Fischer's, 1221 Chestnut St.

[131]

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, ... BROOKLYN.

Friday Evening, March 27, at 8.15 precisely.

Under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences and the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager. 5 Tickets at the Brooklyn Institute and at Chandler's Music Store, 300 Fulton Street.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

FIFTEENTH SEASON, 1895-96.
THIRTEEN HUNDRED AND SEVENTY-NINTH PERFORMANCE.
ONE HUNDRED AND SECOND PERFORMANCE IN CAMBRIDGE.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

VIII. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, MARCH 12, AT 7.45, P. M.

Programme.

BEETHOVEN. SYMPHONY No. 6, in F major, "Pastorale," op. 68.
I. ERWACHEN HEITERER EMPFINDUNGEN BEI DER ANKUNFT AUF DEM LANDE: Allegro ma non troppo.
II. SCENE AM BACH: Andante molto moto.
III. LUSTIGES ZUSAMMENSEIN DER LANDLEUTE: Allegro.
IV. GEWITTER, STURM: Allegro.
V. HIRTENGESANG. FROHE UND DANKBARE GEFÜHLE NACH DEM STURM: Allegretto.

ARTHUR WHITING. FANTASIE, B-flat minor, op. 11.
Moderato maestoso. — Allegro appassionata. — Pastorale. — Finale.

WAGNER. OVERTURE. "Rienzi."

Soloist:

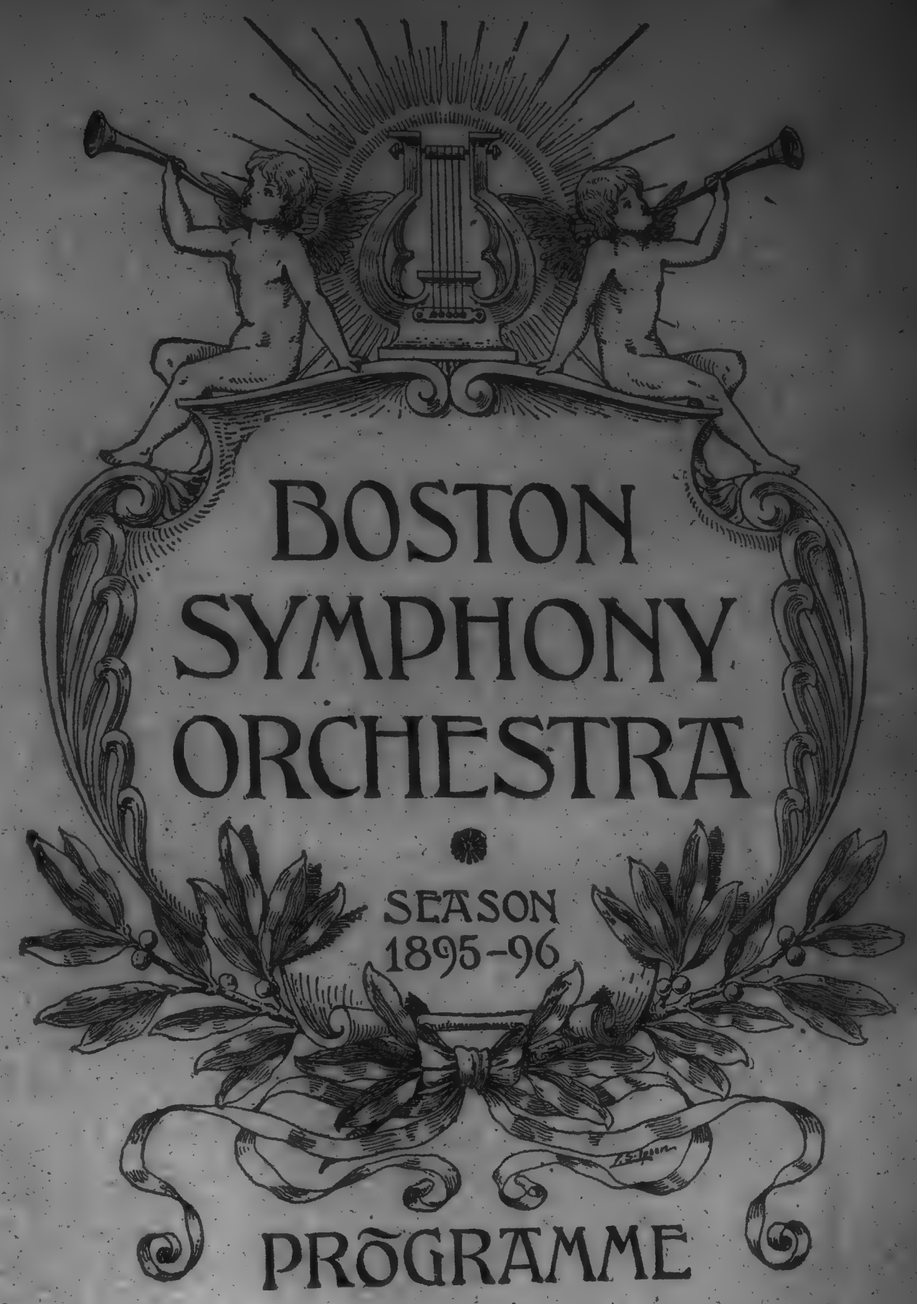
Mr. ARTHUR WHITING.

The Pianoforte is a Mason and Hamlin.

Ninth Concert, Thursday, April 9, 1896.

INFANTRY HALL, ... PROVIDENCE.

Wednesday Evening, March 18, at 8 o'clock precisely.



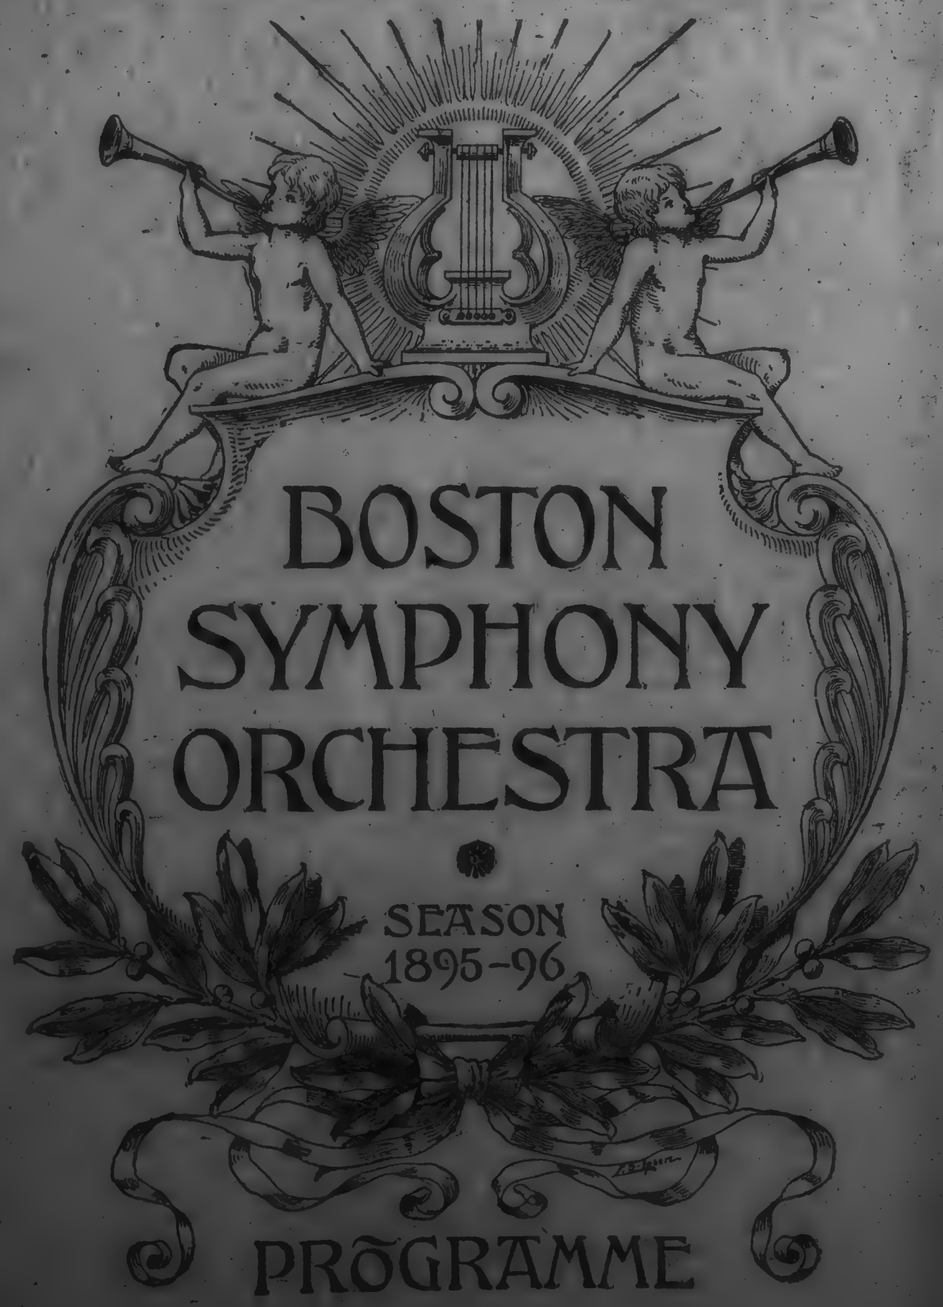
C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

5

Single tickets, at $1.25 each, on sale at Infantry Hall.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, . . . PHILADELPHIA.

Monday Evening, March 23, at 8.15 precisely.



C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

5

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Fischer's, 1221 Chestnut St.

METZEROTT MUSIC HALL, . . WASHINGTON.

Tuesday Evening, March 24, at 8.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

5

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Metzerott's Music Store

[132]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

FIFTEENTH SEASON, 1895–96.
THIRTEEN HUNDRED AND SEVENTY-NINTH PERFORMANCE.
ONE HUNDRED AND SECOND PERFORMANCE IN CAMBRIDGE.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

VIII. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, MARCH 12, AT 7.45, P. M.

Programme.

BEETHOVEN. SYMPHONY No. 6, in F major, "Pastorale," op. 68.
I. ERWACHEN HEITERER EMPFINDUNGEN BEI DER ANKUNFT AUF DEM LANDE: Allegro ma non troppo.
II. SCENE AM BACH: Andante molto moto.
III. LUSTIGES ZUSAMMENSEIN DER LANDLEUTE: Allegro.
IV. GEWITTER. STURM: Allegro.
V. HIRTENGESANG. FROHE UND DANKBARE GEFÜHLE NACH DEM STURM: Allegretto.

ARTHUR WHITING. FANTASIE, B-flat minor, op. 11.
Moderato maestoso. — Allegro appassionata — Pastorale. — Finale.

WAGNER. OVERTURE. "Rienzi."

Soloist:

Mr. ARTHUR WHITING.

The Pianoforte is a Mason and Hamlin.

Ninth Concert, Thursday, April 9, 1896.

INFANTRY HALL, ... PROVIDENCE.
Wednesday Evening, March 18, at 8 o'clock precisely.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1895–96

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

5

Single tickets, at $1.25 each, on sale at Infantry Hall.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, . . . PHILADELPHIA.
Monday Evening, March 23, at 8.15 precisely.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1895–96

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

5

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Fischer's, 1221 Chestnut St.

METZEROTT MUSIC HALL, . . WASHINGTON.
Tuesday Evening, March 24, at 8.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1895–96

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

5

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Metzerott's Music Store.

[132]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

MUSIC HALL, ... BALTIMORE.

Wednesday Evening, February 26, at 8.15 precisely.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1895-96

PROGRAMME

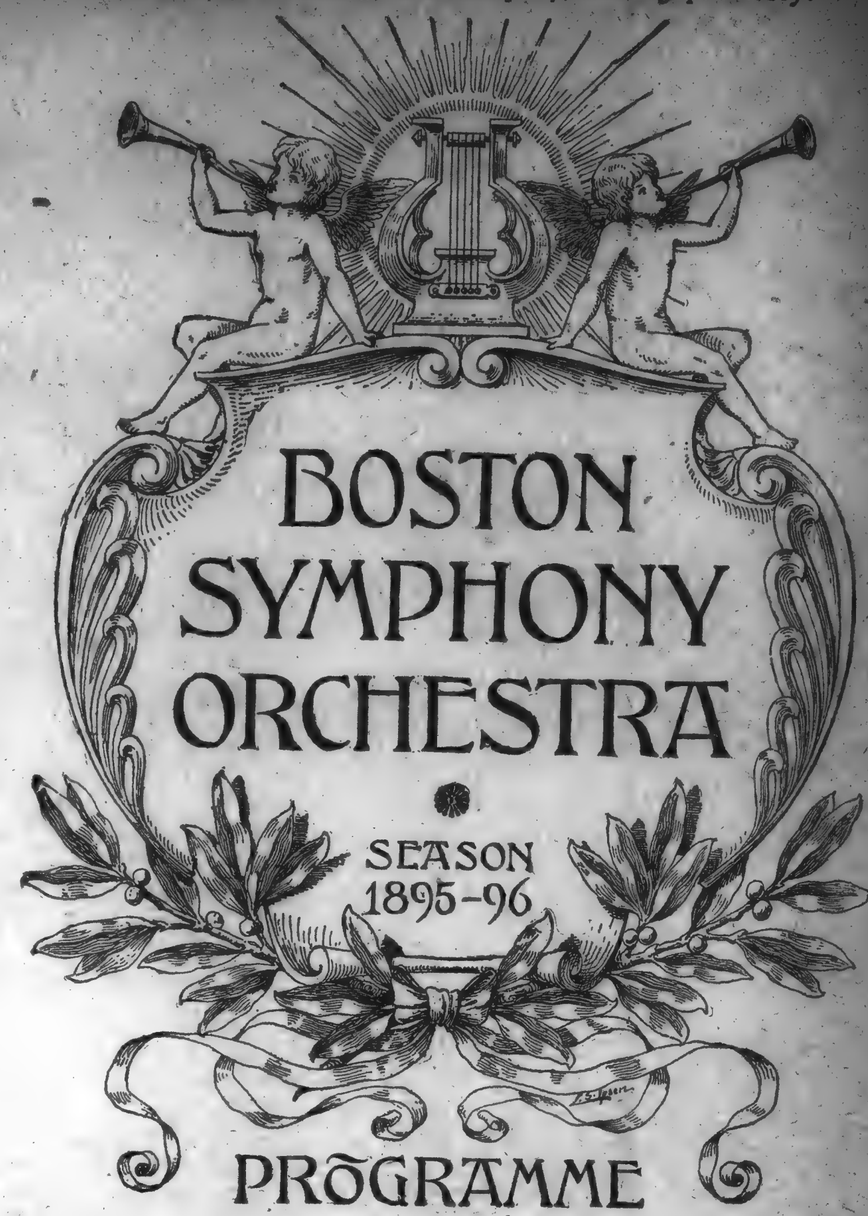
C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

4

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Albert's, 13 No. Charles St.

METROPOLITAN OPERA HOUSE, - NEW YORK.

Thursday Evening, February 27, at 8.15 precisely.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1895-96

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

4

F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

Copies of this Programme-book, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, can be obtained, free of charge, at Schuberth's Music Store, 23 Union Square.
Tickets at Schuberth's and at the Metropolitan Opera House.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, ... BROOKLYN.

Friday Evening, February 28, at 8.15 precisely.

Under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences and the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1895-96

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

4

Tickets at the Brooklyn Institute and at Chandler's Music Store, 300 Fulton Street.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, . . . PHILADELPHIA.

Saturday Afternoon, February 29, at 2.30.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1895-96

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

4

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Fischer's, 1221 Chestnut St.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Academy of Music, Fall River.

FIFTEENTH SEASON, 1895-96.
THIRTEEN HUNDRED AND SEVENTY-SIXTH PERFORMANCE.
ELEVENTH PERFORMANCE IN FALL RIVER.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

CONCERT.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 4, AT 8 P. M.

Programme.

WAGNER. OVERTURE. "Rienzi."

LACHNER. ARIA. "Vineta."

TSCHAIKOWSKY. SYMPHONY No. 6, in B minor, "Pathétique," op. 74
I. Adagio. — Allegro non troppo.
II. Allegro con grazia.
III. Allegro molto vivace.
IV. Finale: Adagio lamentoso.

SONGS WITH PIANO.

a) MACKENZIE. "Spring Song."
b) MacDOWELL. "Thy Beaming Eyes."
c) CLARA KATHLEEN ROGERS. "The Answer."

LISZT. HUNGARIAN RHAPSODY, No. 2.

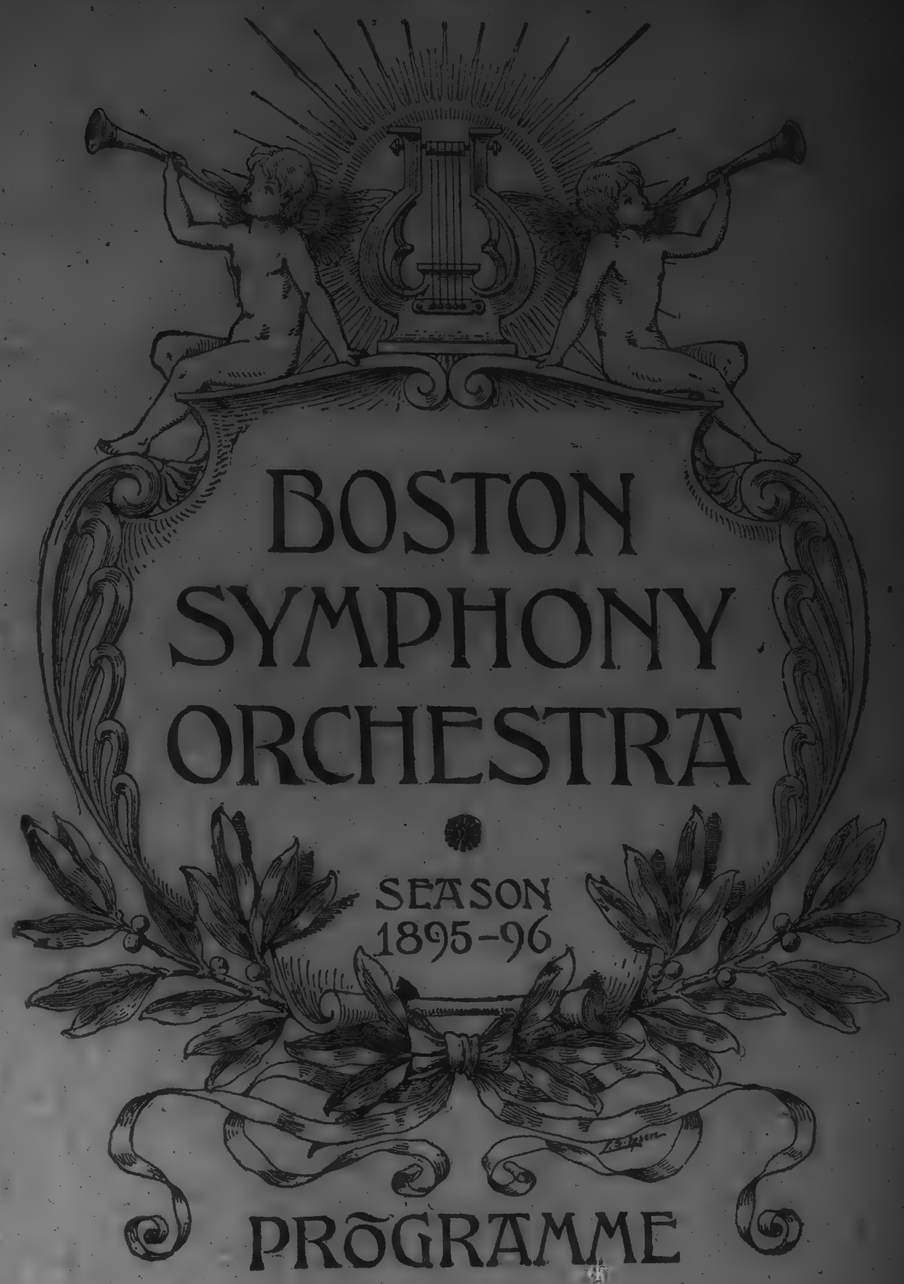
Soloist:

Miss CAROLINE GARDNER CLARKE.

The Piano is a Miller.

INFANTRY HALL, ... PROVIDENCE.

Wednesday Evening, January 8, at 8 o'clock precisely.



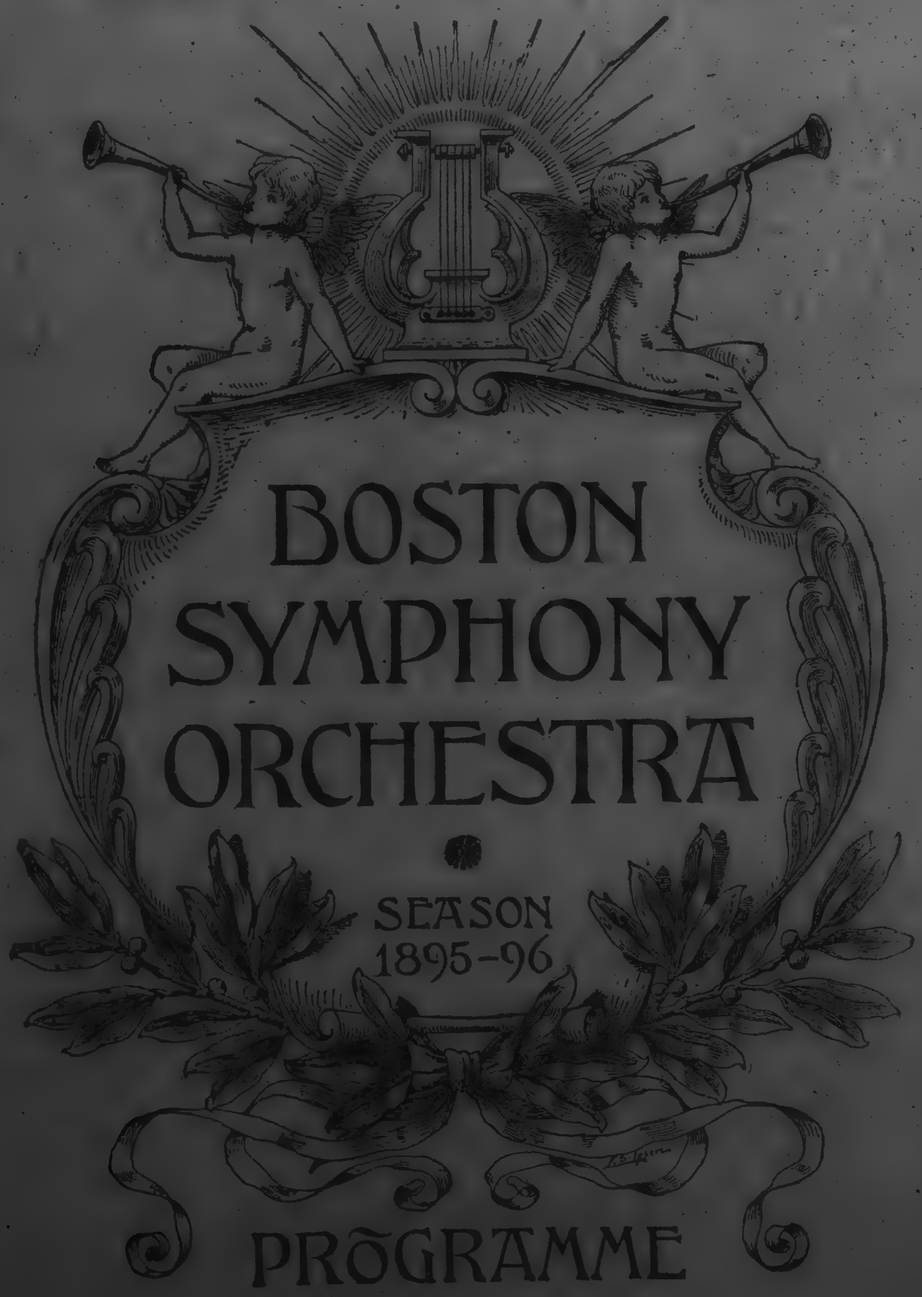
C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

3

Single tickets, at $1.25 each, on sale at Infantry Hall.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, . . . PHILADELPHIA.

Monday Evening, February 24, at 8.15 precisely.



C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

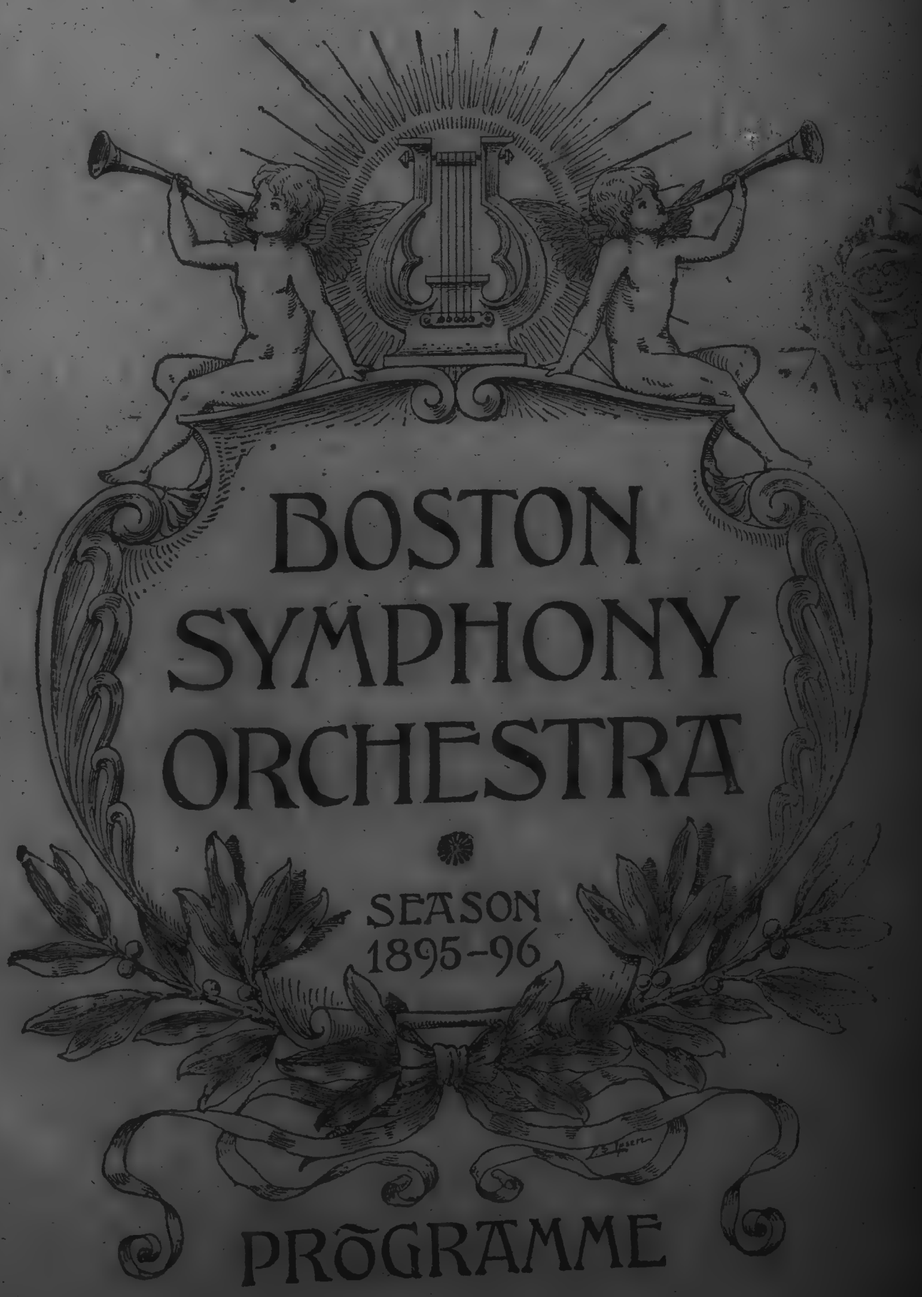
4

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Fischer's, 1221 Chestnut St.

[134]

METZEROTT MUSIC HALL, . . WASHINGTON.

Tuesday Evening, February 25, at 8.



C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

4

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Metzerott's Music Store

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Academy of Music, Fall River.

FIFTEENTH SEASON, 1895-96.
THIRTEEN HUNDRED AND SEVENTY-SIXTH PERFORMANCE.
ELEVENTH PERFORMANCE IN FALL RIVER.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

CONCERT.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 4, AT 8 P. M.

Programme.

WAGNER.	OVERTURE. "Rienzi."
LACHNER.	ARIA. "Vineta."
TSCHAIKOWSKY.	SYMPHONY No. 6, in B minor, "Pathétique," op. 74
	I. Adagio. — Allegro non troppo.
	II. Allegro con grazia.
	III. Allegro molto vivace.
	IV. Finale: Adagio lamentoso.
	SONGS WITH PIANO.
a) MACKENZIE.		"Spring Song."
b) MACDOWELL.		"Thy Beaming Eyes."
c) CLARA KATHLEEN ROGERS.		"The Answer."
LISZT.	HUNGARIAN RHAPSODY, No. 2.

Soloist:

Miss CAROLINE GARDNER CLARKE.

The Piano is a Miller.

INFANTRY HALL, ... PROVIDENCE.

Wednesday Evening, January 8, at 8 o'clock precisely.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

3

Single tickets, at $1.25 each, on sale at Infantry Hall.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, . . . PHILADELPHIA.

Monday Evening, February 24, at 8.15 precisely.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

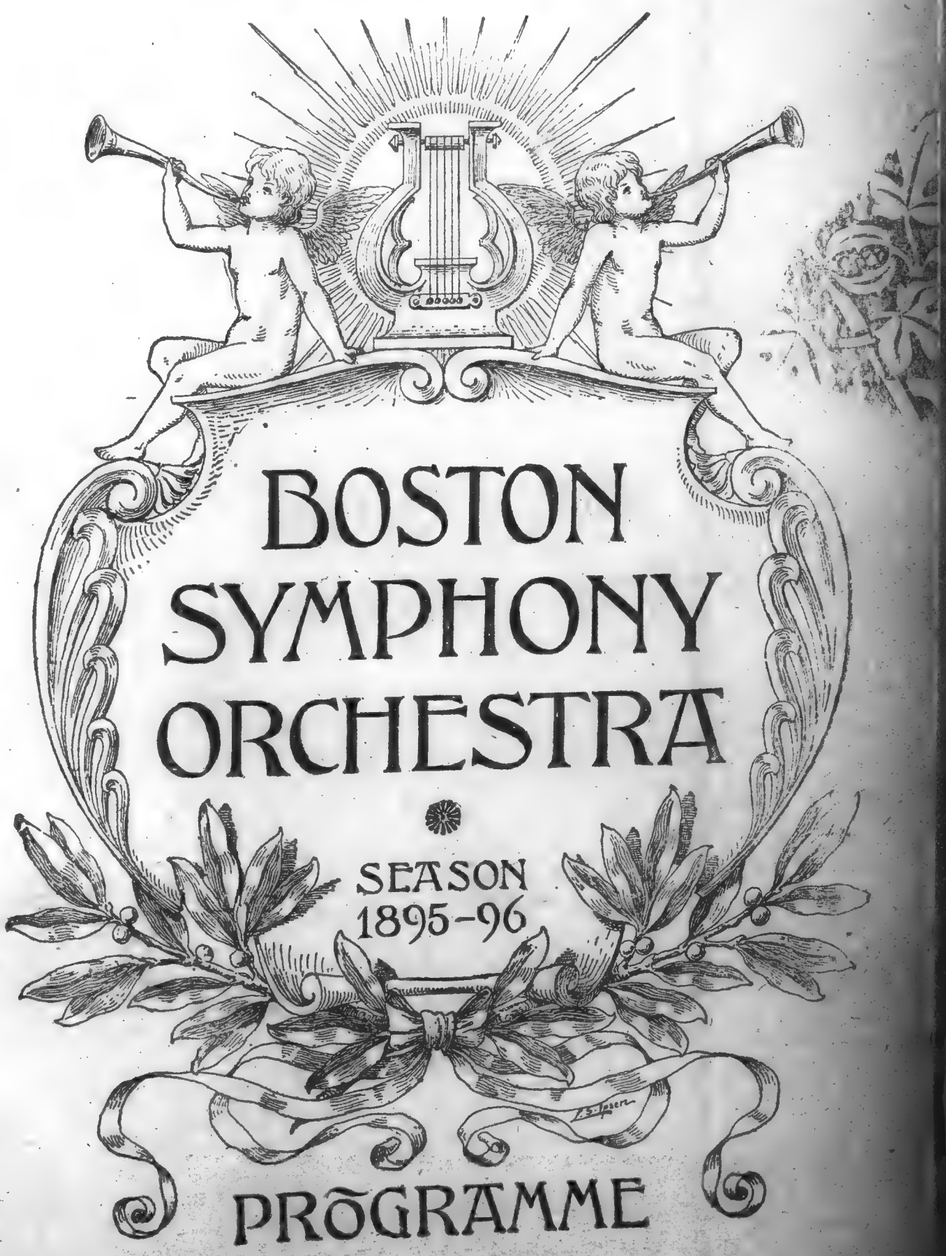
4

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Fischer's, 1221 Chestnut St.

[134]

METZEROTT MUSIC HALL, . . WASHINGTON.

Tuesday Evening, February 25, at 8.



C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

4

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Metzerott's Music Store.

Mr. Adamowski's Concert.

(Direction of C. A. ELLIS.)

Boston Theatre,
Sunday Evening, February 9, at 8.

The New York Symphony Orchestra

Mr. WALTER DAMROSCH, }
Mr. OTTO LOHSE, } Conductors.

(Only appearance in concert in Boston.)

Frau Klafsky

(Her only appearance in concert)

... AND ...

Mr. Adamowski

POPULAR PRICES.

Tickets, $1.50, $1.00, 75 cents, and 50 cents, at Boston Theatre and at Music Hall.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

FIFTEENTH SEASON, 1895-96.
THIRTEEN HUNDRED AND SIXTY-FIRST PERFORMANCE.
ONE HUNDREDTH PERFORMANCE IN CAMBRIDGE.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

VI. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 6, AT 7.45, P. M.

In Memory of MARTIN BRIMMER.

Programme.

BEETHOVEN. SYMPHONY No. 3, in E flat major, "Eroica." op. 55.
I. Allegro con brio.
II. Marcia funebre: Adagio assai.
III. Scherzo: Allegro vivace. — Trio.
IV. Finale: Allegro molto.

MOZART. TRAUERMUSIK.

BEETHOVEN. OVERTURE. "Egmont."

The Orchestral Selections for the Seventh Concert, Thursday, February 20, 1896, will be Goldmark's Symphony, "Rustic Wedding" and Lalo, Suite, "Namouna."

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

FIFTEENTH SEASON, 1895-96.
THIRTEEN HUNDRED AND SIXTY-SEVENTH PERFORMANCE.
ONE HUNDRED AND FIRST PERFORMANCE IN CAMBRIDGE.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

VII. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 20, AT 7.45, P. M.

Programme.

GOLDMARK. SYMPHONY No. 1, in E flat major. "Ländliche Hochzeit," op. 26.
I. Hochzeits-Marsch: Moderato molto.
II. Brautlied: Allegretto.
III. Im Garten: Andante.
IV. Tanz: Allegro molto.

MOSZKOWSKI. CONCERTO for VIOLIN, in C major, op. 30.
I. Allegro commodo.
II. Andante.
III. Vivace.

GODARD. ORCHESTRAL SUITE from "Jocelyn," No. 1.
I. Prélude: Adagio.
II. Entr'acte, "Dans les Montagnes;" Moderato quasi Allegretto.
III. Entr'acte Gavotte: Andante.
IV. Carillon: Moderato.

Soloist:

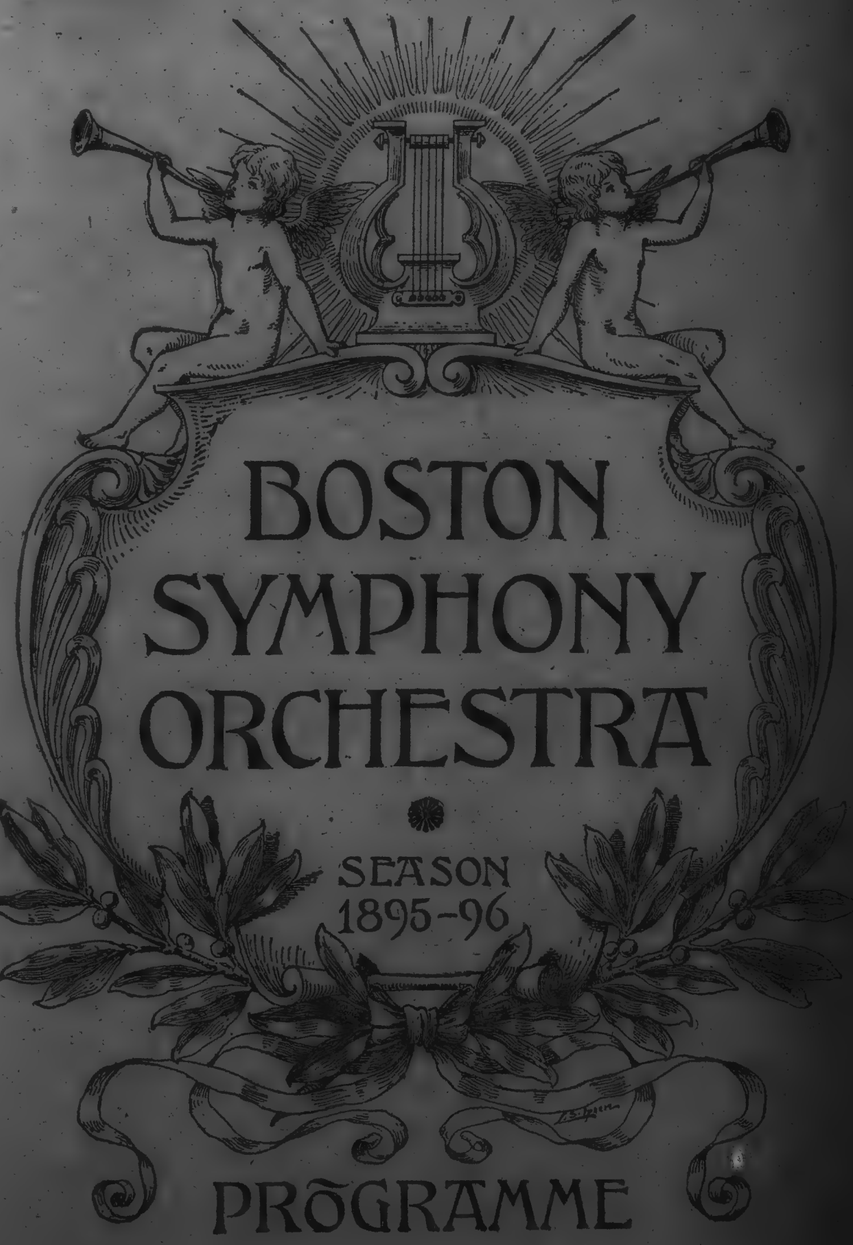
Mr. EMILE SAURET.

Eighth Concert, Thursday, March 12, 1896.

The Orchestral Selection for the next Concert will be the Beethoven Symphony No. 6, (Pastorale), and Wagner Overture, "Rienzi." Mr. Arthur Whiting will be the Soloist.

INFANTRY HALL, ... PROVIDENCE.

Wednesday Evening, February 12, at 8 o'clock precisely.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1895-96

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

4

Single tickets, at $1.25 each [illegible] sale at Infantry Hall.

[135]

Mr. Adamowski's Concert.

(Direction of C. A. ELLIS.)

Boston Theatre,
Sunday Evening, February 9, at 8.

The New York Symphony Orchestra

Mr. WALTER DAMROSCH, }
Mr. OTTO LOHSE, } Conductors.

(Only appearance in concert [illegible])

Frau Klafsky

(Only appearance in concert [illegible])

... AND ...

Mr. Adamowski

POPULAR PRICES.

Tickets, $1.50, $1.00, 75 cents, and 50 cents, at Boston Theatre and at Music Hall.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

FIFTEENTH SEASON, 1895–96.
THIRTEEN HUNDRED AND SIXTY-SEVENTH PERFORMANCE.
ONE HUNDRED AND FIRST PERFORMANCE IN CAMBRIDGE.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

VII. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 20, AT 7.45, P. M.

Programme.

GOLDMARK. SYMPHONY No. 1, in E flat major. "Ländliche Hochzeit," op. 26.
I. Hochzeits-Marsch: Moderato molto.
II. Brautlied: Allegretto.
III. Im Garten: Andante.
IV. Tanz: Allegro molto.

MOSZKOWSKI. CONCERTO for VIOLIN, in C major, op. 30.
I. Allegro commodo.
II. Andante.
III. Vivace.

GODARD. ORCHESTRAL SUITE from "Jocelyn," No. 1.
I. Prélude: Adagio.
II. Entr'acte, "Dans les Montagnes:" Moderato quasi Allegretto.
III. Entr'acte Gavotte: Andante.
IV. Carillon: Moderato.

Soloist:

Mr. EMILE SAURET.

Eighth Concert, Thursday, March 12, 1896.

The Orchestral Selection for the next Concert will be the Beethoven Symphony No. 6, (Pastorale), and Wagner Overture, "Rienzi." Mr. Arthur Whiting will be the Soloist.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

FIFTEENTH SEASON, 1895–96.
THIRTEEN HUNDRED AND SIXTY-FIRST PERFORMANCE.
ONE HUNDREDTH PERFORMANCE IN CAMBRIDGE.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

VI. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 6, AT 7.45, P. M.

In Memory of MARTIN BRIMMER.

Programme.

BEETHOVEN. SYMPHONY No. 3, in E flat major, "Eroica." op. 55.
I. Allegro con brio.
II. Marcia funebre: Adagio assai.
III. Scherzo: Allegro vivace. — Trio.
IV. Finale: Allegro molto.

MOZART TRAUERMUSIK.

BEETHOVEN. OVERTURE. "Egmont."

The Orchestral Selections for the Seventh Concert, Thursday, February 20, 1896, will be Goldmark's Symphony, "Rustic Wedding" and Lalo, Suite, "Namouna."

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

INFANTRY HALL, ... PROVIDENCE.

Wednesday Evening, February 12, at 8 o'clock precisely.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

4

Single tickets, at $1.25 each, on sale at Infantry Hall.

[135]

.. Programme ..

OVERTURE, "Die Meistersinger" . . . . Wagner
ORCHESTRA.

FANTASIE FOR VIOLIN (on Scotch melodies) . Bruch
Mr. ADAMOWSKI.

ARIA from "Oberon" ("Ocean, thou mighty monster") Weber
Frau KLAFSKY.

SUITE, "Casse Noisette" (Nut Crackers) . Tschaikowsky
I. Ouverture miniature.
II. Danses caractéristiques.
III. Valse des fleurs.
ORCHESTRA.

AIRS RUSSE FOR VIOLIN . . . . Wieniawski
Mr. ADAMOWSKI.

SONGS WITH PIANO, { a. "The Young Nun" / b. "Marguerite at the Spinning Wheel" } . Schubert
Frau KLAFSKY.

a. Minuet of Will-o'-the-Wisps, } from "The Damnation of Faust" Berlioz
b. Waltz of Sylphs, }
ORCHESTRA.

RONDO CAPRICCIOSO FOR VIOLIN . . . Saint-Saëns
Mr. ADAMOWSKI.

OVERTURE, "Sakuntala" . . . . . Goldmark
ORCHESTRA.

THE PIANO USED IS A STEINWAY.

"All the gifts and acquirements of a perfect violinist belong to Mr. damowski."— St. James Gazette.

"Very great taste and irreproachable technique."— London Times.

"He has great qualities of phrasing, a very fine tone, and that pose in style which qualifies him for a master of his art."— London porting and Dramatic News.

"He played with largeness of style, refinement of sentiment, and rm sincerity."— Boston Herald.

"Mr. Adamowski gave a delightful performance of the Scotch ntasia."— Boston Journal.

"Mr. Adamowski showed something so very like genius throughout s performance that we, for one, are quite willing to accept it for genius; d we are perfectly aware of what a very big word 'genius' is."— Boston ranscript.

"Most artistic and enjoyable violin playing; I have not heard tter, if indeed as good, this season."— N.Y. World.

Sander

FIFTEENT
THIRTEEN H
ONE HUNDR

BOSTON S

Mr.

THURSDAY,

In Memor

BEETHOVEN.
I.
II.
III.
IV.

MOZART.

BEETHOVEN.

The Orchestral Selections fo be Goldmark's Symphony, "Rus

San

heatre, Cambridge.

FIFTEENTH
THIRTEEN HU
ONE HUNDRED 95–96.
XTY-SEVENTH PERFORMANCE.
RFORMANCE IN CAMBRIDGE.

BOSTON SYM Y ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL P
Conductor.

VII. CON
THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 2
T 7.45, P. M.

Programme.

GOLDMARK. SYMPHONY No. 1, E fla
Hochzeit," op. 26.
I. Hochzeits-Marsch: Moderato
II. Brautlied: Allegretto.
III. Im Garten: Andante.
IV. Tanz: Allegro molto.

'Ländliche

MOSZKOWSKI. CONCERTO for VIOLIN, in C m
I. Allegro commodo.
II. Andante.
III. Vivace.
op. 30.

GODARD. ORCHESTRAL SUITE from "Joce
I. Prélude: Adagio.
II. Entr'acte, "Dans les Montagnes;" Mod
Allegretto.
III. Entr'acte Gavotte: Andante.
IV. Carillon: Moderato.
No. 1.
asi

Soloist:

Mr. EMILE SAURET.

Eighth Concert, Thursday, March 12, 1896.

The Orchestral Selection for the next Concert will be the Beethoven Sympho
6, (Pastorale), and Wagner Overture, "Rienzi." Mr. Arthur Whiting will be the INFANTRY HALL,

Wednesday Evenin

B SY ORC

PR

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

METROPOLITAN OPERA HOUSE, - NEW YORK.

Thursday Evening, January 23, at 8.15 precisely.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1895-96

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager. 3 F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

Copies of this Programme-book, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, can be obtained, free of charge, at Schuberth's Music Store, 23 Union Square.

Tickets at Schuberth's and at the Metropolitan Opera House.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, BROOKLYN.

Friday Evening, January 24, at 8.15 precisely.

Under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences and the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1895-96

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

3

Tickets at the Brooklyn Institute and at Chandler's Music Store, 300 Fulton Street.

CITY HALL, SPRINGFIELD.

Tuesday Evening, January 28, 1896, at 8.

ONLY CONCERT THIS SEASON BY THE

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1895-96

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

Tickets on sale at M. Steinert & Sons Company's, 422 Main St.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, PHILADELPHIA.

Saturday Afternoon, January 25, at 2.30.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1895-96

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

3

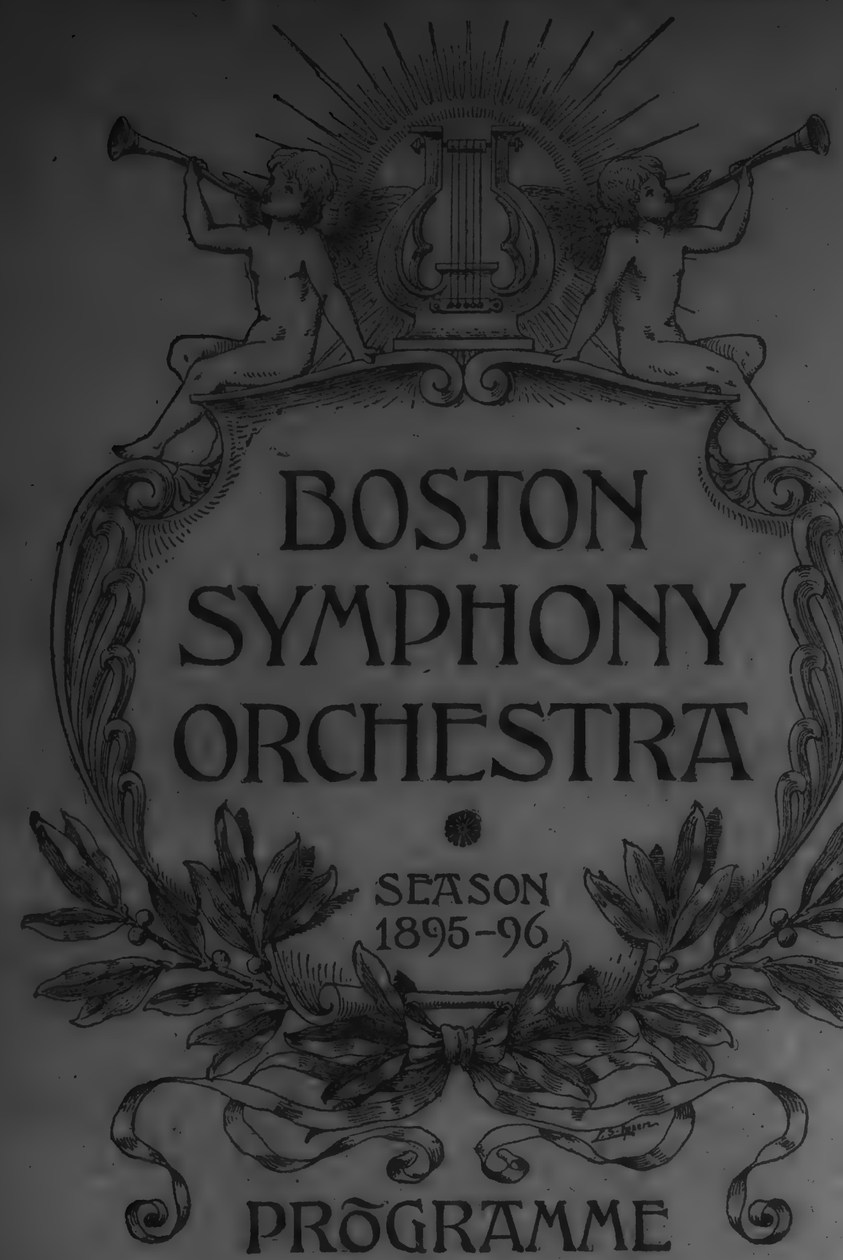
Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Fischer's, 1221 Chestnut St.

[136]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, . . . PHILADELPHIA.

Monday Evening, January 20, at 8.15 precisely.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1895-96

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

3

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Fischer's, 1221 Chestnut St.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

FIFTEENTH SEASON, 1895-96.
THIRTEEN HUNDRED AND FORTY-NINTH PERFORMANCE.
NINETY-NINTH PERFORMANCE IN CAMBRIDGE.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

V. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 16, AT 7.45, P. M.

Programme.

TSCHAIKOWSKY. SYMPHONY No. 6, in B minor, "Pathetique," op. 74

I. Adagio. — Allegro non troppo.
II. Allegro con grazia.
III. Allegro molto vivace.
IV. Finale: Adagio lamentoso.
(First time at these Concerts.)

LISZT. CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE and ORCHESTRA, No. 2 in A major.

I. Adagio sostenuto assai.
II. L'istesso tempo.
III. Allegro agitato assai.
IV. Allegro moderato.
V. Allegro deciso.
VI. Marziale.
VII. Stretto.

REZNICEK. OVERTURE. "Donna Diana."
(First time at these Concerts.)

Soloist:

Mr. RAFAEL JOSEFFY.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

The Orchestral Selections for the Sixth Concert, Thursday, February 6, 1896, will be Schubert, "Unfinished Symphony"; Lalo, Suite, "Namouna"; and Rubinstein, Overture, "Dimitri Donskoi." Mrs. Kileski Bradbury will be the Soloist.

MUSIC HALL, ... BALTIMORE.

Wednesday Evening, January 22, at 8.15 precisely.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1895-96

PROGRAMME

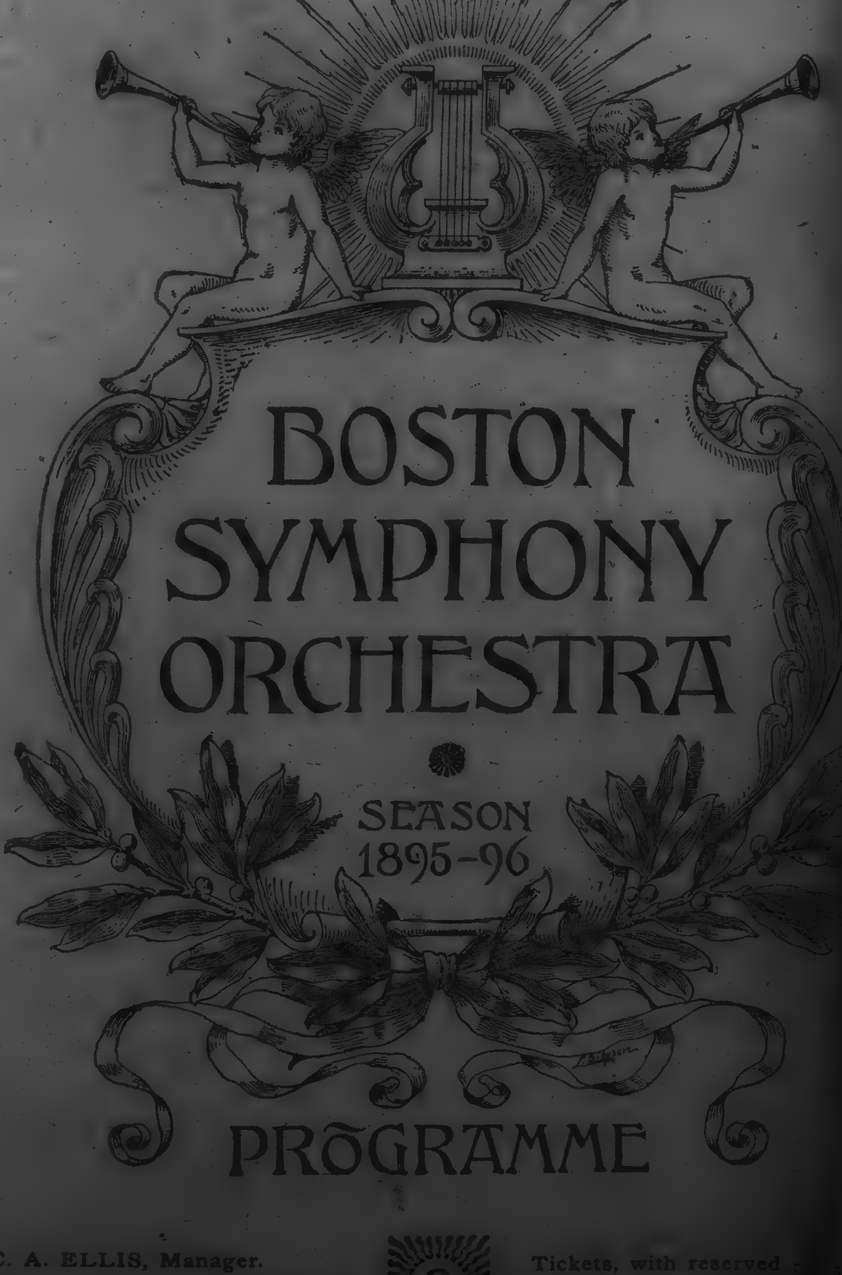
C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

3

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Albert's, 13 No. Charles St.

METZEROTT MUSIC HALL, . . WASHINGTON.

Tuesday Evening, January 21, at 8.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1895-96

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

3

Tickets, with reserved [illegible] sale at Metzerott's Mus[illegible]

[137]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, . . . PHILADELPHIA.

Monday Evening, January 20, at 8.15 precisely.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

3

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Fischer's, 1221 Chestnut St.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

FIFTEENTH SEASON, 1895–96
THIRTEEN HUNDRED AND FORTY-NINTH PERFORMANCE.
NINETY-NINTH PERFORMANCE IN CAMBRIDGE.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

V. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 16, AT 7.45, P. M.

Programme.

TSCHAIKOWSKY. SYMPHONY No. 6, in B minor, "Pathetique," op. 74
I. Adagio. — Allegro non troppo.
II. Allegro con grazia.
III. Allegro molto vivace.
IV. Finale: Adagio lamentoso.
(First time at these Concerts.)

LISZT. CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE and ORCHESTRA, No. 2 in A major.
I. Adagio sostenuto assai.
II. L'istesso tempo.
III. Allegro agitato assai.
IV. Allegro moderato.
V. Allegro deciso.
VI. Marziale.
VII. Stretto

REZNICEK. OVERTURE. "Donna Diana."
(First time at these Concerts.)

Soloist:

Mr. RAFAEL JOSEFFY.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

The Orchestral Selections for the Sixth Concert, Thursday, February 6, 1896, will be Schubert, "Unfinished Symphony"; Lalo, Suite, "Namouna"; and Rubinstein, Overture, "Dimitri Donskoi." Mrs. Kileski Bradbury will be the Soloist.

MUSIC HALL, ... BALTIMORE.

Wednesday Evening, January 22, at 8.15 precisely.

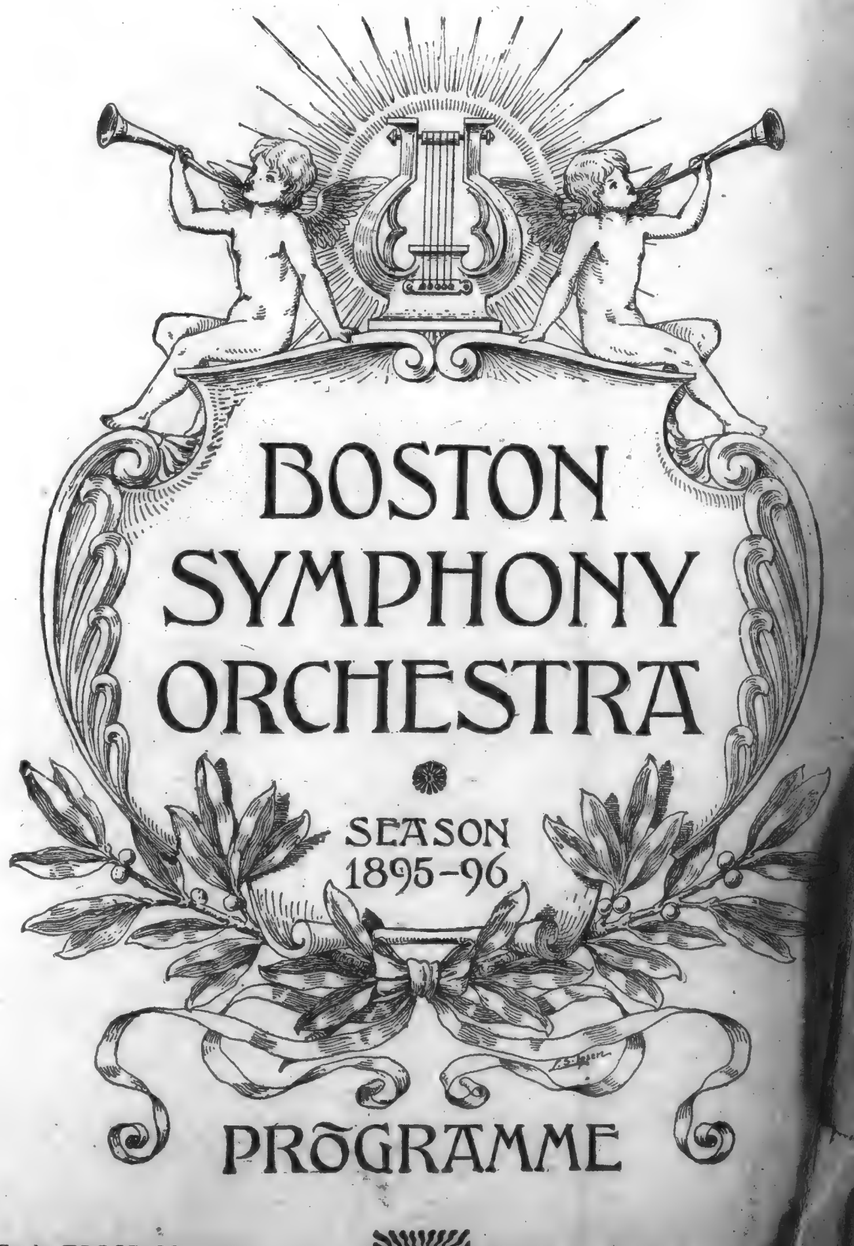
C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

3

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Albert's, 13 No. Charles St.

METZEROTT MUSIC HALL, . . WASHINGTON.

Tuesday Evening, January 21, at 8.



C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

3

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Metzerott's Music Store.

[137]

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

FIFTEENTH SEASON, 1895-96.
THIRTEEN HUNDRED AND FORTY-SECOND PERFORMANCE.
NINETY-EIGHTH PERFORMANCE IN CAMBRIDGE.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

IV. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 2, AT 7.45, P. M.

Programme.

BEETHOVEN. SYMPHONY No. 1, in C major, op. 21.
I. Adagio molto. — Allegro con brio.
II. Andante cantabile con moto.
III. Menuetto: Allegro molto e vivace. — Trio.
IV. Finale: Adagio. — Allegro molto e vivace.

DVOŘÁK. OVERTURE. "Nature."

VIOTTI. CONCERTO FOR VIOLIN.
I. Moderato.
II. Adagio.
III. Agitato assai.
(Cadenza by MR. KNEISEL.)

LISZT. RHAPSODY No. 2.

Soloist:

Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL.

The Orchestral Selections for the Fifth Concert, Thursday, January 16, 1896, will be Tschaikowsky, Symphony No. 6; Reznicek, Overture, "Donna Diana." Mr. Rafael Joseffy will play the Liszt Concerto for Piano No. 2.

INFANTRY HALL, ... PROVIDENCE.

Wednesday Evening, January 8, at 8 o'clock precisely.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1895-96

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

3

Single tickets, at $1.25 each, on sale at Infantry Hall.

[138]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

BOSTON THEATRE

SUNDAY EVENING, JANUARY 5, 1896.

GRAND CONCERT

BY THE

Boston Symphony Orchestra,

Its 1345th Performance, and 724th Performance in Boston.

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

Miss Gertrude Franklin,

and Mr. Paderewski,

In aid of the family of Mr. A. Goldstein, a former member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

PROGRAMME.

Beethoven . . Overture to "Leonore," No. 3, in C major, Op. 72

Gounod . . . . . Ave Maria
(Violin obligato by Mr. T. ADAMOWSKI.)
Miss FRANKLIN.

Paderewski . . . . . Fantasie Polonaise, op. 19
On original themes.
Allegro moderato.—Vivace non troppo, ma poi molto. accelerando.—Andante molto sostenuto.—
Allegro giocoso.
Mr. PADEREWSKI.

Lalo . . . . . Suite, "Namouna"

I.	Prelude: Andante (G major)	4-4
II.	Serenade: Allegro (D minor)	3-16
III.	Theme with Variations: Andante (E major)	3-4
IV.	a. Market-Day Shows: Allegro vivace (G minor)	3-8
	b. Market-Day Festival: Presto (E-flat major)	3-8

Gounod . . . . . "Repentir"
Miss FRANKLIN.

Franz Liszt . . . . . Hungarian Rhapsody No. 2
(Scored by KARL MÜLLER-BERGHAUS.)

Rossini . . . . . Overture, "William Tell"
Accompanist, Mr. MAX ZACH.

THE PIANO IS A STEINWAY.

Owing to a change in arrangements, Mr. Campanari, who was announced as soloist for this evening, is obliged to sing at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York, and Miss Gertrude Franklin has kindly consented to appear.

CITY HALL, - - - SPRINGFIELD.

Boston Symphony Orchestra,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

Fifteenth Season, 1895-96.

1358th Performance. 7th Performance in Springfield.

Tuesday Evening, January 28, At Eight.

PROGRAMME.

Ludwig van Beethoven Overture to "Leonore," No. 3, in C major, Op. 72

Hermann Goetz - - Scena: "My strength is spent," from "The Taming of the Shrew"

Franz Schubert - - - - Unfinished Symphony in B minor

I.	Allegro moderato (B minor)	3-4
II.	Andante con moto (E major)	3-8

Robert Volkmann Serenade for String Orchestra, No 3, in D minor, Op. 69
Larghetto non troppo (D minor) - - - - 4-4
Solo Violoncello, Mr. ALWIN SCHROEDER.

Gounod - - - - - - - - - - "Repentir"

Hector Berlioz - - - - - a. Minuet of Will-o'-the-Wisps
b. Waltz of Sylphs
From "The Damnation of Faust," Op. 24.

Richard Wagner - - - - - - Overture, "Rienzi"

Soloist, Miss GERTRUDE FRANKLIN.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

FIFTEENTH SEASON, 1895-96.
THIRTEEN HUNDRED AND FORTY-SECOND PERFORMANCE.
NINETY-EIGHTH PERFORMANCE IN CAMBRIDGE.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

IV. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 2, AT 7.45, P. M.

Programme.

BEETHOVEN. SYMPHONY No. 1, in C major, op. 21.
I. Adagio molto. — Allegro con brio.
II. Andante cantabile con moto.
III. Menuetto: Allegro molto e vivace. — Trio.
IV. Finale: Adagio. — Allegro molto e vivace.

DVOŘÁK. OVERTURE. "Nature."

VIOTTI. CONCERTO FOR VIOLIN.
I. Moderato.
II. Adagio.
III. Agitato assai.
(Cadenza by MR. KNEISEL.)

LISZT. RHAPSODY No. 2.

Soloist:

Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL.

The Orchestral Selections for the Fifth Concert, Thursday, January 16, 1896, will be Tschaikowsky, Symphony No. 6; Reznicek, Overture, "Donna Diana." Mr. Rafael Joseffy will play the Liszt Concerto for Piano No. 2.

INFANTRY HALL, ... PROVIDENCE.

Wednesday Evening, January 8, at 8 o'clock precisely.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1895-96

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

3

Single tickets, at $1.25 each, on sale at Infantry Hall.

[138]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

BOSTON THEATRE

SUNDAY EVENING, JANUARY 5, 1896.

GRAND CONCERT

BY THE

Boston Symphony Orchestra,

Its 1345th Performance, and 724th Performance in Boston.

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

Miss Gertrude Franklin,

and Mr. Paderewski,

In aid of the family of Mr. A. Goldstein, a former member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

PROGRAMME.

Beethoven . . Overture to "Leonore," No. 3, in C major, Op. 72

Gounod . . . . . Ave Maria
(Violin obligato by Mr. T. ADAMOWSKI.)
Miss FRANKLIN.

Paderewski . . . . . Fantasie Polonaise, op. 19
On original themes.
Allegro moderato.— Vivace non troppo. ma poi molto. accelerando.— Andante molto sostenuto.— Allegro giocoso.
Mr. PADEREWSKI.

Lalo . . . . . Suite, "Namouna"
I. Prelude: Andante (G major) - - - - 4 4
II. Serenade: Allegro (D minor) - - - - 3-16
III. Theme with Variations: Andante (E major) - 3-4
IV. a. Market-Day Shows: Allegro vivace (G minor) 3-8
b. Market-Day Festival: Presto (E-flat major) - 3-8

Gounod . . . . . "Repentir"
MISS FRANKLIN.

Franz Liszt . . . . . Hungarian Rhapsody No. 2
(Scored by KARL MÜLLER-BERGHAUS.)

Rossini . . . . . Overture, "William Tell"
Accompanist, Mr. MAX ZACH.

THE PIANO IS A STEINWAY.

Owing to a change in arrangements, Mr. Campanari, who was announced as soloist for this evening, is obliged to sing at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York, and Miss Gertrude Franklin has kindly consented to appear.

CITY HALL, = = = SPRINGFIELD.

Boston Symphony Orchestra,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

Fifteenth Season, 1895-96.

1358th Performance. 7th Performance in Springfield.

Tuesday Evening, January 28, At Eight.

PROGRAMME.

Ludwig van Beethoven — Overture to "Leonore," No. 3, in C major, Op. 72

Hermann Goetz — — Scena: "My strength is spent," from "The Taming of the Shrew"

Franz Schubert — — — — Unfinished Symphony in B minor
I. Allegro moderato (B minor) - - - - 3-4
II. Andante con moto (E major) - - - - 3-8

Robert Volkmann — Serenade for String Orchestra, No 3, in D minor, Op. 69
Larghetto non troppo (D minor) - - - - 4-4
Solo Violoncello, Mr. ALWIN SCHROEDER.

Gounod — — — — — — — — — — "Repentir"

Hector Berlioz — — — — — a. Minuet of Will-o'-the-Wisps
b. Waltz of Sylphs
From "The Damnation of Faust," Op. 24.

Richard Wagner — — — — — — Overture, "Rienzi"

Soloist, Miss GERTRUDE FRANKLIN.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

MUSIC HALL, ... BALTIMORE.

Wednesday Evening, December 18, at 8.15 precisely.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1895-96

PROGRAMME

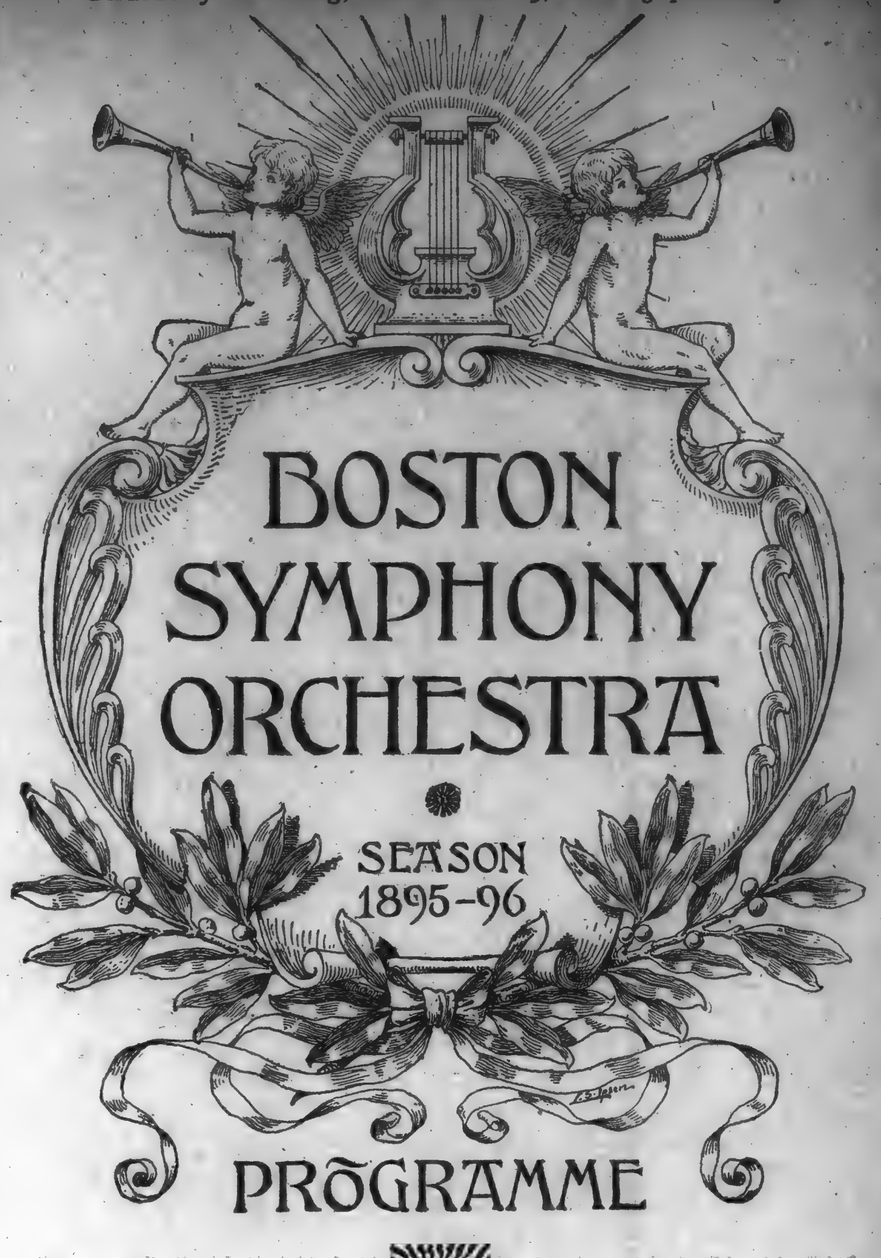
C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

2

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Albert's, 13 No. Charles St.

METROPOLITAN OPERA HOUSE, - NEW YORK.

Thursday Evening, December 19, at 8.15 precisely.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1895-96

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

2

F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

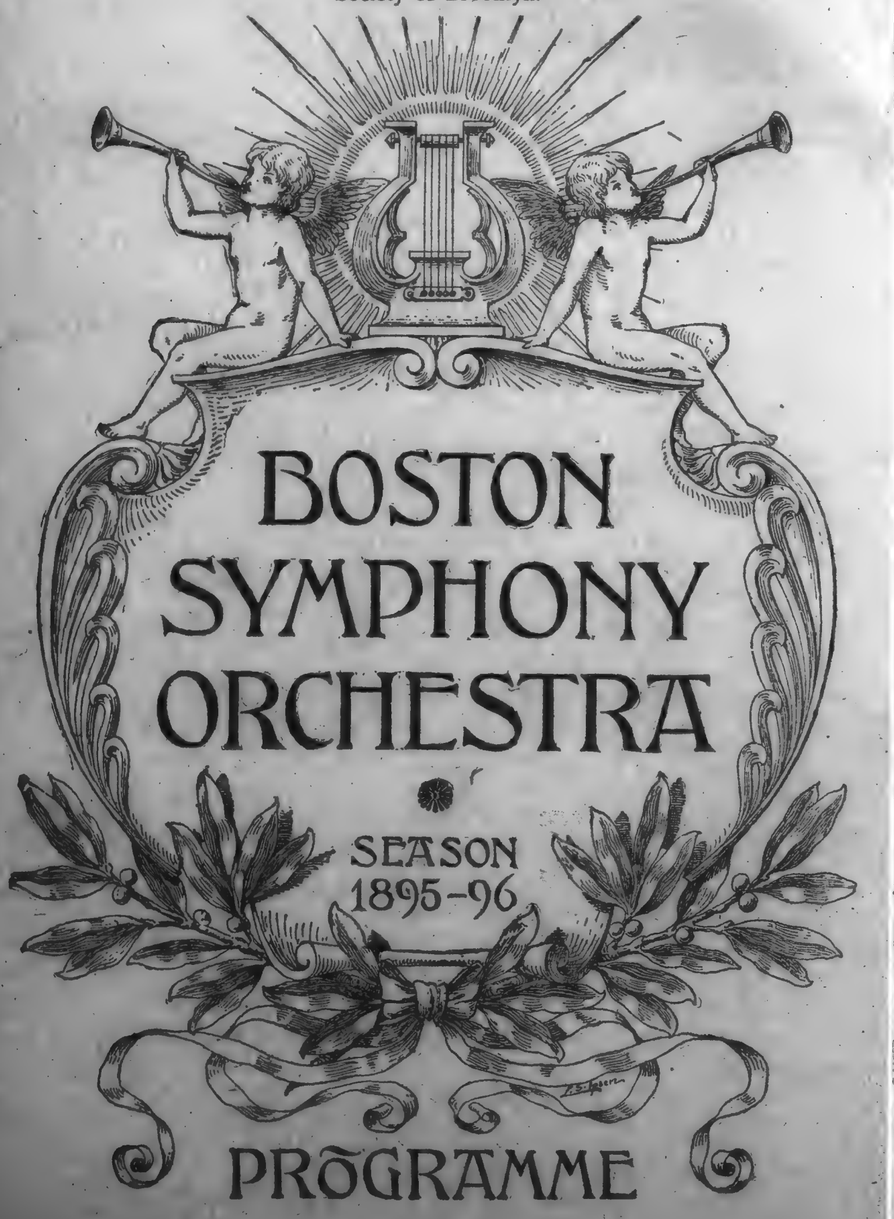
Copies of this Programme-book, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, can be obtained, free of charge, at Schuberth's Music Store, 23 Union Square.

Tickets at Schuberth's and at the Metropolitan Opera House.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, ... BROOKLYN.

Friday Evening, December 20, at 8.15 precisely.

Under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences and the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1895-96

PROGRAMME

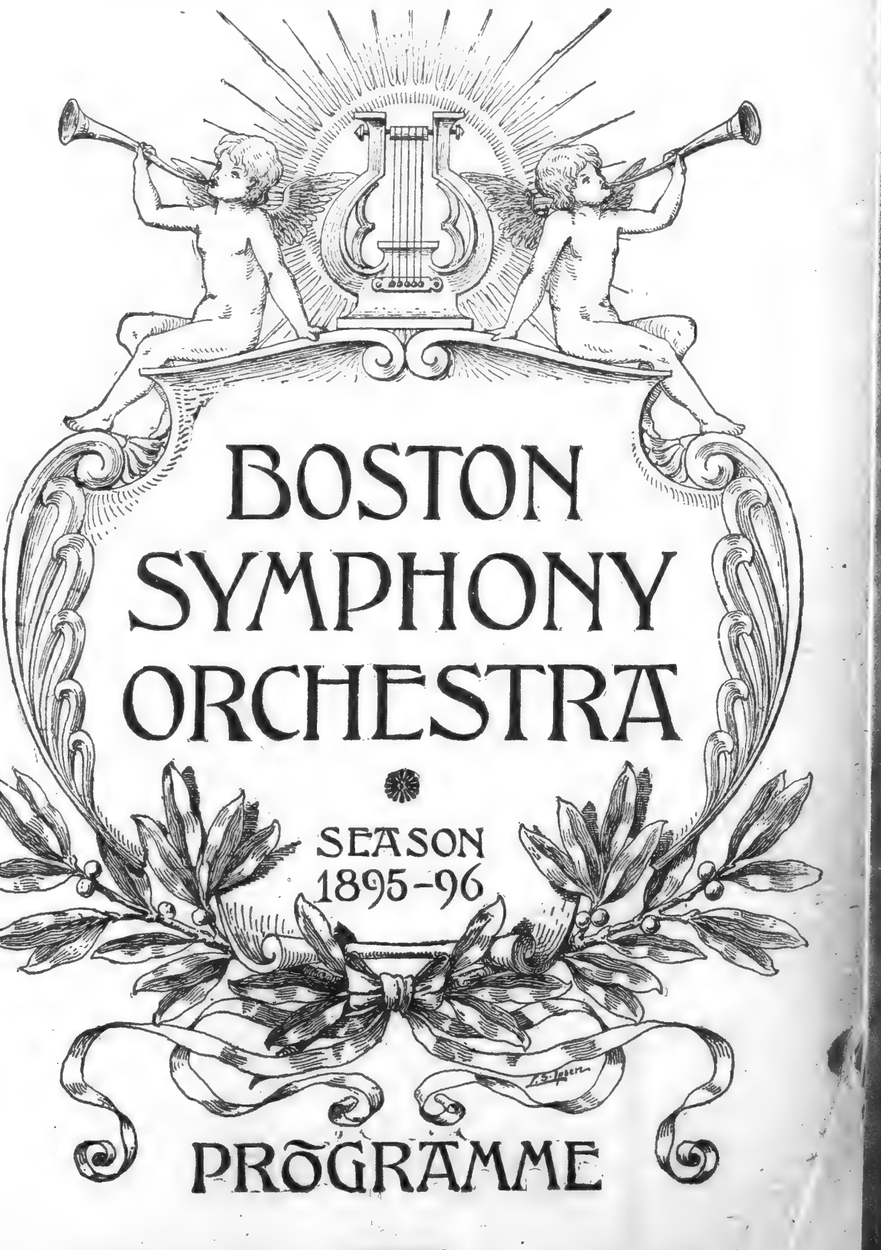
C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

2

Tickets at the Brooklyn Institute and at Chandler's Music Store, 300 Fulton Street.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, . . . PHILADELPHIA.

Saturday Afternoon, December 21, at 2.30.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1895-96

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

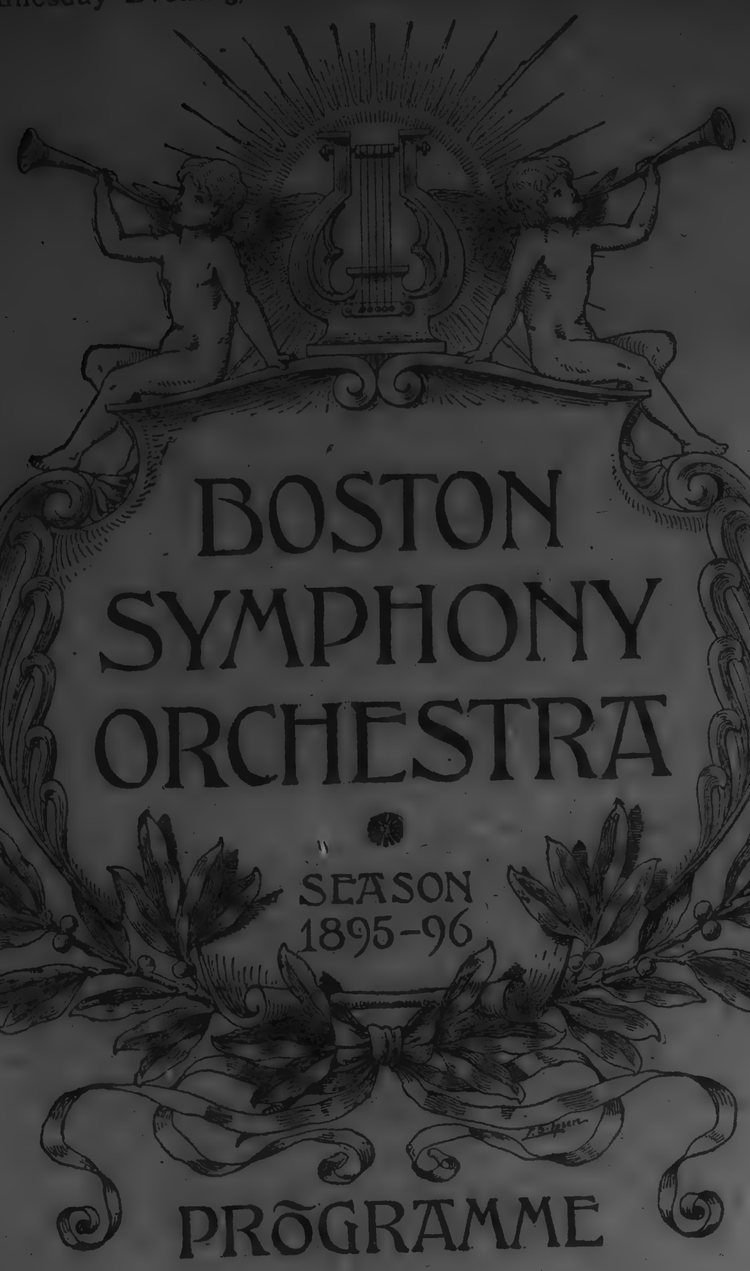
2

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Fischer's, 1221 Chestnut St.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

INFANTRY HALL, PROVIDENCE.

Wednesday Evening, November 27, at 8 o'clock precisely.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1895-96

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

2

Single tickets, at $1.25 each, on sale at Infantry Hall.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

FIFTEENTH SEASON, 1895-96.
THIRTEEN HUNDRED AND THIRTY-FIRST PERFORMANCE.
NINETY-SEVENTH PERFORMANCE IN CAMBRIDGE.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

III. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 12, AT 7.45, P. M.

Programme.

SCHUMANN. SYMPHONY No. 1, in B-flat major, op. 38.
I. Andante un poco maestoso. — Allegro molto vivace.
II. Larghetto.
III. Scherzo: Molto vivace. — Trio I: Molto più vivace. — Trio II: Tempo primo.
IV. Allegro animato e grazioso.

BEETHOVEN. CONCERTO No. 1, in C major, op. 15.
I. Allegro con brio.
II. Largo.
III. Rondo. (Allegro scherzando.)
Cadenzas by L. VAN BEETHOVEN.

a) HANDEL. LARGO.

b) MOZART. TURKISH MARCH.

TSCHAIKOWSKY. FANTASIA for ORCHESTRA. "Francesca da Rimini." op. 32.

Soloist:

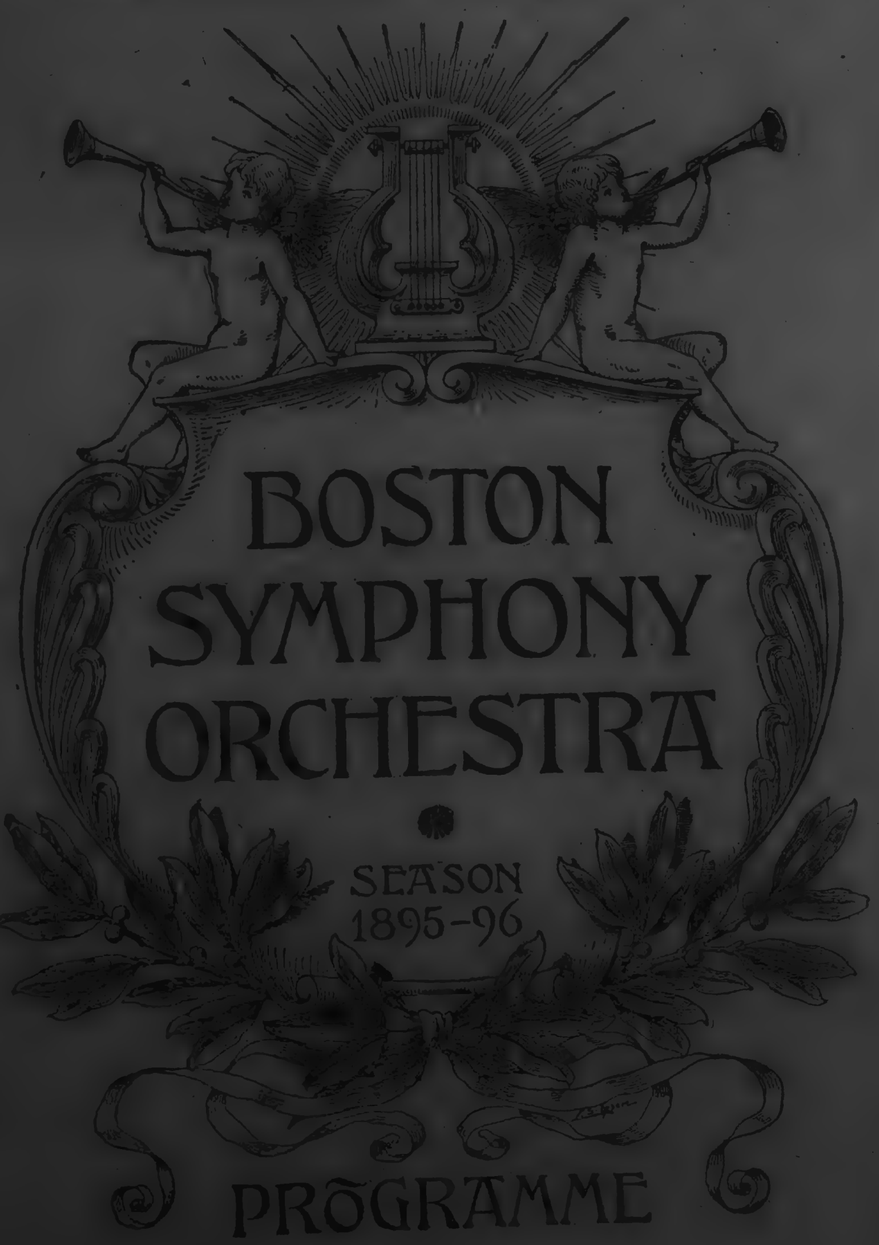
Miss MARIE GESELCHAP.

The Piano is a Mason and Hamlin.

Fourth Concert, Thursday, January 2.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, . . . PHILADELPHIA.

Monday Evening, December 16, at 8.15 precisely.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1895-96

PROGRAMME

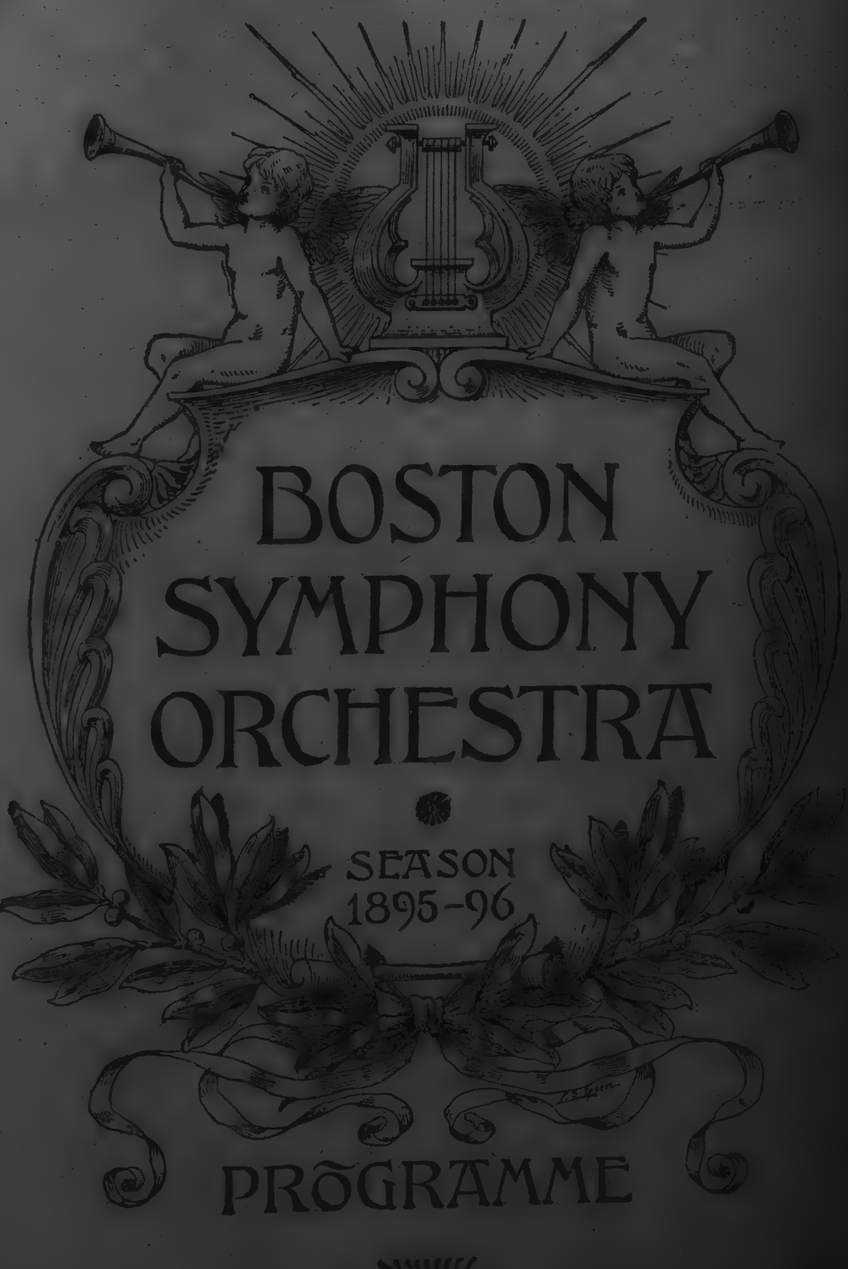
C. A ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

2

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Fischer's, 1221 Chestnut St.

METZEROTT MUSIC HALL, . . WASHINGTON.

Tuesday Evening, December 17, at 8.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1895-96

PROGRAMME

C. A ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

2

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Metzerott's Music Store

[140]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

INFANTRY HALL, ... PROVIDENCE.

Wednesday Evening, November 27, at 8 o'clock precisely.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

2

Single tickets, at $1.25 each, on sale at Infantry Hall.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

FIFTEENTH SEASON, 1895-96.
THIRTEEN HUNDRED AND THIRTY-FIRST PERFORMANCE.
NINETY-SEVENTH PERFORMANCE IN CAMBRIDGE.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

III. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 12, AT 7.45, P. M.

Programme.

SCHUMANN. SYMPHONY No. 1, in B-flat major, op. 38.
I. Andante un poco maestoso. — Allegro molto vivace.
II. Larghetto.
III. Scherzo: Molto vivace. — Trio I: Molto più vivace. — Trio II: Tempo primo.
IV. Allegro animato e grazioso.

BEETHOVEN. CONCERTO No. 1, in C major, op. 15.
I. Allegro con brio.
II. Largo.
III. Rondo. (Allegro scherzando.)
Cadenzas by L. VAN BEETHOVEN.

a) HANDEL. LARGO.

b) MOZART. TURKISH MARCH.

TSCHAIKOWSKY. FANTASIA for ORCHESTRA. "Francesca da Rimini." op. 32.

Soloist:

Miss MARIE GESELCHAP.

The Piano is a Mason and Hamlin.

Fourth Concert, Thursday, January 2.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, . . . PHILADELPHIA.

Monday Evening, December 16, at 8.15 precisely.

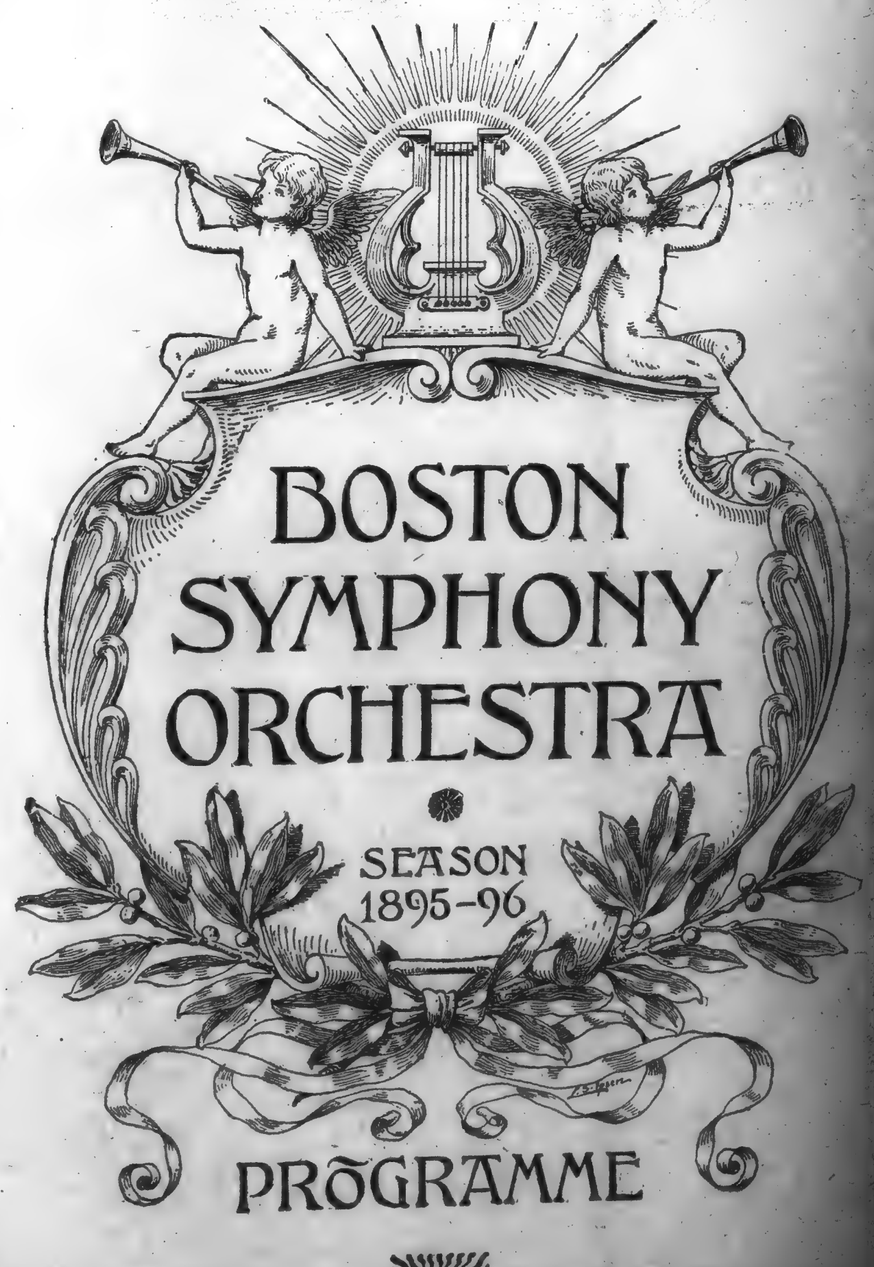
C. A ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

2

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Fischer's, 1221 Chestnut St.

METZEROTT MUSIC HALL, . . WASHINGTON.

Tuesday Evening, December 17, at 8.



C. A ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

2

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Metzerott's Music Store.

[140]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

METROPOLITAN OPERA HOUSE, . . . NEW YORK.

Friday Evening, November 15, at 8.15 precisely.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1895-96

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager. 1 F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

Copies of this Programme-book, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, can be obtained, free of charge, at Schuberth's Music Store, 23 Union Square.

Tickets at Schuberth's and at the Metropolitan Opera House.

METZEROTT MUSIC HALL, . . . WASHINGTON

Thursday Evening, November 14, at 8.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1895-96

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

1

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Metzerott's Music Store.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1895-96.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

II. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 21, AT 7.45, P. M.

Programme.

BEETHOVEN.	SYMPHONY No. 3, in E flat major, "Eroica." op. 55. I. Allegro con brio. II. Marcia funebre: Adagio assai. III. Scherzo: Allegro vivace. — Trio. IV. Finale: Allegro molto.
HANDEL.	AIR. "As when the dove." from "Acis and Galatea." (Additional accompaniments by OTTO DRESSEL.)
BERLIOZ.	a) "MENUET DES FOLLETS." b) "VALSE DES SYLPHES." From "La Damnation de Faust," op. 24.
VINCENZ LACHNER.	CONCERT ARIA for SOPRANO. "Vineta," op. 80.
RICHARD STRAUSS.	PRELUDES TO ACTS I. and II. of "Guntram," op. 25.

Soloist:

Miss CAROLINE GARDNER CLARKE.

The late arrival of the Steamer "Germanic" prevents Miss Brema's appearance this evening, and Miss Clarke has kindly consented to sing at a few hours notice.

Third Concert, Thursday, December 12.

[141]

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, . . . PHILADELPHIA.

Saturday Afternoon, November 16 at 2.30.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1895-96

PROGRAMME

C. A ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

1

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Fischer's, 1221 Chestnut St.

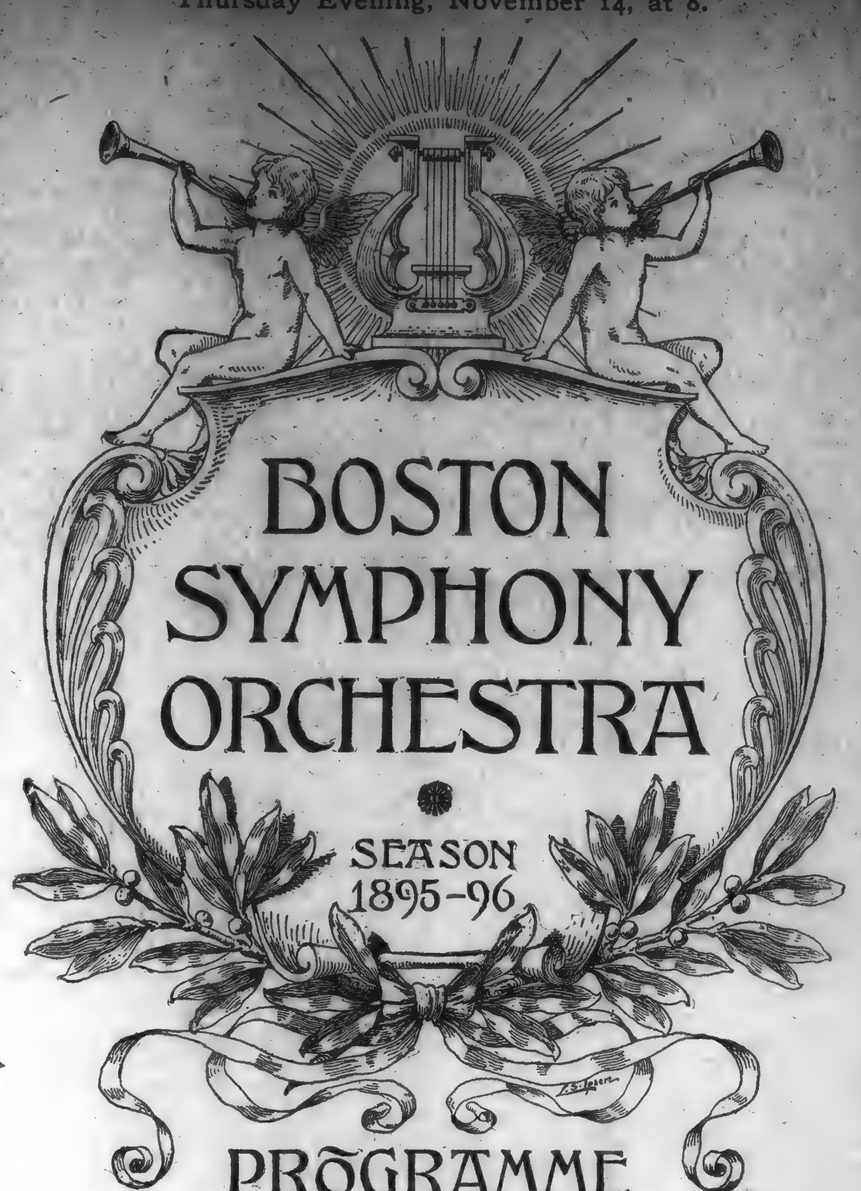
- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

METROPOLITAN OPERA HOUSE, NEW YORK.
Friday Evening, November 15, at 8.15 precisely.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager. 1 F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

Copies of this Programme-book, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, can be obtained, free of charge, at Schuberth's Music Store, 23 Union Square.
Tickets at Schuberth's and at the Metropolitan Opera House.

METZEROTT MUSIC HALL, . . WASHINGTON.
Thursday Evening, November 14, at 8.



C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager. 1 Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Metzerott's Music Store.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1895-96.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

II. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 21, AT 7.45, P. M.

Programme.

BEETHOVEN.	SYMPHONY No. 3, in E flat major, "Eroica." op. 55. I. Allegro con brio. II. Marcia funebre: Adagio assai. III. Scherzo: Allegro vivace. — Trio. IV. Finale: Allegro molto.
HANDEL.	AIR. "As when the dove." from "Acis and Galatea." (Additional accompaniments by OTTO DRESSEL.)
BERLIOZ.	a) "MENUET DES FOLLETS." b) "VALSE DES SYLPHES." From "La Damnation de Faust," op. 24.
VINCENZ LACHNER.	CONCERT ARIA for SOPRANO. "Vineta," op. 80.
RICHARD STRAUSS.	PRELUDES TO ACTS I. and II. of "Guntram," op. 25.

Soloist:

Miss CAROLINE GARDNER CLARKE.

The late arrival of the Steamer "Germanic" prevents Miss Brema's appearance this evening, and Miss Clarke has kindly consented to sing at a few hours notice.

Third Concert, Thursday, December 12.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, . . . PHILADELPHIA.
Saturday Afternoon, November 16 at 2.30.

C. A ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager. 1 Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Fischer's, 1221 Chestnut St.

[141]

Academy of Music Philadelphia

Fifteenth Season, 1895-96.
Eleventh Season in Philadelphia.
Forty-eighth Concert in Philadelphia.

First Popular Matinee

BY THE

Boston · Symphony · Orchestra

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor

ASSISTED BY

Mme. MELBA

Mme. SCALCHI, Contralto. Sig. D'AUBIGNE, Tenor
Sig. CAMPANARI, Baritone

Saturday, November 16, at 2.30

PROGRAMME.

1. OVERTURE, "Carlo Broschi" . . . . . Auber
ORCHESTRA.
2. ARIA, "Lituani" . . . . . Ponchielli
(First time.)
Mr. CAMPANARI.
3. ARIA, "Che faro" (Orpheus) . . . . . Gluck
Mme. SCALCHI.
4. LUCIA, Mad Scene from "Lucia" . . . . . Donizetti
Mme. MELBA.
Flute Obligato, Mons. CH MOLE.
5. SUITE, "L'Arlésienne" . . . . . Bizet
ORCHESTRA.
6. ARIA, "Salve Dimora" (Faust) . . . . . Gounod
Mr. D'AUBIGNE.
7. WALTZ SONG, "Se saran Rose" . . . . . Arditi
(By request)
Mme. MELBA.
8. MONOLOGUE (Falstaff) . . . . . Verdi
Mr. CAMPANARI.
9 (a) PRELUDE, "Lohengrin," Act III. . . . . Wagner
(b) PRELUDE, "Tannhaeuser," Act III. . . . . Wagner
ORCHESTRA.
10. QUARTET from "Rigoletto" . . . . . Verdi
Mesdames MELBA, SCALCHI, Messrs. D'AUBIGNE and CAMPANARI.
11. OVERTURE, "Rienzi" . . . . . Wagner
ORCHESTRA.

Tickets on sale at Fischer's, 1221 Chestnut Street, Tuesday, Nov. 12, at 9 A.M.

MUSIC HALL, ... BALTIMORE.
Wednesday Evening, November 13, at 8.15 precisely.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

1

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Albert's, 13 No. Charles St.

[142]

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, ... PHILADELPHIA.
Monday Evening, November 11, at 8.15 precisely.

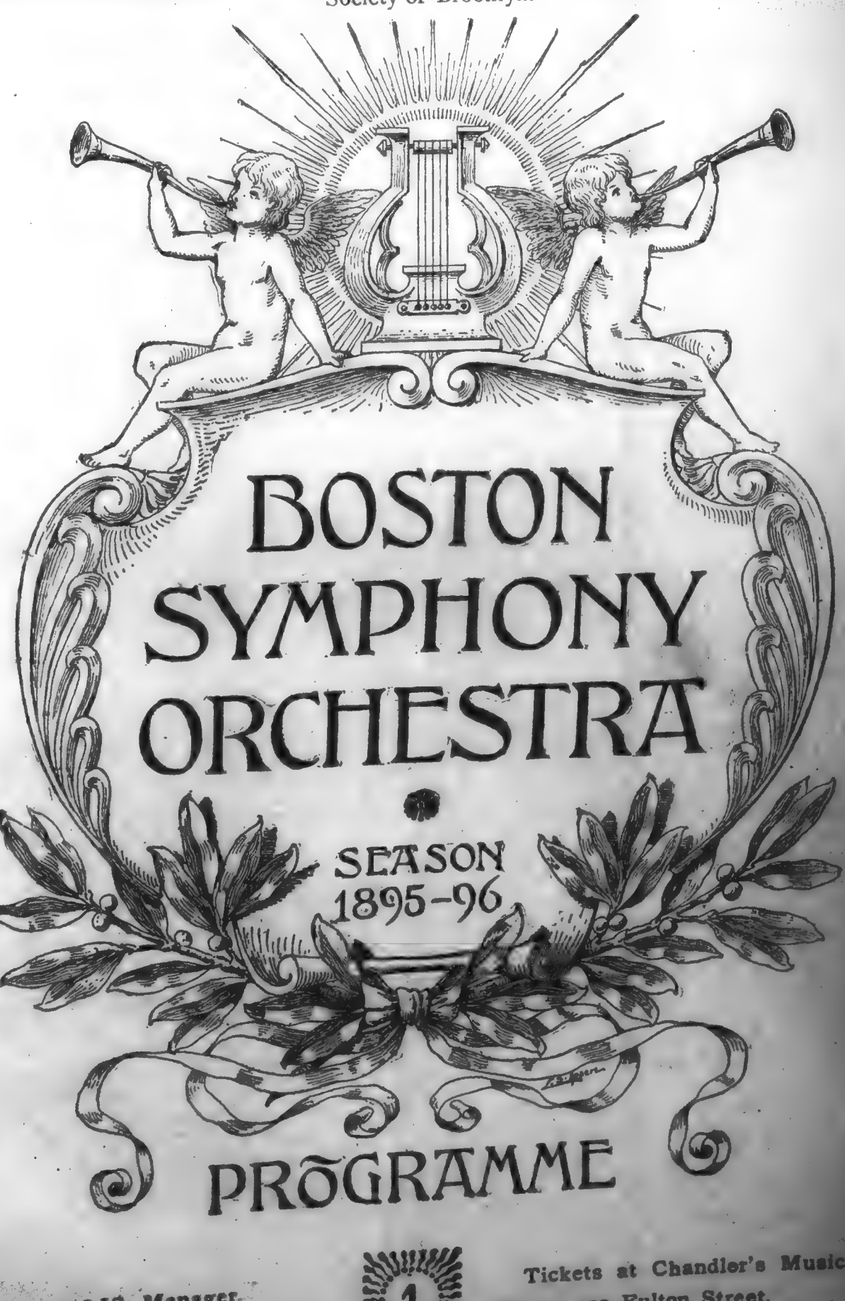
C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

1

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Fischer's, 1221 Chestnut St.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, ... BROOKLYN.
Tuesday Evening, November 12, at 8.15 precisely.
Under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences and the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn.



C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

1

Tickets at Chandler's Music Store, 300 Fulton Street.

Academy of Music Philadelphia

Fifteenth Season, 1895-96.
Eleventh Season in Philadelphia.
Forty-eighth Concert in Philadelphia.

First Popular Matinee

BY THE

Boston · Symphony · Orchestra

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor

ASSISTED BY

Mme. MELBA

Mme. SCALCHI, Contralto. Sig. D'AUBIGNE, Tenor
Sig. CAMPANARI, Baritone

Saturday, November 16, at 2.30

PROGRAMME.

1. OVERTURE, "Carlo Broschi" . . . . . Auber
   ORCHESTRA.
2. ARIA, "Lituani" . . . . . Ponchielli
   (First time.)
   Mr. CAMPANARI.
3. ARIA, "Che faro" (Orpheus) . . . . . Gluck
   Mme. SCALCHI.
4. LUCIA, Mad Scene from "Lucia" . . . . . Donizetti
   Mme. MELBA.
   Flute Obligato, Mons. CH MOLE.
5. SUITE, "L'Arlésienne" . . . . . Bizet
   ORCHESTRA.
6. ARIA, "Salve Dimora" (Faust) . . . . . Gounod
   Mr. D'AUBIGNE.
7. WALTZ SONG, "Se saran Rose" . . . . . Arditi
   (By request)
   Mme. MELBA.
8. MONOLOGUE (Falstaff) . . . . . Verdi
   Mr. CAMPANARI.
9. (a) PRELUDE, "Lohengrin," Act III. . . . . Wagner
   (b) PRELUDE, "Tannhaeuser," Act III. . . . . Wagner
   ORCHESTRA.
10. QUARTET from "Rigoletto" . . . . . Verdi
    Mesdames MELBA, SCALCHI, Messrs. D'AUBIGNE and CAMPANARI.
11. OVERTURE, "Rienzi" . . . . . Wagner
    ORCHESTRA.

Tickets on sale at Fischer's, 1221 Chestnut Street, Tuesday, Nov. 12, at 9 A.M.

MUSIC HALL, ... BALTIMORE.

Wednesday Evening, November 13, at 8.15 precisely.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

1

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Albert's, 13 No. Charles St.

[142]

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, ... PHILADELPHIA.

Monday Evening, November 11, at 8.15 precisely.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

1

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Fischer's, 1221 Chestnut St.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, ... BROOKLYN.

Tuesday Evening, November 12, at 8.15 precisely.

Under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences and the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

1

Tickets at Chandler's Music Store, 300 Fulton Street.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

INFANTRY HALL, ... PROVIDENCE.

Wednesday Evening, October 23, at 8 o'clock precisely.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1895-96.

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

Single tickets for the first concert, at $1.25 each, and season tickets at $5 each, now on sale at Infantry Hall.

INCOMPLETE

THE MELBA CONCERT.

The great Melba concert is a thing of the past, but its memory will live forever in the minds of those who were so fortunate as to be present.

The programme opened with the overture "Semiramide" followed by the Toreador's song from Carmen, excellently sung by Sig. Campanari. Mme. Scalchi was warmly welcomed and sang with great effect Nobil Signor from Les Huguenots. Sig. D'Aubigne, a new comer with a fine tenor voice scored a success in "La Donna e mobile" from Rigoletto.

The sixth number of the programme which was allotted to Madame Melba had now been reached and a hush of expcetation spread through the hall. In a moment Mme. Melba appeared at the entrance and was greeted with an outburst of applause that evidently pleased the fair prima donna and left no doubt of the esteem in which she is held in Portland. Her first selection was the great Mad Scene from Donizetti's opera Lucia di Lammermoor which presents enormous difficulites for the singer. Mme. Melba's performance of this scene was such as to make any criticism ridiculous and in itself was quite sufficient to justify the statement so often made that she is today the greatest of living scpranos. Her voice is the loveliest heard in this generation. Such sweetness with such strength, such clearness and purity in every note from the lowest to the highest, and such beautiful phrasing surely were never known before. The singer was rewarded with a perfect storm of applause that continued for several minutes, she was recalled again and again and received some magnificent floral picees. She bowed rpeatedly but the audience refused to be quieted and the demand for an encore was so irresistable that she graciously responded and sung a brilliant waltz by Arditi.

The second part of the programme consisted of the third and fifth acts of Faust in costumes with scenery. At the hands of these fine artists it is needless to say that the melodious strains of Gounod's immortal work received a performance which left nothing to be desired. Mr. Landon Ronald who made his American debut on this occasion conducted the entire performance. He showed thorough knowledge of the scores and fully merited the warm recpetion accorded him by the audience.

PRIVATE NOTES.

About 6.30 last evening a well dressed

Press
Oct. 3 '95

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

The Melba Concert.

When Mme. Melba made her first appearance in Portland last spring it seemed as if it would be impossible to imagine a concert more satisfactory in every respect and one where the audience would be better pleased. Last night's concert, however, was more delightful to the immense audience that packed City Hall to its utmost capacity because it provided an opportunity to hear the great prima donna under extremely favorable conditions. The fact that Mme. Melba was to appear in two acts of that popular opera "Faust," supported by operatic singers of great ability, with the opera handsomely staged and costumed, and with an excellent orchestra, was sufficient to draw a great house. It was a sight to be remembered to look over the hall and see how people were wedged in. The people almost overran the orchestra and they perched in all sorts of spots where they could find an abiding place. The audience was by no means confined to Portland; there wasn't a city or large town in Maine, but sent representatives.

The programme was not the same as the one published some days ago. This is the concert programme:

Overture—"Semiramide," Rossini
Orchestra.
Toreador's Song from "Carmen," Bizet
Sig. Campanari.
Cavatina—"Nobil Signor", from "Les Huguenots," Meyerbeer
Mme. Scalchi.
Aria—"La Donna e mobile," from "Rigoletto," Verdi
Sig. D'Aubigne.
Mad Scene from "Lucia di Lammermoor," Donizetti
Lucia, Mme. Melba.
(Flute obligato, Mr. North.)
Aria from "Barber of Seville," Rossin
Sig. Campanari.
Overture—"Zampa," Herold
Orchestra.

FAUST.

Acts III and V.

Marguerite, Mme. Melba
Siebel, Mme. Scalchi
Martha, Mlle. Bauermeister
Faust, Sig. D'Aubigne
Mephistophiles, Sig. Campanari

When Mme. Melba appeared she was greeted with long continued applause, and she rendered the Mad Scene from "Lucia" with the same perfection as when she so charmed and electrified her hearers with the same selection last March. Her stage presence was even more impressive than on the former occasion. She was gowned in a superb turquoise blue satin, with exquisite lace front, and her diamonds were magnificent. She sang the number in a manner that displayed the capabilities of her wonderful voice to perfection, and its beauties were enhanced by the admirable flute playing of Mr. Charles North. Her runs and trills were bird like. The magnificent coloring she throws into her wonderful execution is unequalled and the purity of her tones something to live in the memory. When she finished the last remarkable staccato run, the house broke into a perfect tempest of applause. Four times she was recalled, and bowed, and was given a large basket and immense bunch of roses. Then she came forward and sang a delighful waltz. In the opera she sang the beautiful "King of Thule" with much dignity and expression. She was arch and interesting in the "Jewel Song" and in the duet "Laissez moi with D'Aubigne she sang with a fervor that held her hearers captive. But it was reserved for her death song in the fifth act to show her power of dramatic expression.

Before she had fairly concluded it the house broke into a tumult of cheers, applause and bravos, and the curtain fell only to be raised again to enable the audience to applaud vigorously this superb artist.

Of the other artists we are able only to speak briefly. Mme. Scalchi was warmly received and sang the grand air "Nobil Signor" so artistically as to make the effort a marked feature of the evening. There are few singers on the stage today that have the perfection of method that Mme. Scalchi possesses. As Siebel in Faust, she had a fine stage presence and sang the Flower Song beautifully. Mlle. Bauermeister was an excellent Martha, and in the scene with Signor Campanari (Mephistopheles), the two gave the best acting in the opera. Signor Campanari is an admirable dramatic singer and his Mephistophiles was admirably acted and sung, as were his concert numbers. Signor D'Aubigne appeared to best advantage in the air from "Rigoletto, and in response to an encore sang a French song. The orchestra of 20 pieces was an excellent one and was conducted with skill by Mr. Ronald.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1895-96.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

I. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 31, AT 7.45, P. M.

Programme.

MOZART.	SYMPHONY No. 9, in D. Allegro assai. — Andante. — Allegro.
BEETHOVEN.	SCENA AND ARIA. "Ah! Perfido," op. 95.
BEETHOVEN.	OVERTURE. "Coriolanus."
THOMAS.	OPHÉLIE'S MAD SCENE, from "Hamlet."
GOLDMARK.	OVERTURE. "Sakuntala."

Soloist:

Mme. DeVERE-SAPIO.

Second Concert, Thursday, November 21.

[143]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

INCOMPLETE

INFANTRY HALL, ... PROVIDENCE.

Wednesday Evening, October 23, at 8 o'clock precisely.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1895-96

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

Single tickets for the first concert, at $1.25 each, and season tickets at $5 each, now on sale at Infantry Hall.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1895-96.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

I. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 31, AT 7.45. P. M.

Programme.

MOZART.	SYMPHONY No. 9, in D. Allegro assai. — Andante. — Allegro.
BEETHOVEN.	SCENA AND ARIA. "Ah! Perfido," op. 95.
BEETHOVEN.	OVERTURE. "Coriolanus."
THOMAS.	OPHÉLIE'S MAD SCENE, from "Hamlet."
GOLDMARK.	OVERTURE. "Sakuntala."

Soloist:

Mme. DeVERE-SAPIO.

Second Concert, Thursday, November 21.

[143]

...ing day of the sale.

THE MELBA CONCERT.

The great Melba concert is a thing of the past, but its memory will live forever in the minds of those who were so fortunate as to be present.

The programme opened with the overture "Semiramide" followed by the Toreador's song from Carmen, excellently sung by Sig. Campanari. Mme. Scalchi was warmly welcomed and sang with great effect Nobil Signor from Les Huguenots. Sig. D'Aubigne, a new comer with a fine tenor voice scored a success in "La Donna e mobile" from Rigoletto.

The sixth number of the programme which was allotted to Madame Melba had now been reached and a hush of expectation spread through the hall. In a moment Mme. Melba appeared at the entrance and was greeted with an outburst of applause that evidently pleased the fair prima donna and left no doubt of the esteem in which she is held in Portland. Her first selection was the great Mad Scene from Donizetti's opera Lucia di Lammermoor which presents enormous difficulites for the singer. Mme. Melba's performance of this scene was such as to make any criticism ridiculous and in itself was quite sufficient to justify the statement so often made that she is today the greatest of living scpranos. Her voice is the loveliest heard in this generation. Such sweetness with such strength, such clearness and purity in every note from the lowest to the highest, and such beautiful phrasing surely were never known before. The singer was rewarded with a perfect storm of applause that continued for several minutes, she was recalled again and again and received some magnificent floral picees. She bowed rpeeatedly but the audience refused to be quieted and the demand for an encore was so irresistable that she graciously responded and sung a brilliant waltz by Arditi.

The second part of the programme consisted of the third and fifth acts of Faust in costumes with scenery. At the hands of these fine artists it is needless to say that the melodious strains of Gounod's immortal work received a performance which left nothing to be desired. Mr. Landon Ronald who made his American debut on this occasion conducted the entire performance. He showed thorough knowledge of the scores and fully merited the warm recpetion accorded him by the audience.

POLICE NOTES.

About 6.30 last evening a well dressed

Portland Press Oct. 3 '95

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

The Melba Concert.

When Mme. Melba made her first appearance in Portland last spring it seemed as if it would be impossible to imagine a concert more satisfactory in every respect and one where the audience would be better pleased. Last night's concert, however, was more delightful to the immense audience that packed City Hall to its utmost capacity because it provided an opportunity to hear the great prima donna under extremely favorable conditions. The fact that Mme. Melba was to appear in two acts of that popular opera "Faust," supported by operatic singers of great ability, with the opera handsomely staged and costumed, and with an excellent orchestra, was sufficient to draw a great house. It was a sight to be remembered to look over the hall and see how people were wedged in. The people almost overran the orchestra and they perched in all sorts of spots where they could find an abiding place. The audience was by no means confined to Portland; there wasn't a city or large town in Maine, but sent representatives.

The programme was not the same as the one published some days ago. This is the concert programme:

Overture—"Semiramide," Rossini
Orchestra.
Toreador's Song from "Carmen," Bizet
Sig. Campanari.
Cavatina—"Nobil Signor", from "Les Huguenots," Meyerbeer
Mme. Scalchi.
Aria—"La Donna e mobile," from "Rigoletto," Verdi
Sig. D'Aubigne.
Mad Scene from "Lucia di Lammermoor," Donizetti
Lucia, Mme. Melba.
(Flute obligato, Mr. North.)
Aria from "Barber of Seville," Rossin
Sig. Campanari.
Overture—"Zampa," Herold
Orchestra.

FAUST.

Acts III and V.

Marguerite.	Mme. Melba
Siebel,	Mme. Scalchi
Martha,	Mlle. Bauermeister
Faust,	Sig. D'Aubigne
Mephistophiles,	Sig. Campanari

When Mme. Melba appeared she was greeted with long continued applause, and she rendered the Mad Scene from "Lucia" with the same perfection as when she so charmed and electrified her hearers with the same selection last March. Her stage presence was even more impressive than on the former occasion. She was gowned in a superb turquoise blue satin, with exquisite lace front, and her diamonds were magnificent. She sang the number in a manner that displayed the capabilities of her wonderful voice to perfection, and its beauties were enhanced by the admirable flute playing of Mr. Charles North. Her runs and trills were bird like. The magnificent coloring she throws into her wonderful execution is unequalled and the purity of her tones something to live in the memory. When she finished the last remarkable staccato run, the house broke into a perfect tempest of applause. Four times she was recalled, and bowed, and was given a large basket and immense bunch of roses. Then she came forward and sang a delighful waltz. In the opera she sang the beautiful "King of Thule" with much dignity and expression. She was arch and interesting in the "Jewel Song" and in the duet "Laissez moi with D'Aubigne she sang with a fervor that held her hearers captive. But it was reserved for her death song in the fifth act to show her power of dramatic expression.

Before she had fairly concluded it the house broke into a tumult of cheers, applause and bravos, and the curtain fell only to be raised again to enable the audience to applaud vigorously this superb artist.

Of the other artists we are able only to speak briefly. Mme. Scalchi was warmly received and sang the grand air "Nobil Signor" so artistically as to make the effort a marked feature of the evening. There are few singers on the stage today that have the perfection of method that Mme. Scalchi possesses. As Siebel in Faust, she had a fine stage presence and sang the Flower Song beautifully. Mlle. Bauermeister was an excellent Martha, and in the scene with Signor Campanari (Mephistopheles), the two gave the best acting in the opera. Signor Campanari is an admirable dramatic singer and his Mephistophiles was admirably acted and sung, as were his concert numbers. Signor D'Aubigne appeared to best advantage in the air from "Rigoletto, and in response to an encore sang a French song. The orchestra of 20 pieces was an excellent one and was conducted with skill by Mr. Ronald.

Little Trixie.

"Little Trixie," commences a two nights' engagement at Portland ...

END OF VOLUME

END OF REEL

PLEASE REWIND